PREFACE

I have always shared the view of the late Professor McGovney, upon whose well-known collection of cases the present volume is based, that Constitutional Law is a subject that "the student can comprehend only by the reading of many cases."* I fully recognize, of course, the importance of a knowledge of constitutional history and of pertinent socio-economic data to an adequate understanding of constitutional litigation, but I do not see how very much non-case material of this sort can be included in a case-book designed for the use of an instructor who has from forty to sixty class-room hours at his disposal without slighting the cases themselves. This I have been unwilling to do. I have, however, in the editorial notes following the reprinted cases included not only abstracts of many other cases but considerable explanatory material as well as citations to books and law review essays which have seemed to me of exceptional interest. These citations are meant to be suggestive rather than inclusive, and other instructors will doubtless have their own views as to what collateral reading is worthy of emphasis.

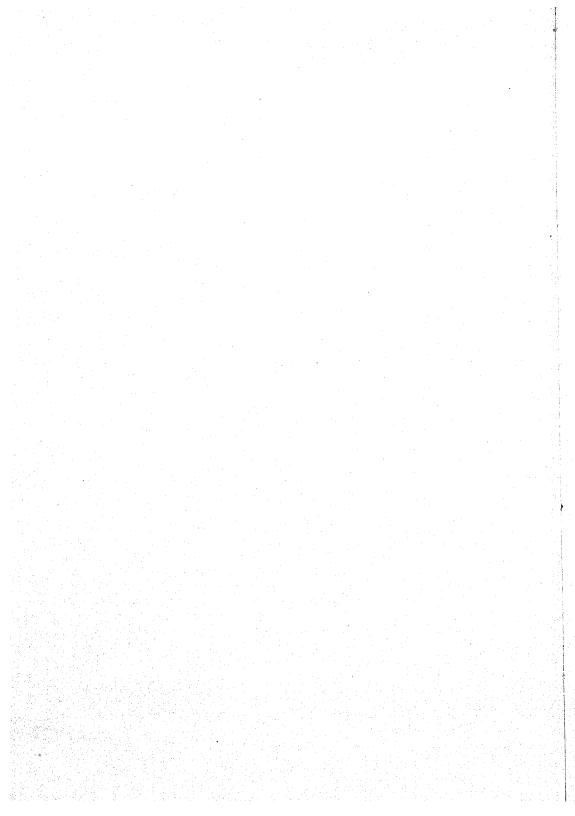

Although somewhat extensive changes have been made in Professor McGovney's original organizational scheme, this case-book, like his earlier volumes, has been constructed along "doctrinal" rather than "historical" or "chronological" lines. Because of the necessity of including many important Supreme Court opinions of recent years—particularly those dealing with the basic First Amendment guaranties—I have cut down materially the wide range of topics included in the earlier McGovney volumes. Several matters now customarily dealt with in other courses in the law curriculum have been omitted altogether. Among these are problems relating to national taxation for revenue purposes, the delegation of legislative powers and the limits of discretion in rule-making, the full faith and credit clause, and ex post facto legislation. Because of its importance to the practicing lawyer, additional material relating to the procedural aspects of constitutional litigation has been included in the chapter on judicial review.

CHAPTER I

THE JUDICIAL PROCESS IN CONSTITUTIONAL CASES

Section 1.—Establishment of the Power of Judicial Review.

MARBURY v. MADISON.

1 Cranch 137, 2 L. ed. 60.

At the last term, viz. December term, 1801, William Marbury, Dennis Ramsay, Robert Townsend Hooe, and William Harper, by their counsel, Charles Lee, Esq. late attorney general of the United States, severally moved the court for a rule to James Madison, secretary of state of the United States, to shew cause why mandamus should not issue commanding him to cause to be delivered to them respectively their several commissions as justices of the peace in the District of Columbia. This motion was supported by affidavits of the following facts; that notice of this motion had been given to Mr. Madison; that Mr. Adams, the late President of the United States, nominated the applicants to the senate for their advice and consent to be appointed justices of the peace of the District of Columbia; that the senate advised and consented to the appointments; that commissions in due form were signed by the said president appointing them justices, &c. and that the seal of the United States was in due form affixed to the said commissions by the secretary of state; that the applicants have requested Mr. Madison to deliver them their said commissions, who has not complied with that request; and that their said commissions are withheld from them; that the applicants have made application to Mr. Madison as secretary of state of the United States at his office, for information whether the commissions were signed and sealed as aforesaid; that explicit and satisfactory information has not been given in answer to that enquiry, either by the secretary of state or any officer in the department of state; that application has been made to the secretary of the Senate for a certificate of the nomination of the applicants, and of the advice and consent of the senate, who has declined giving such a certificate; whereupon a rule was laid to shew cause on the fourth day of this term. * * *

Afterwards, on the 24th of February the following opinion of the court was delivered by the Chief Justice.

OPINION OF THE COURT.

At the last term on the affidavits then read and filed with the clerk, a rule was granted in this case, requiring the secretary of state to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, directing him to deliver to William Marbury his commission as a justice of the peace for the County of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

No cause has been shewn, and the present motion is for a mandamus. The peculiar delicacy of this case, the novelty of some of its circumstances, and the real difficulty attending the points which occur in it, require a complete exposition of the principles on which the opinion to be given by the court, is founded. * * *

2dly. The power of this court.

1st. The nature of the writ. * * *

This, then, is a plain case for a mandamus, either to deliver the commission, or a copy of it from the record; and it only remains to be enquired, Whether it can issue from this court.

The act to establish the judicial courts of the United States authorizes the Supreme Court "to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law to any courts appointed or persons holding office, under the authority of the United States."

The Secretary of State being a person holding an office under the authority of the United States is precisely within the letter of the description; and if this court is not authorized to issue a writ of mandamus to such an officer, it must be because the law is unconstitutional, and therefore absolutely incapable of conferring the authority and assigning the duties which its words purport to confer and assign.

The Constitution vests the whole judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. This power is expressly extended to all cases arising under the laws of the United States; and, consequently, in some form, may be exercised over the present case; because the right claimed is given by a law of the United States.

In the distribution of this power it is declared that "the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party. In all other cases, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction."

It has been insisted, at the bar, that as the original grant of jurisdiction, to the Supreme and inferior courts, is general, and the clause, assigning original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, contains no negative or restrictive words, the power remains to the legislature, to assign original jurisdiction to that court in other cases than those specified in the article which has been recited; provided those cases belong to the judicial power of the United States.

If it had been intended to leave it in the discretion of the legislature to apportion the judicial power between the Supreme and inferior courts according to the will of that body, it would certainly have been useless to have proceeded further than to have defined the judicial power, and the tribunals in which it should be vested. The subsequent part of the section is mere surplusage, is entirely without meaning, if such is to be the construction. If Congress remains at liberty to give this Court appellate jurisdiction, where the Constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original; and original jurisdiction where the Constitution has declared it shall be appellate; the distribution of jurisdiction, made in the Constitution, is form without substance.

Affirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of other objects than those affirmed; and in this case, a negative or exclusive sense must be given to them, or they have no operation at all.

It cannot be presumed that any clause in the Constitution is intended to be without effect; and, therefore, such a construction is inadmissible, unless the words require it.

If the solicitude of the convention, respecting our peace with foreign powers, induced a provision that the Supreme Court should take original jurisdiction in cases which might be supposed to affect them; yet the clause would have proceeded no further than to provide for such cases, if no further restriction on the powers of Congress had been intended. That they should have appellate jurisdiction in all other cases, with such exceptions as Congress might make, is no restriction; unless the words be deemed exclusive of original jurisdiction.

When an instrument organizing fundamentally a judicial system, divides it into one Supreme, and so many inferior courts as the legislature may ordain and establish; then enumerates its powers, and proceeds so far to distribute them, as to define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court by declaring the cases in which it shall take original jurisdiction, and that in others it shall take appellate jurisdiction; the plain import of the words seems to be, that in one class of cases its jurisdiction is original, and not appellate; in the other it is appellate, and not original. If any other construction would render the clause inoperative, that is an additional reason for rejecting such other construction, and for adhering to their obvious meaning.

To enable this court then to issue a mandamus, it must be shown to be an exercise of appellate jurisdiction, or to be necessary to enable them to exercise appellate jurisdiction. * * *

The authority, therefore, given to the Supreme Court, by the act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, to issue writs of mandamus to public officers, appears not to be warranted by the Constitution; and it becomes necessary to enquire whether a jurisdiction, so conferred, can be exercised.

The question, whether an act, repugnant to the Constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but, happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest. It seems only necessary to recognize certain principles, supposed to have been long and well established, to decide it.

That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority, from which they proceed, is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent.

This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns, to different departments, their respective powers. It may either stop here, or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

The government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined, and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the Constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction, between a government with limited and unlimited powers, is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the Constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the Constitution by an ordinary act.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The Constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.

If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act contrary to the Constitution is not law: if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts, on the part of the people, to limit a power, in its own nature illimitable.

Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently the theory of every such government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the Constitution, is void.

This theory is essentially attached to a written Constitution, and is consequently to be considered, by this court, as one of the fundamental principles of our society. It is not therefore to be lost sight of in the further consideration of this subject.

If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the Constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory; and would seem, at first view, an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration.

It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

So if a law be in opposition to the Constitution; if both the law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the Constitution; or conformably to the Constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.

If then the courts are to regard the Constitution; and the Constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature; the Constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.

Those then who controvert the principle that the Constitution is to be considered, in court, as a paramount law, are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the Constitution, and see only the law.

This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act, which, according to the principles and theory of our government, is entirely void, is yet, in practice, completely obligatory. It would declare, that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden, such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be giving to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions—a written Constitution—would of itself be sufficient, in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. But the peculiar expressions of the Constitution of the United States furnish additional arguments in favor of its rejection.

The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the Constitution.

Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that, in using it, the Constitution should not be looked into? That a case arising under the Constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises?

This is too extravagant to be maintained.

In some cases then, the Constitution must be looked into by the judges. And if they can open it at all, what part of it are they forbidden to read, or to obey?

There are many other parts of the Constitution which serve to illustrate this subject.

It is declared that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Suppose a duty on the export of cotton, of tobacco, or of flour; and a suit instituted to recover it. Ought judgment to be rendered in such a case? Ought the judges to close their eyes on the Constitution, and only see the law?

The Constitution declares "that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

If, however, such a bill should be passed and a person should be prosecuted under it; must the court condemn to death those victims whom the Constitution endeavours to preserve?

"No person," says the Constitution, "shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

Here the language of the Constitution is addressed especially to the courts. It prescribes, directly for them, a rule of evidence not to be departed from. If the legislature should change that rule, and declare one witness, or a confession out of court, sufficient for conviction, must the constitutional principle yield to the legislative act?

From these, and many other selections which might be made, it is apparent that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that instrument, as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature.

Why otherwise does it direct the judges to take an oath to support it? This oath certainly applies, in an especial manner, to their conduct in their official character. How immoral to impose it on them, if they were to be used as the instruments, and the knowing instruments, for violating what they swear to support!

The oath of office, too, imposed by the legislature, is completely demonstrative of the legislative opinion on this subject. It is in these words, "I do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent on me as ——— according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the Constitution, and laws of the United States."

Why does a judge swear to discharge his duties agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, if that Constitution forms no rule for his government? if it is closed upon him, and cannot be inspected by him?

If such be the real state of things, this is worse than solemn mockery. To prescribe, or to take this oath, becomes equally a crime.

It is also not entirely unworthy of observation, that in declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the Constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the Constitution, have that rank.

Thus, the particular phraseology of the Constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the Constitution is void; and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.

The rule must be discharged.

NOTES

1. The contemporary significance of Marbury v. Madison lay not so much in the assertion of power by the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutional validity of Congressional legislation as in its announcement of the doctrine that the court might issue mandamus to a Cabinet officer who was acting by direction of the President. President Jefferson resented the court's encroachment upon the authority of the Executive much more than any alleged "judicial usurpation" of the power of Congress in the legislative field. See 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), 232. Thirty-five years later, in Kendall v. United States, 12 Pet. 524, 9 L. ed. 1181 (1838), an act of Congress had directed the Postmaster-General to credit a contractor with such sums as the Solicitor of the Treasury should find due to him. The court held that the crediting of this money was a ministerial duty, the performance of which might be judicially enforced.

2. Although the decision in Marbury v. Madison was the occasion of controversy, there was nothing novel about the doctrine that the judicial department of government is the branch which must finally determine whether a legislative act is enforceable as law under a written constitution. The reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall follows closely that of Alexander Hamilton in Numbers 78 and 80 of The Federalist (essays published in 1787 and 1788 expounding, and advocating the adoption by the states, of the Constitution).

In the pre-revolutionary period, colonial legislatures were subordinate bodies which were limited by the terms of colonial charters and the laws of England. Appeals from the colonial courts to the Privy Council in England frequently involved alleged conflicts between legislative enactments and colonial charters. While the policy or expediency of the statute was sometimes under attack, the chief ground for disallowance was the asserted lack of authority of the colonial legislature to enact the measure. A notable case was Winthrop v. Lechemere (1727-28), where a statute of Connecticut was held "null and void and of no force or effect whatever" since it was "not warranted by the Charter" of that colony. See Thayer, Cases on Constitutional Law (1895), I, 34; McGovney, The British Origin of Judicial Review of Legislation, 93 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 1 (1944).

In the post-revolutionary period, state constitutions were substituted for colonial charters and it was well-understood that state legislatures were bound thereby. It also seems to have been generally accepted that a state court might pass upon the issue of the alleged repugnance of a state statute to the state constitution. Eight precedents or possible precedents have been discussed by constitutional historians where state laws were held invalid by state courts prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1789. There were also a number of similar precedents between 1789 and the decision in Marbury v. Madison. Consult Thayer, Cases on Constitutional Law (1895), I, 48-80; Coxe, Judicial Power and Unconstitutional Legislation (1893), 219-270; Corwin, The Doctrine of Judicial Review (1914), 71-74; Haines, The American Doctrine of Judicial Supremacy (2d ed. 1932), chs. V, VII.

While the Constitution contains no specific reference to the power of judicial review, the debates in the Constitutional Convention indicate that the delegates expected the new courts to be established under the authority of the federal government to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress. They knew that their state courts had successfully asserted the power of enforcing the state constitutions, without any specific provisions in those constitutions for such action. It is probable that they made no express provision for the exercise of the power of judicial review because they made no express provision for the exercise of any other power by the federal courts. They created the Supreme Court and defined its jurisdiction (i. e., the subject matter over which its judicial power should extend), but they made no attempt to control its judicial functions after it had obtained jurisdiction. See Warren, Congress, the Constitution and the Supreme Court (rev. ed. 1935), ch. 2; Beard, The Supreme Court and the Constitution (1912).

Alexander Hamilton doubtless expressed the view generally accepted by the framers of the Constitution when he wrote in No. 78 of The Federalist:

The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A Constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges, as a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.

Marbury v. Madison was not the first case in which the Supreme Court passed upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress but it was the first in which the court held an act of Congress unconstitutional. On a fictitiously framed issue constituting virtually a moot case the court in 1796 held a law of Congress valid. In his opinion in this case Associate Justice Chase said that since he considered the statute consistent with the Constitution "it is unnecessary, at this time, for me to determine, whether this Court, constitutionally possesses the power to declare an act of Congress void, on the ground of its being made contrary to, and in violation of, the Constitution; but if the Court have such power, I am free to declare, that I will never exercise it, but in a very clear case." (Italics are in the original report.) Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall. 171, 1 L. ed. 556 (1796), and see 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), 146-149. Moreover, several of the individual justices of the court, sitting on circuit, had on a previous occasion declared an act of Congress unconstitutional. The statute involved was one which imposed on justices of the Supreme Court the duty of examining and passing on the claims of invalid Revolutionary soldiers. The views of these members of the Court are set forth in correspondence included in the report of Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409, 1 L. ed. 436 (1792).

3. The principle of the supremacy of Parliament is well-established in English constitutional law. The doctrine of judicial review of legislative acts has no application to a legislature whose powers are unlimited and finds virtually no support in the English precedents. Of historical interest only is the celebrated dictum in Dr. Bonham's Case, 8 Co. 181a (1610), where Chief Justice Coke said:

And it appears in our books, that in many cases, the common law will controul Acts of Parliament, and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void; for when an Act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will controul it and adjudge such Act to be void.

4. In Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U. S. 142, 147-148, 72 L. ed. 206, 210, 48 Sup. Ct. 105 (1928) Mr. Justice Holmes said: "Although research has shown and practice has established the futility of the charge that it was a usurpation when this Court undertook to declare an Act of Congress unconstitutional, I suppose that we all agree that to do so is the gravest and most delicate duty that this Court is called on to perform. Upon this, among other considerations, the rule is settled that as between two possible interpretations of a statute, by one of which it would be unconstitutional and by the other valid, our plain duty is to adopt that which will save the Act. Even to avoid a serious doubt the rule is the same."

Had Chief Justice Marshall not deemed the time propitious for asserting the Supreme Court's power to nullify an act of Congress, it would not have been difficult for him to reconcile the section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 held invalid by the decision with Article III of the Constitution by applying the canon of constitutional interpretation set forth above by Mr. Justice Holmes. In other words, he could have solved the problem by dealing with it as a matter of statutory construction and thus avoided the necessity of holding the statute unconstitutional. The section could reasonably have been held to mean that the Supreme Court had power to issue writs of mandamus on occasions when that remedy was appropriate in the disposition of those cases which, in conformity with Article III, were properly before the court. The power of the court in this regard is now set out in the Judicial Code [28 U. S. C. § 1651(a); F. C. A. 28 § 1651(a)] as follows: "The Supreme Court and all courts established by act of Congress may issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law." For discussions of this aspect of the case see Corwin, The Doctrine of Judicial Review (1914), 9; Fairman, American Constitutional Decisions (1948), 24-25.

5. In our federal structure of government there are three situations in which courts may be called upon to pass upon the constitutional validity of legislative acts: (1) where an act of Congress is alleged to violate the Constitution of the United States; (2) where the law of a state is alleged to violate the Constitution of the United States; and (3) where the law of a state is alleged to violate the state's constitution. In general, federal courts have the power to decide questions of state constitutional law, and state courts have the power to decide questions of federal constitutional law, if the determination of such constitutional issues is necessary to the disposition of cases brought before them. But state courts are bound by the decisions of federal courts on questions of federal constitutional law, and the decision of a state's court of last resort is final as regards a question of the constitutional law of that state.

7. Down to 1936 there were 76 cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States held an act of Congress or some portion thereof to be unconstitutional, out of more than 40,000 cases decided; 64 different acts were construed and 84 provisions of law in some respect invalidated. See the study prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress: Provisions of Federal Law Held Unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, Government Printing Office (1936). Only two laws of Congress have been held invalid since 1936. While the number of laws declared unconstitutional as compared with the total number of laws passed is indeed negligible, it is none the less true that the court's exercise of the judicial veto has at times been productive of serious political repercussions. Decisions holding invalid acts of state lawmaking bodies have been responsible for some of the adverse criticism. President Franklin D. Roosevelt's proposed bill in 1937 for reorganization of the federal judiciary, following the invalidation of important Congressional enactments of the New Deal administration, was only the last of numerous occasions in our constitutional history in which dissatisfaction with the court's decisions on constitutional issues has resulted in proposals to abrogate or curb the exercise of judicial review. ### MARTIN v. HUNTER'S LESSEE.

1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97.

[This case originated in an action of ejectment in a state district court in Virginia. The original defendant, an alien British subject, claimed that his title was protected by the treaty with England of 1783; the plaintiff, that by Virginia legislation the land had vested in that State and had been granted to him. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant in 1794. An appeal was revived against Martin an heir at law and devisee of Denny Fairfax and in 1810 the Court of Appeals of Virginia reversed the decision. On writ of error to the United States Supreme Court, that court, taking jurisdiction because of the right set up under the treaty and denied by the Court of Appeals, in 1813 reversed the decision of the latter court (7 Cranch 603, sub. nom. Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee) and remanded the case to that court "with instructions to enter judgment for the appellant Philip Martin." The mandate of the Supreme Court, using the customary language, "commanded" the Court of Appeals to take proceedings "agreeably to said judgment and instructions of said Supreme Court." The Court of Appeals requested argument of counsel whether the mandate should be obeyed and after six days argument and twenty months consideration announced in December, 1815, the judgment stated below, reported in 4 Munf. (Va.) 1.]

MR. JUSTICE STORY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a writ of error from the Court of Appeals of Virginia, founded upon the refusal of that court to obey the mandate of this court, requiring the judgment rendered in this very cause, at February Term, 1813, to be carried into due execution. The following is the judgment of the Court of Appeals rendered on the mandate: "The court is unanimously of opinion, that the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States does not extend to this court, under a sound construction of the Constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the Act of Congress to establish the judicial courts of the United States, as extends the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to this court, is not in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States; that the writ of error in this cause was improvidently allowed under the authority of that act; that the proceedings thereon in the Supreme Court were coram non iudice, in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by the court." * * *

Before proceeding to the principal questions, it may not be unfit to dispose of some preliminary considerations which have grown out of the arguments at the bar. * * *

The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not an impracticable, task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications, which at the present might seem salutary, might, in the end, prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mould and model the exercise of its powers, as its own wisdom and the public interest should require. * * *

The third article of the Constitution is that which must principally attract our attention. * * *

This leads us to the consideration of the great question as to the nature and extent of the appellate jurisdiction of the United States. We have already seen that appellate jurisdiction is given by the Constitution to the Supreme Court in all cases where it has not original jurisdiction; subject, however, to such exceptions and regulations as Congress may prescribe. It is, therefore, capable of embracing every case enumerated in the Constitution, which is not exclusively to be decided by way of original jurisdiction. But the exercise of appellate jurisdiction is far from being limited by the terms of the Constitution to the Supreme Court. There can be no doubt that Congress may create a succession of inferior tribunals, in each of which it may vest appellate as well as original jurisdiction. The judicial power is delegated by the Constitution in the most general terms, and may, therefore, be exercised by Congress under every variety of form, of appellate or original jurisdiction. And as there is nothing in the Constitution which restrains or limits this power, it must, therefore, in all other cases, subsist in the utmost latitude of which, in its own nature, it is susceptible.

As, then, by the terms of the Constitution, the appellate jurisdiction is not limited as to the Supreme Court, and as to this court it may be exercised in all other cases than those of which it has original cognizance, what is there to restrain its exercise over State tribunals in the enumerated cases? The appellate power is not limited by the terms of the third article to any particular courts. The words are, "the judicial power (which includes appellate power) shall extend to all cases," &c., and "in all other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction." It is the case, then, and not the court, that gives the jurisdiction. If the judicial power extends to the case, it will be in vain to search in the letter of the Constitution for any qualification as to the tribunal where it depends. It is incumbent, then, upon those who assert such a qualification to show its existence by necessary implication. If the text be clear and distinct, no restriction upon its plain and obvious import ought to be admitted, unless the inference be irresistible.

If the Constitution meant to limit the appellate jurisdiction to cases pending in the courts of the United States, it would necessarily follow that the jurisdiction of these courts would, in all the cases enumerated in the Constitution, be exclusive of state tribunals. How otherwise could the jurisdiction extend to all cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, or to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction? If some of these cases might be entertained by state tribunals, and no appellate jurisdiction as to them should exist, then the appellate power would not extend to all, but to some, cases. If state tribunals might exercise concurrent jurisdiction over all or some of the other classes of cases in the Constitution without control, then the appellate jurisdiction of the United States might, as to such cases, have no real existence, contrary to the manifest intent of the Constitution. Under such circumstances, to give effect to the judicial power, it must be construed to be exclusive; and this not only when the casus foederis should arise directly, but when it should arise, incidentally, in cases pending in state courts. This construction would abridge the jurisdiction of such court far more than has been ever contemplated in any Act of Congress.

On the other hand, if, as has been contended, a discretion be vested in Congress to establish, or not to establish, inferior courts at their own pleasure, and Congress should not establish such courts, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court would have nothing to act upon, unless it could act upon cases pending in the state courts. Under such circumstances, it must be held that the appellate power would extend to state courts; for the Constitution is peremptory that it shall extend to certain enumerated cases, which cases could exist in no other courts. Any other construction, upon this supposition, would involve this strange contradiction, that a discretionary power vested in Congress, and which they might rightfully omit to exercise, would defeat the absolute injunctions of the Constitution in relation to the whole appellate power.

But it is plain that the framers of the Constitution did contemplate that cases within the judicial cognizance of the United States not only might but would arise in the state courts, in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction. With this view the sixth article declares, that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution, or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It is obvious that this obligation is imperative upon the state judges in their official, and not merely in their private capacities. From the very nature of their judicial duties they would be called upon to pronounce the law applicable to the case in judgment. They were not to decide merely according to the laws or constitution of the state, but according to the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States—"the supreme law of the land."

A moment's consideration will show us the necessity and propriety of this provision in cases where the jurisdiction of the state courts is unquestionable. Suppose a contract for the payment of money is made between citizens of the same state, and performance thereof is sought in the courts of that state; no person can doubt that the jurisdiction completely and exclusively attaches, in the first instance, to such courts. Suppose at the trial the defendant sets up in his defence a tender under a state law, making paper money a good tender, or a state law, impairing the obligation of such contract, which law, if binding, would defeat the suit. The Constitution of the United States has declared that no state shall make anything but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. If Congress shall not have passed a law providing for the removal of such a suit to the courts of the United States, must not the state court proceed to hear and determine it? Can a mere plea in defence be of itself a bar to further proceedings, so as to prohibit an inquiry into its truth or legal propriety, when no other tribunal exists to whom judicial cognizance of such cases is confided? Suppose an indictment for a crime in a state court, and the defendant should allege in his defence that the crime was created by an ex post facto act of the state, must not the state court, in the exercise of a jurisdiction which has already rightfully attached, have a right to pronounce on the validity and sufficiency of the defence? It would be extremely difficult, upon any legal principles, to give a negative answer to these inquiries. Innumerable instances of the same sort might be stated, in illustration of the position; and unless the state courts could sustain jurisdiction in such cases, this clause of the sixth article would be without meaning or effect, and public mischiefs, of a most enormous magnitude, would inevitably ensue.

It must, therefore, be conceded that the Constitution not only contemplated, but meant to provide for cases within the scope of the judicial power of the United States, which might yet depend before state tribunals. It was foreseen that in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, state courts would incidentally take cognizance of cases arising under the Constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States. Yet to all these cases the judicial power, by the very terms of the Constitution, is to extend. It cannot extend by original jurisdiction if that was already rightfully and exclusively attached in the state courts, which (as has been already shown) may occur; it must, therefore, extend by appellate jurisdiction, or not at all. It would seem to follow that the appellate power of the United States must, in such cases, extend to state tribunals; and if in such cases, there is no reason why it should not equally attach upon all others within the purview of the Constitution. * * *

Nor can such a right be deemed to impair the independence of state judges. It is assuming the very ground in controversy to assert that they possess an absolute independence of the United States. In respect to the powers granted to the United States, they are not independent; they are expressly bound to obedience by the letter of the Constitution; and if they should unintentionally transcend their authority, or misconstrue the Constitution, there is no more reason for giving their judgments an absolute and irresistible force, than for giving it to the acts of the other co-ordinate departments of state sovereignty.

The argument urged from the possibility of the abuse of the revising power, is equally unsatisfactory. It is always a doubtful course, to argue against the use or existence of a power, from the possibility of its abuse. It is still more difficult, by such an argument, to engraft upon a general power a restriction which is not to be found in the terms in which it is given. From the very nature of things, the absolute right of decision, in the last resort, must rest somewhere—wherever it may be vested it is susceptible of abuse. In all questions of jurisdiction the inferior or [the] appellate court must pronounce the final judgment; and common sense, as well as legal reasoning, has conferred it upon the latter. * * *

It is further argued, that no great public mischief can result from a construction which shall limit the appellate power of the United States to cases in their own courts: first, because state judges are bound by an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and must be presumed to be men of learning and integrity; and, secondly, because Congress must have an unquestionable right to remove all cases within the scope of the judicial power from the state courts to the courts of the United States, at any time before final judgment, though not after final judgment. As to the first reason—admitting that the judges of the state courts are, and always will be, of as much learning, integrity, and wisdom, as those of the courts of the United States, (which we very cheerfully admit), it does not aid the argument. It is manifest that the Constitution has proceeded upon a theory of its own, and given or withheld powers according to the judgment of the American people, by whom it was adopted. We can only construe its powers, and cannot inquire into the policy or principles which induced the grant of them. The Constitution has presumed (whether rightly or wrongly we do not inquire) that state attachments, state prejudices, state jealousies, and state interests, might sometimes obstruct, or control, or be supposed to obstruct or control, the regular administration of justice. Hence, in controversies between states; between citizens of different states; between citizens claiming grants under different states; between a state and its citizens, or foreigners, and between citizens and foreigners, it enables the parties, under the authority of Congress, to have the controversies heard, tried, and determined before the national tribunals. No other reason than that which has been stated can be assigned, why some, at least, of those cases should not have been left to the cognizance of the state courts. In respect to the other enumerated cases—the cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—reasons of a higher and more extensive nature, touching the safety, peace, and sovereignty of the nation, might well justify a grant of exclusive jurisdiction.

This is not all. A motive of another kind, perfectly compatible with the most sincere respect for state tribunals, might induce the grant of appellate power over their decisions. That motive is the importance, and even necessity of uniformity of decisions throughout the whole United States, upon all subjects within the purview of the Constitution. Judges of equal learning and integrity, in different states, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the Constitution itself. If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties, and the Constitution of the United States would be different in different states, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two states. * * *

There is an additional consideration, which is entitled to great weight. The Constitution of the United States was designed for the common and equal benefit of all the people of the United States. The judicial power was granted for the same benign and salutary purposes. It was not to be exercised exclusively for the benefit of parties who might be plaintiffs, and would elect the national forum, but also for the protection of defendants who might be entitled to try their rights, or assert their privileges, before the same forum. Yet, if the construction contended for be correct, it will follow, that as the plaintiff may always elect the state court, the defendant may be deprived of all the security which the Constitution intended in aid of his rights. Such a state of things can, in no respect, be considered as giving equal rights. To obviate this difficulty, we are referred to the power which it is admitted Congress possess to remove suits from state courts to the national courts; and this forms the second ground upon which the argument we are considering has been attempted to be sustained.

This power of removal is not to be found in express terms in any part of the Constitution; if it be given, it is only given by implication, as a power necessary and proper to carry into effect some express power. The power of removal is certainly not, in strictness of language [an exercise of original jurisdiction]; it presupposes an exercise of original jurisdiction to have attached elsewhere. The existence of this power of removal is familiar in courts acting according to the course of the common law in criminal as well as civil cases, and it is exercised before as well as after judgment. But this is always deemed in both cases an exercise of appellate, and not of original jurisdiction. If, then, the right of removal be included in the appellate jurisdiction, it is only because it is one mode of exercising that power, and as Congress is not limited by the Constitution to any particular mode, or time of exercising it, it may authorize a removal either before or after judgment. The time, the process, and the manner, must be subject to its absolute legislative control. A writ of error is, indeed, but a process which removes the record of one court to the possession of another court, and enables the latter to inspect the proceedings, and give such judgment as its own opinion of the law and justice of the case may warrant. There is nothing in the nature of the process which forbids it from being applied, by the legislature, to interlocutory as well as final judgments. And if the right of removal from state courts exists before judgment, because it is included in the appellate power, it must, for the same reason, exist after judgment. And if the appellate power by the Constitution does not include cases pending in state courts, the right of removal, which is but a mode of exercising that power, cannot be applied to them. Precisely the same objections, therefore, exist as to the right of removal before judgment, as after, and both must stand or fall together. Nor, indeed, would the force of the arguments on either side materially vary, if the right of removal were an exercise of original jurisdiction. It would equally trench upon the jurisdiction and independence of state tribunals.

The remedy, too, of removal of suits would be utterly inadequate to the purposes of the Constitution, if it could act only on the parties, and not upon the state courts. In respect to criminal prosecutions, the difficulty seems admitted to be insurmountable; and in respect to civil suits, there would, in many cases, be rights without corresponding remedies. If state courts should deny the constitutionality of the authority to remove suits from their cognizance, in what manner could they be compelled to relinquish the jurisdiction? In respect to criminal cases, there would at once be an end of all control, and the state decisions would be paramount to the Constitution; and though in civil suits the courts of the United States might act upon the parties, yet the state courts might act in the same way; and this conflict of jurisdictions would not only jeopardize private rights, but bring into imminent peril the public interests.

On the whole, the court are of opinion, that the appellate power of the United States does extend to cases pending in the state courts; and that the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, which authorizes the exercise of this jurisdiction in the specified cases, by a writ of error, is supported by the letter and spirit of the Constitution. We find no clause in that instrument which limits this power; and we dare not interpose a limitation where the people have not been disposed to create one. * * *

It is the opinion of the whole court, that the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, rendered on the mandate in this cause, be reversed, and the judgment of the District Court, held at Winchester, be, and the same is hereby affirmed. [The concurring opinion of Mr. JUSTICE JOHNSON is omitted.]

NOTES

1. The text of section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, discussed in the opinion, is as follows:

SECTION 25. A final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favour of such their validity, or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the Constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or exemption specially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the said Constitution, treaty, statute or commission, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice, or judge or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court, and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision as before provided, may at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution. But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said Constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.

2. Note that the section specifies three principal fact situations which were deemed certain to arise in future cases: (1) Where the validity of a federal statute or treaty is involved and the decision of the state court is against its validity; (2) Where the validity of a state statute is drawn in question as repugnant to the federal Constitution, statutes or treaties and the decision of the state court is in favor of its validity; and (3) Where the construction of any clause of the federal Constitution, or of a federal statute or treaty, is drawn in question and the decision of the state court is against the title, right, interest or privilege claimed thereunder by either party. In all these situations, the section provides, the decision of the state court can be re-examined and reversed or affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error.

The present form of section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 appears in the following provision of the Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. § 1257; F. C. A. 28 § 1257):

Final judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court as follows:

(1) By appeal, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of the United States and the decision is against its validity.

(2) By appeal, where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of any State on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of its validity.

(3) By writ of certiorari, where the validity of a treaty or statute of the United States is drawn in question or where the validity of a State Statute is drawn in question on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, or where any title, right, privilege or immunity is specially set up or claimed under the Constitution, treaties or statutes of, or commission held or authority exercised under, the United States.

In paragraphs (1) and (2) above the term "writ of error," originally used, has (since 1928) been changed to "appeal," but the change is unimportant. In paragraph (3) the Supreme Court is empowered to require a case to be certified to it for final decision from the highest state court, even though the decision of that court is in favor of the federal right or immunity. It was not until 1914 that the Supreme Court was vested with this discretionary appellate jurisdiction to determine finally the meaning of the Constitution of the United States for all the states and territories of the nation. Before that time state courts were the final interpreters, within their own borders, of the Constitution, so long as they decided the claim in favor of the national authority. Amplifying paragraph (3) above, the Supreme Court in its Revised Rules has said (Rule 19, par. 1) that "a review on writ of certiorari is not a matter of right, but of sound judicial discretion, and will be granted only where there are special and important reasons therefor." It is to be noted that the certiorari jurisdiction includes all the cases, so that those listed in paragraphs (1) and (2) may go to the Supreme Court either way. The Judicial Code provides (28 U. S. C. § 2103; F. C. A. 28 § 2103) that if a party takes an appeal where there is only certiorari jurisdiction, the appeal papers will be considered as a petition for certiorari and acted on as such. Obviously, however, if a party seeking review has a right to an appeal, under either paragraphs (1) or (2), he had better go that way, since the certiorari jurisdiction is discretionary with the Supreme Court. For an excellent short discussion of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over state courts, see Bunn, A Brief Survey of the Jurisdiction and Practice of the Courts of the United States (5th ed. 1949), 237-253.

3. Is Justice Story correct in saying that the power of removal before trial or judgment is an exercise of appellate jurisdiction? On this point note the language of Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court in Railway Co. v. Whitton's Admr., 13 Wall. 270, 287, 20 L. ed. 571 (1871): "We may doubt, with counsel, whether such removal before issue or trial can properly be called an exercise of appellate jurisdiction. It may, we think, more properly be regarded as an indirect mode by which the federal court acquires original jurisdiction of the causes. But it is not material whether the reasoning of the distinguished jurist [Justice Story] in this particular is correct or otherwise. The validity of such legislation has been uniformly recognized by this court since the passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789."

4. In Gordon v. United States, 117 U. S. 697 (appendix) 700, 76 L. ed. 1347 (1865) Mr. Chief Justice Taney said: "The reason for giving such unusual power to a judicial tribunal is obvious. It was necessary to give it from the complex character of the Government of the United States, which is in part National and in part Federal: where two separate governments exercise certain powers of sovereignty over the same territory, each independent of the other within its appropriate sphere of action, and where there was, therefore, an absolute necessity, in order to preserve internal tranquility, that there should be some tribunal to decide between the government of the United States and the government of a State whenever any controversy should arise as to their relative and respective powers in the common territory. The Supreme Court was created for that purpose, and to insure its impartiality it was absolutely necessary to make it independent of the legislative power, and the influence direct or indirect of Congress and the Executive. Hence the care with which its jurisdiction, powers and duties are defined in the Constitution, and its independence of the legislative branch of the government secured. * * * To the same effect is Mr. Justice Holmes' much quoted assertion: "I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperilled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several states." Holmes, Collected Legal Papers (1921), 295.

5. In order to avoid the possibility of further friction with the Virginia Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court, instead of issuing a second mandate to that court, issued its process directly to the state District Court in which the suit had been originally instituted. 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), 450. In two other cases similar action was taken, owing to the failure of the highest tribunal of the state to comply with a mandate: Tyler v. Magwire, 17 Wall. 253, 21 L. ed. 576 (1873) and Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248, 26 L. ed. 135 (1880). Generally, state courts have complied with Supreme Court mandates; see, however, Note, State Court Evasion of United States Supreme Court Mandates, 56 Yale L. J. 574 (1947).

6. Interesting sidelights on the principal case are given in 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), 442-453 and 4 Beveridge, The Life of John Marshall (1919), 144 et seq. Since it sustained the constitutionality of section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 and established the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review the judgments of state courts where questions involving the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States have been finally decided by those courts and the federal right denied, Mr. Justice Story's opinion has been aptly characterized by Warren as "the keystone of the whole arch of federal judicial power."

7. In Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257 (1821), decided five years after Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, the constitutionality of section 25 of the Judiciary Act was again sustained. Cohens was prosecuted by the State of Virginia for selling a lottery ticket in Virginia contrary to a state statute which forbade sale within its limits of lottery tickets other than in lotteries authorized by the State. Cohens pleaded that the ticket sold by him was one in "the national lottery" conducted by the City of Washington under a power given to it by act of Congress. The prosecution contended (1) that the jurisdiction of the court was excluded by the character of the parties, since the State was a party defendant on the writ of error and the suit was thus in effect a suit against a state, prohibited by the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution; (2) that the court's appellate jurisdiction did not extend to the judgment of a state court; and (3) that the act of Congress, if construed to authorize the sale of lottery tickets in a state whose law forbade such sale, exceeded the power of Congress under the Constitution and therefore no law of the United States had been violated by the judgment.

Speaking for the court, Chief Justice Marshall denied the contention that the suit was one against a state and held that upon these issues there was a case "arising under" the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore it was within the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review the judgment of conviction against Cohens rendered by the state court. "A case in law or equity," said Marshall, "consists of the right of the one party, as well as of the other, and may truly be said to arise under the Constitution or a law of the United States, whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of either." On the question as to whether the appeal constituted a suit against a state, Marshall said that "the defendant who removes a judgment rendered against him by a state court into this court, for the purpose of re-examining the question, whether that judgment be a violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, does not commence or prosecute a suit against the state, whatever may be its opinion, where the effect of the writ may be to restore the party to the possession of a thing which he demands."

Having sustained the court's jurisdiction on the writ of error, Marshall decided the case on the merits in favor of the State, holding that Congress did not intend to authorize the sale of the lottery tickets in Virginia, even if it had the power to do so.

This decision, supplementing that in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, firmly established the Supreme Court of the United States as the final arbiter in all justiciable questions of constitutionality relative to the Constitution of the United States. The case caused much public discussion and subjected the Court to vigorous attack. ## FLETCHER v. PECK.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1810.

6 Cranch 87, 3 L. ed. 162.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, in an action of covenant brought by Fletcher against Peck. * * *

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The suit was instituted on several covenants contained in a deed made by John Peck, the defendant in error, conveying to Robert Fletcher, the plaintiff in error, certain lands which were part of a large purchase made by James Gunn and others, in the year 1795, from the State of Georgia, the contract for which was made in the form of a bill passed by the legislature of that state.

The first count in the declaration set forth a breach in the second covenant contained in the deed. The covenant is, "that the legislature of the State of Georgia, at the time of passing the Act of sale aforesaid, had good right to sell and dispose of the same in manner pointed out by the said Act." The breach assigned is, that the legislature had no power to sell.

The plea in bar sets forth the constitution of the State of Georgia, and avers that the lands sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, were within that state. It then sets forth the granting Act, and avers the power of the legislature to sell and dispose of the premises as pointed out by the act.

To this plea the plaintiff below demurred, and the defendant joined in demurrer.

That the legislature of Georgia, unless restrained by its own constitution, possesses the power of disposing of the unappropriated lands within its own limits, in such manner as its own judgment shall dictate, is a proposition not to be controverted. The only question, then, presented by this demurrer, for the consideration of the court, is this, did the then constitution of the State of Georgia prohibit the legislature to dispose of the lands, which were the subject of this contract, in the manner stipulated by the contract?

The question, whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution, is, at all times, a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative, in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station, could it be unmindful of the solemn obligations which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other.

In this case the court can perceive no such opposition. * * *

The third covenant is, that all the title which the State of Georgia ever had in the premises had been legally conveyed to John Peck, the grantor.

The second count assigns, in substance, as a breach of this covenant, that the original grantees from the State of Georgia promised and assured divers members of the legislature, then sitting in general assembly, that if the said members would assent to, and vote for, the passing of the Act, and if the said bill should pass, such members should have a share of, and be interested in, all the lands purchased from the said state by virtue of such law. And that divers of the said members, to whom the said promises were made, were unduly influenced thereby, and, under such influence, did vote for the passing of the said bill; by reason whereof the said law was a nullity, &c. and so the title of the State of Georgia did not pass to the said Peck, &c. * * *

That corruption should find its way into the governments of our infant republics, and contaminate the very source of legislation, or that impure motives should contribute to the passage of a law, or the formation of a legislative contract, are circumstances most deeply to be deplored. How far a court of justice would, in any case, be competent, on proceedings instituted by the state itself, to vacate a contract thus formed, and to annul rights acquired under that contract, by third persons having no notice of the improper means by which it was obtained, is a question which the court would approach with much circumspection. It may well be doubted how far the validity of a law depends upon the motives of its framers and how far the particular inducements, operating on members of the supreme sovereign power of a state, to the formation of a contract by that power, are examinable in a court of justice. If the principle be conceded, that an act of the supreme sovereign power might be declared null by a court, in consequence of the means which procured it, still would there be much difficulty in saying to what extent those means must be applied to produce this effect. Must it be direct corruption, or would interest or undue influence of any kind be sufficient? Must the vitiating cause operate on a majority, or on what number of the members? Would the act be null, whatever might be the wish of the nation, or would its obligation or nullity depend upon the public sentiment? * * *

This solemn question cannot be brought thus collaterally and incidentally before the court. It would be indecent in the extreme, upon a private contract between two individuals, to enter into an inquiry respecting the corruption of the sovereign power of a state. If the title be plainly deduced from a legislative act, which the legislature might constitutionally pass, if the act be clothed with all the requisite forms of a law, a court, sitting as a court of law, cannot sustain a suit brought by one individual against another founded on the allegation that the act is a nullity, in consequence of the impure motives which influenced certain members of the legislature which passed the law.

The Circuit Court, therefore, did right in overruling this demurrer.

The fourth covenant in the deed is, that the title to the premises has been in no way constitutionally or legally impaired by virtue of any subsequent act of any subsequent legislature of the State of Georgia.

The third count recites the undue means practised on certain members of the legislature, as stated in the second count, and then alleges that, in consequence of these practices and of other causes, a subsequent legislature passed an act annulling and rescinding the law under which the conveyance to the original grantees was made, declaring that conveyance void, and asserting the title of the state to the lands it contained. The court proceeds to recite at large this rescinding act, and concludes with averring that, by reason of this act, the title of the said Peck in the premises was constitutionally and legally impaired, and rendered null and void. * * * [The Court held that this rescinding Act could not operate (at least not against Peck, who was a purchaser for value without notice of the fraud practiced in procuring the original grant), without violating the prohibition of the United States Constitution that, "no state shall * * * pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts," Article I, Section 10. That it is the function of a federal court to refuse effect to a state statute in these circumstances is not reasoned about unless it be in the following passages:] She [Georgia] is a part of a large empire; she is a member of the American union; and that union has a Constitution the supremacy of which all acknowledge, and which imposes limits to the legislatures of the several states, which none claim a right to pass. * * *

Whatever respect might have been felt for the state sovereignties, it is not to be disguised that the framers of the Constitution viewed, with some apprehension, the violent acts which might grow out of the feelings of the moment; and that the people of the United States, in adopting that instrument, have manifested a determination to shield themselves and their property from the effects of those sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed. The restrictions on the legislative power of the states are obviously founded in this sentiment; and the Constitution of the United States contains what may be deemed a bill of rights for the people of each state.

No state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.

A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or may do both.

In this form the power of the legislature over the lives and fortunes of individuals is expressly restrained. * * *

[The reasons for holding that the rescinding act conflicted with Article I, Section 10, are considered in a later chapter.]

NOTES

1. Fletcher v. Peck was the first case in which the Supreme Court held the law of a state to be unconstitutional, although inferior federal courts had previously done so. While the suit involved legislation which had been the subject of bitter controversy and violent attack for more than fifteen years in the State of Georgia and in the Congress, it is to be noted that the State itself made no attack on the statute but that it was invalidated in a private action by one individual against another. For the great contemporary significance of the decision, see 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), 392-399; 3 Beveridge, The Life of John Marshall (1919), ch. 10. Warren points out that the decision "fell with a stunning shock upon the State-Rights politicians and enhanced their hostility towards the judicial power" but thinks that "if the Court had acceded to the contention that a state statute could be invalidated by a Federal tribunal, on allegations of fraud or bribery in its passage, a wide door would have been opened for the attack upon State legislation in countless instances in subsequent years."

2. The student should consider the phenomenon of an inferior federal court or the Supreme Court passing upon the validity of a state statute relative to the state's Constitution. (That issue alone will not give a federal court jurisdiction, but it may have jurisdiction of the case because of the character of the parties or because there is a "federal question" in the case.) It is assumed in the principal case that even without express grant it is a function of every court in all circumstances to refuse application to a statute in conflict with a constitution under which it is enacted? Compare with this part of the principal case those which have come to the Supreme Court through writs of error, appeal or certiorari to judgments of state courts of last resort where, for instance, the validity of a statute has been put in issue on a claim that it violated both state and national Constitutions. If the state court of last resort has held that the statute does not violate the state Constitution, the Supreme Court of the United States will not consider that question.

Does it help to say that in several situations a federal court is substituted in the place of a state court to decide an issue in which the law of a state is the whole or a part of the law of the case? Suppose the law of New York is the proper law in a case pending in an English court and a New York statute is proved applicable but challenged by the contention that it conflicts either with the Constitution of New York or that of the United States, though no American court has yet passed on that question. Will the English court consider it?

3. There is some doubt as to the adversary character of Fletcher v. Peck. In his separate opinion Mr. Justice Johnson said: "I have been very unwilling to proceed to the decision of this cause at all. It appears to me to bear strong evidence, upon the face of it, of being a mere feigned case. It is our duty to decide on the rights, but not on the speculations of parties. My confidence, however, in the respectable gentlemen who have been engaged for the parties, has induced me to abandon my scruples in the belief that they would never consent to impose a mere feigned case upon this court."

PEOPLE v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

Supreme Court of Colorado, 1921.

70 Colo. 90, 198 Pac. 146, 15 A. L. R. 326.

In this cause an information was filed in the trial court against the defendants, charging them with a violation of chapter 5, Session Laws of 1911, known as "The Anti-Coercion Act," in that as a condition to the continued employment of one Holson they required of him a contract that he sever his connection with the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America, and upon his refusal to comply, discharge him. To this information defendants demurred on the ground that "the Anti-Coercion Act" was unconstitutional under the Bill of Rights of the State of Colorado and the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. To the consideration of this issue the people objected on the ground that such consideration was prohibited by amended sec. 1, art. VI, of the state Constitution.

The objection was overruled, "the Anti-Coercion Act" held in conflict with the federal Constitution, and final judgment entered discharging defendants and releasing their bondsmen. To review that judgment the people bring this cause here. * * *

BURKE, J., after stating the facts as above.

Three questions are here presented: The right of the trial court to hear and determine the federal constitutional question; the correctness of its judgment; and the date when our decision becomes effective.

That this [Anti-Coercion] act is a plain violation of the federal Constitution has been clearly determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1. In that case a decision of the supreme court of Kansas was reversed, and a statute of that state, in all material particulars identical with the one here under consideration, was declared a violation of the "due process" clause of the United States Constitution. Having determined that this cause was correctly decided below, it may be said that the constitutionality of the "Anti-Coercion Act" has now, at least, been passed upon by a court having jurisdiction, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the objection of the people to the hearing on the demurrer. If so the same situation would be presented had we held the act constitutional. Since the passage of the amendment to sec. 1, art. VI, we have assumed the correctness of that rule. However, there has arisen such a disparity of opinion in our trial courts concerning their power to determine constitutional questions, and such a resulting confusion among members of the bar concerning the practice, that it now becomes our imperative duty, under sec. 2, art. VI, of our state Constitution, which vests in the supreme court "a general superintending control over all inferior courts," to construe sec. 1, art. VI, with reference to the power of such courts where federal constitutional questions are involved.

The jurisdiction of the district court in the premises, prior to January 22, 1913, is undisputed, and is too well settled in this country to admit of argument or require the citation of authority. On that date (if ever) said section 1 became effective. It specifies the courts in which the judicial power of the state shall be vested, and then provides:

"None of said courts except the Supreme Court shall have any power to declare or adjudicate any law of this state or any city charter or amendment thereto adopted by the people in cities acting under Article XX hereof as in violation of the constitution of this state or of the United States." * * * ["Provided that before such decision [of the Supreme Court] shall be binding it shall be subject to approval or disapproval by the people. * * * All such laws or parts thereof submitted as herein provided when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon at such election shall be and become the law of this state notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court." So likewise any city or county charter or amendment thereto held invalid by the Supreme Court was to be submitted to the voters of such city or county and if approved by a majority of the voters it was to be valid notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court.]

Paragraph 2, art. VI, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." * * *

It is said that, notwithstanding the provision of the federal Constitution, above cited, the trial judge was precluded by amended sec. 1 of article VI of the state Constitution from passing upon the question raised by the demurrer. The answer is that the trial judge was bound by the mandate of the federal Constitution to apply that instrument upon all proper occasions and to hold it to be the supreme law of the land "anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It is said that the judge's oath to support the Constitution of Colorado bound him to give effect to that clause thereof prohibiting him from declaring a legislative act contrary to the federal Constitution. The answer is that any section of the state constitution which is contrary to the federal Constitution is, for that reason and to that extent, null and void. It is no part of the state constitution, and no legerdemain of logic can cover it with the sanctity of a judge's oath.

The reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, is as applicable to a state constitutional provision which violates the federal Constitution as it is to a federal statute which violates that instrument; and his reasoning from the standpoint of the judicial oath as unanswerable here as there. It follows that the trial court in the instant case had the right, and it was its bounden duty, to determine the federal constitutional question raised by the demurrer.

There is no sovereignty in a state to set at naught the Constitution of the Union, and no power in its people to command their courts to do so. That issue was finally settled at Appomattox. When a federal constitutional question is raised in any of the trial courts of Colorado the right is given, and the duty is imposed upon those courts, by that instrument itself, to adjudicate and determine it. That right so given can neither be taken away nor that duty abrogated by the state of Colorado, by constitutional provision or otherwise, and any attempt to do so is null and void. Such pretended constitutional inhibition is no part of the Constitution of the state of Colorado, and the judge's oath binding him to the support and enforcement of that instrument has no relation to such void provisions. The question may be brought by writ of error to this court for review, and from our judgment the cause may be taken for final determination to the Supreme Court of the United States itself. It cannot be reviewed by popular vote of the citizens of Colorado, or one of its municipalities, and any pretended constitutional provision of this state, assuming to provide such method of review is null and void. * * *

It is to be observed that the validity of said amended sec. 1, art. VI, so far as it prohibits trial courts from holding statutes and city charters to be in violation of the state Constitution, and assumes to provide a method of recalling decisions of the supreme court so holding, is not herein determined. * * * The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE SCOTT not participating.

NOTES

1. In People v. Max, 70 Colo. 100, 198 Pac. 150 (1921), decided the same day, the Supreme Court of Colorado held that the amendments to the state Constitution considered in the principal case were void also in their attempt to take away the previous power of state trial courts to pass upon the validity of state statutes relative to the state Constitution.

2. States have sometimes attempted to regulate the exercise of judicial review by their own courts by constitutional provisions requiring an extraordinary majority of the judges to agree on the unconstitutionality of a statute in order to invalidate it. In Ohio ex rel. Bryant v. Akron Metropolitan Park District, 281 U. S. 74, 74 L. ed. 710, 50 Sup. Ct. 228, 66 A. L. R. 1460 (1930) the Supreme Court of the United States held that no provision of the federal Constitution prevented a state from making such an experiment. But Chief Justice Hughes pointed out that Congress had made appropriate provision for the hearing and determination by the Supreme Court of any case where a question of federal right had been passed upon by the highest court of the state in which a decision could be had. He said that "it is not for this Court to intervene to protect the citizens of the state from the consequences of its policy, if the state has not disregarded the requirements of the federal Constitution." Cf. De Witt v. State ex rel. Crabbe, 108 Ohio St. 513, 141 N. E. 551 (1923), and Wilson v. Fargo, 48 N. Dak. 447, 186 N. W. 263 (1921). See also, Note, 18 Cal. L. Rev. 439 (1930).

3. State law and practice govern the jurisdiction of state courts to pass upon and determine issues of federal right. In Central Union Telephone Co. v. Edwardsville, 269 U. S. 190, 70 L. ed. 229, 46 Sup. Ct. 90 (1925) Chief Justice Taft took occasion to reaffirm the court's statement in an earlier case: "Without any doubt it rests with each State to prescribe the jurisdiction of its appellate courts, the mode and time of invoking that jurisdiction, and the rules of practice to be applied in its exercise; and the state law and practice in this regard are no less applicable when Federal rights are in controversy than when the case turns entirely upon questions of local or general law."

4. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, 50 U. S. C. App. Supp. II, § 901 et seq., F. C. A. 50 Appx. § 901 et seq., limited judicial review of the constitutionality of any provision of the Act or of any order of the Administrator thereunder to a federal Emergency Court of Appeals and to the Supreme Court of the United States, but vested in state courts concurrent jurisdiction in civil enforcement suits brought by the Administrator. In sustaining the statute, the Supreme Court, in Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U. S. 503, 88 L. ed. 892, 64 Sup. Ct. 641 (1944), pointed out that the controversy arose under the Constitution and laws of the United States and that the authority of Congress (under Art. III, § 2 of the Constitution) to withhold all jurisdiction from state courts, if it saw fit, obviously included the power to restrict the occasions when that jurisdiction might be exercised.

5. It should be noted in passing that Coppage v. Kansas, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States relied upon by the Supreme Court of Colorado in the principal case to support its view that the Colorado Anti-Coercion Act (a statute outlawing so-called "yellow dog" employment contracts) violated the federal Constitution, is no longer followed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Such a statute would now be held valid under the federal Constitution. Phelps Dodge Corporation v. National Labor Relations Board, 313 U. S. 177, 85 L. ed. 1271, 61 Sup. Ct. 845, 133 A. L. R. 1217 (1941); Lincoln Federal Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., 335 U. S. 525, 93 L. ed. 212, 69 Sup. Ct. 251, 6 A. L. R. (2d) 473 (1949).

Section 2.—When, How and by Whom the Power May be Invoked.

EX PARTE McCARDLE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1869.

7 Wall. 506, 19 L. ed. 264.

Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Mississippi.

The case was this: The Constitution of the United States [Article III] ordains as follows:

"§ 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

"§ 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," &c.

And in these last cases the Constitution ordains that,

"The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make."

With these constitutional provisions in existence, Congress, on the 5th of February, 1867, by "An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789," provided that the several courts of the United States, and the several justices and judges of such courts, within their respective jurisdiction, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, should have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States. And that, from the final decision of any judge, justice, or court inferior to the Circuit Court, appeal might be taken to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district in which the cause was heard, and from the judgment of the said Circuit Court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

This statute being in force, one McCardle, alleging unlawful restraint by military force, preferred a petition in the court below, for the writ of habeas corpus.

The writ was issued, and a return was made by the military commander, admitting the restraint, but denying that it was unlawful.

It appeared that the petitioner was not in the military service of the United States, but was held in custody by military authority for trial before a military commission, upon charges founded upon the publication of articles alleged to be incendiary and libellous, in a newspaper of which he was editor. The custody was alleged to be under the authority of certain acts of Congress.

Upon the hearing, the petitioner was remanded to the military custody; but, upon his prayer, an appeal was allowed him to this Court, and upon filing the usual appeal-bond, for costs, he was admitted to bail upon recognizance, with sureties, conditioned for his future appearance in the Circuit Court, to abide by and perform the final judgment of this Court. The appeal was taken under the above-mentioned act of February 5, 1867.

A motion to dismiss this appeal was made at the last term, and, after argument, was denied. Ex parte McCardle, 6 Wall. 318.

Subsequently, on the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 9th March, the case was argued very thoroughly and ably upon the merits, and was taken under advisement. While it was thus held, and before conference in regard to the decision proper to be made, an act was passed by Congress, returned with objections by the President, and, on the 27th of March, repassed by the constitutional majority, the second section of which was as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That so much of the act approved February 5, 1867, entitled 'An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789,' as authorized an appeal from the judgment of the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by said Supreme Court, on appeals which have been, or may hereafter be taken, be, and the same is hereby repealed." * * *

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The first question necessarily is that of jurisdiction; for, if the act of March, 1868, takes away the jurisdiction defined by the act of February, 1867, it is useless, if not improper, to enter into any discussion of other questions.

It is quite true, as was argued by the counsel for the petitioner, that the appellate jurisdiction of this Court is not derived from acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make."

It is unnecessary to consider whether, if Congress had made no exceptions and no regulations, this Court might not have exercised general appellate jurisdiction under rules prescribed by itself. For among the earliest acts of the first Congress, at its first session, was the act of September 24th, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States. That act provided for the organization of this Court, and prescribed regulations for the exercise of its jurisdiction.

The source of that jurisdiction, and the limitation of it by the Constitution and by statute, have been on several occasions subjects of consideration here. In the case of Durousseau v. The United States, 6 Cranch 312, particularly, the whole matter was carefully examined, and the Court held, that while "the appellate powers of this Court are not given by the judicial act, but are given by the Constitution," they are, nevertheless, "limited and regulated by that act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject." The Court said, further, that the judicial act was an exercise of the power given by the Constitution to Congress "of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court." "They have described affirmatively," said the Court, "its jurisdiction, and this affirmative description has been understood to imply a negation of the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it."

The principle that the affirmation of appellate jurisdiction implies the negation of all such jurisdiction not affirmed having been thus established, it was an almost necessary consequence that acts of Congress, providing for the exercise of jurisdiction, should come to be spoken of as acts granting jurisdiction, and not as acts making exceptions to the constitutional grant of it.

The exception to appellate jurisdiction in the case before us, however, is not an inference from the affirmation of other appellate jurisdiction. It is made in terms. The provision of the act of 1867, affirming the appellate jurisdiction of this Court in cases of habeas corpus is expressly repealed. It is hardly possible to imagine a plainer instance of positive exception.

We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this Court is given by express words.

What, then, is the effect of the repealing act upon the case before us? We cannot doubt as to this. Without jurisdiction the Court cannot proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the Court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause. And this is not less clear upon authority than upon principle.

Several cases were cited by the counsel for the petitioner in support of the position that jurisdiction of this case is not affected by the repealing act. But none of them, in our judgment, afford any support to it. They are all cases of the exercise of judicial power by the legislature, or of legislative interference with courts in the exercising of continuing jurisdiction.

On the other hand, the general rule, supported by the best elementary writers, is, that "when an act of the legislature is repealed it must be considered, except as to transactions past and closed, as if it never existed." And the effect of repealing acts upon suits under acts repealed, has been determined by the adjudications of this Court. The subject was fully considered in Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 429, and more recently in Insurance Company v. Ritchie, 5 Wall. 541. In both of these cases it was held that no judgment could be rendered in a suit after the repeal of the act under which it was brought and prosecuted.

It is quite clear, therefore, that this Court cannot proceed to pronounce judgment in this case, for it has no longer jurisdiction of the appeal; and judicial duty is not less fitly performed by declining ungranted jurisdiction than in exercising firmly that which the Constitution and the laws confer.

Counsel seem to have supposed, if effect be given to the repealing act in question, that the whole appellate power of the Court, in cases of habeas corpus, is denied. But this is an error. The act of 1868 does not except from that jurisdiction any cases but appeals from Circuit Courts under the act of 1867. It does not affect the jurisdiction which was previously exercised.

The appeal of the petitioner in this case must be Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

NOTES

1. The Constitution (Art. III, § 2, cl. 2) provides: "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Thus, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is subject to the regulatory control of Congress and may be cut down or even abolished altogether, as the principal case recognizes. But the court's original jurisdiction, being conferred directly by the Constitution, does not depend on any statute of Congress and may not be enlarged (Marbury v. Madison) or diminished by legislation. However, it is not exclusive; that is, Congress may vest original concurrent jurisdiction in other federal courts to hear and determine cases of the type mentioned in the Constitution, and to a limited extent has done so. See Bunn, A Brief Survey of the Jurisdiction and Practice of the Courts of the United States (5th ed. 1949), 219-225; Martig, Congress and the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, 34 Mich. L. Rev. 650 (1936); Hart, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 Harv. L. Rev. 1362 (1953).

2. The Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. §§ 1252, 1253; F. C. A. 28 §§ 1252, 1253) provides for direct appeals to the Supreme Court from the decisions of federal district courts which invalidate acts of Congress, or which grant or deny interlocutory or permanent injunctions in proceedings required to be heard and determined by district courts of three judges. Note also section 1254, providing for review in the Supreme Court of cases in the courts of appeals (1) by certiorari, upon the petition of any party in a civil or criminal case, before or after rendition of judgment; (2) by appeal where a state statute relied on is held invalid as repugnant to the federal Constitution, treaties or laws; and (3) by certification by a court of appeals of questions of law in any civil or criminal case, where such instructions are desired.

WHITNEY v. CALIFORNIA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1927.
274 U. S. 357, 71 L. ed. 1095, 47 Sup. Ct. 641.

MR. JUSTICE SANFORD delivered the opinion of the Court.

By a criminal information filed in the superior court of Alameda county, California, the plaintiff in error was charged, in five counts, with violations of the Criminal Syndicalism Act of that state. Statutes 1919, chap. 188, p. 281. She was tried, convicted on the first count, and sentenced to imprisonment. The judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal. 57 Cal. App. 449, 207 Pac. 698. Her petition to have the case heard by the Supreme Court was denied. Id. 453. And the case was brought here on a writ of error which was allowed by the presiding justice of the Court of Appeal, the highest court of the state in which a decision could be had. Judicial Code, § 237.

On the first hearing in this Court, the writ of error was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 269 U. S. 530. Thereafter, a petition for rehearing was granted (269 U. S. 538), and the case was again heard and reargued both as to the jurisdiction and the merits. * * *

It has long been settled that this Court acquires no jurisdiction to review the judgment of a state court of last resort on a writ of error, unless it affirmatively appears on the face of the record that a federal question constituting an appropriate ground for such review was presented in and expressly or necessarily decided by such state court. Crowell v. Randell, 10 Pet. 368, 392; Railroad Co. v. Rock, 4 Wall. 177, 180; California Powder Works v. Davis, 151 U. S. 389, 393; Cincinnati, etc., Railway v. Slade, 216 U. S. 78, 83; Hiawassee Power Co. v. Carolina-Tenn. Co., 252 U. S. 341, 343; New York v. Kleinert, 268 U. S. 646, 650.

Here the record does not show that the defendant raised or that the State courts considered or decided any federal question whatever, excepting as appears in an order made and entered by the Court of Appeal after it had decided the case and the writ of error had issued and been returned to this Court. A certified copy of that order, brought here as an addition to the record, shows that it was made and entered pursuant to a stipulation of the parties, approved by the court, and that it contains the following statement:

"The question whether the California Criminal Syndicalism Act * * * and its application in this case is repugnant to the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, and that all persons shall be accorded the equal protection of the laws, was considered and passed upon by this Court."

In Cincinnati Packet Co. v. Bay, 200 U. S. 179, 182, where it appeared that a federal question had been presented in a petition in error to the State Supreme Court in a case in which the judgment was affirmed without opinion, it was held that the certificate of that court to the effect that it had considered and necessarily decided this question, was sufficient to show its existence. And see Marvin v. Trout, 199 U. S. 212, 217, et seq.; Consolidated Turnpike v. Norfolk, etc., Railway, 228 U. S. 596, 599.

So—while the unusual course here taken to show that federal questions were raised and decided below is not to be commended—we shall give effect to the order of the Court of Appeal as would be done if the statement had been made in the opinion of that court when delivered. * * *

And here, since it appears from the statement in the order of the Court of Appeal that the question whether the Syndicalism Act and its application in this case was repugnant to the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, was considered and passed upon by that court—this being a Federal question constituting an appropriate ground for a review of the judgment—we conclude that this Court has acquired jurisdiction under the writ of error. The order dismissing the writ for want of jurisdiction will accordingly be set aside.

We proceed to the determination, upon the merits, of the constitutional question considered and passed upon by the Court of Appeal. Of course our review is to be confined to that question, since it does not appear, either from the order of the Court of Appeal or from the record otherwise, that any other Federal question was presented in and either expressly or necessarily decided by that court. National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 353, 363; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. 532, 557; Dewey v. Des Moines, 173 U. S. 193, 200; Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co. v. Illinois, 175 U. S. 626, 633; Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio, 183 U. S. 238, 248; Haire v. Rice, 204 U. S. 291, 301; Selover, Bates & Co. v. Walsh, 226 U. S. 112, 126; Missouri Pacific Railway v. Coal Co., 256 U. S. 134, 135. It is not enough that there may be somewhere hidden in the record a question which, if it had been raised, would have been of a federal nature. Dewey v. Des Moines, supra, 199; Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co. v. Illinois, supra, 634. And this necessarily excludes from our consideration a question sought to be raised for the first time by the assignments of error here—not presented in or passed upon by the Court of Appeal—whether apart from the constitutionality of the Syndicalism Act, the judgment of the Superior Court, by reason of the rulings of that court on questions of pleading, evidence and the like, operated as a denial to the defendant of due process of law. See Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648, 660; Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio, supra, 248; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 234 U. S. 123, 134; Bass, etc., Ltd. v. Tax Commission, 266 U. S. 271, 283. * * *

[The Court found no repugnancy in the Syndicalism Act, as applied in the case, to either the due process or equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment and affirmed the judgment of the district court of appeal.]

NOTES

1. Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States to review decisions of state courts, under 28 U. S. C. § 1257; F. C. A. 28 § 1257, depends wholly on the character of the case (i. e., the presence of a federal question) and the reasons for the judgment of the state court (i. e., the highest court of the state in which a decision could be had). Neither citizenship of the parties nor the amount involved is material. As previously noted, the Supreme Court may not review a state decision on a question of state law. The decision of a state's court of last resort is final as regards a question of the law of that state.

Also, under § 1257, the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review a state decision only if the federal question asserted as the basis for review was "specially set up or claimed," or "drawn in question." The record must reveal that the federal question was present in the case in the state court, and was presented to the state court for its determination. The opinion in Whitney v. California brings out this requirement clearly. A good recent discussion of the statutory provision is in Wilson v. Cook, 327 U. S. 474, 480, 90 L. ed. 793, 66 Sup. Ct. 663 (1946), where Mr. Chief Justice Stone said: "The purpose of this requirement is to restrict our mandatory jurisdiction on appeal * * * and to make certain that no judgment of a state court will be reviewed on appeal by this Court unless the highest court of the state has first been apprised that a state statute is being assailed as invalid on federal grounds, * * * or, when the statute as applied, is so assailed, until it has opportunity authoritatively to construe it. * * * This jurisdictional requirement is satisfied only if the record shows that the question of the validity under federal law of the state statute, as construed and applied, has either been presented for decision to the highest court of the state, * * * or has in fact been decided by it, * * * and that its decision was necessary to the judgment. * * *"

A recent case in which the rule under discussion was apparently departed from is Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U. S. 1, 93 L. ed. 1131, 69 Sup. Ct. 894 (1949), where there were four dissents on the point. "For the first time in the course of the 130 years in which State prosecutions have come here for review," said Mr. Justice Frankfurter in dissent, "this Court is today reversing a sentence imposed by a State court on a ground that was urged neither here nor below and that was explicitly disclaimed on behalf of the petitioner at the bar of this Court."

2. The Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. § 2103; F. C. A. § 2103) provides that if a party takes an appeal where there is only certiorari jurisdiction, the appeal papers are to be regarded and acted on as a petition for certiorari and as if duly presented to the Supreme Court at the time the appeal was taken. In Charleston Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Alderson, 324 U. S. 182, 89 L. ed. 857, 65 Sup. Ct. 624 (1945), which came to the Supreme Court on appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, appellants had attacked a tax assessment in the state courts as in violation of the State Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. In the state county court appellants had not drawn in question the validity of any statute but had alleged only that the assessment contravened the Fourteenth Amendment. In their petition for appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia appellants had contended only that the assessment denied to them the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. In an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Stone, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal, but, treating the papers on which the appeal had been allowed as a petition for certiorari, granted that writ and decided the case on its merits, since appellants had properly raised the federal question as to the validity of the assessment under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court pointed out that while the opinion of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals intimated that appellants' objection was made to the administration of the statute, it nowhere indicated that they contended that, as applied, the statute was invalid as repugnant to the federal Constitution. And in their assignment of errors in the Supreme Court of the United States, appellants again failed to attack the statute explicitly as in violation of the Constitution. The court stated that even where the federal question has been properly raised below, an appeal may be dismissed where appellants fail to attack a statute explicitly in their assignment of errors.

SILER v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1909.
213 U. S. 175, 53 L. ed. 753, 29 Sup. Ct. 451.

[The railroad company brought suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the eastern district of Kentucky to enjoin enforcement against it of an order of the Railroad Commission of Kentucky made under the supposed authority of a Kentucky statute of March 10, 1900, alleging that the statute and order violated several specified provisions of the national Constitution. The Circuit Court held that the statute and order violated section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, and granted the injunction prayed for. The Commission took this appeal.]

MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellants deny the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in this case. There is no diverse citizenship in the case of this particular company, and the jurisdiction must depend upon the presence of a federal question. The bill filed by the company herein attacked the validity of the act of the legislature of Kentucky of March 10, 1900, on several grounds, as in violation of § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * * Other grounds of alleged invalidity of the act in question, as in violation of the Federal Constitution, are set up in the bill. The bill also contained the averment that the order of the railroad commission of Kentucky, in making a general schedule of maximum rates for the railroads mentioned in its order, was invalid, as unauthorized by the statute. This is, of course, a local or state question.

The Federal questions, as to the invalidity of the state statute because, as alleged, it was in violation of the Federal Constitution, gave the Circuit Court jurisdiction, and, having properly obtained it, that court had the right to decide all the questions in the case, even though it decided the Federal questions adversely to the party raising them, or even if it omitted to decide them at all, but decided the case on local or state questions only.

This court has the same right, and can, if it deem it proper, decide the local questions only, and omit to decide the Federal questions, or decide them adversely to the party claiming their benefit. * * * Of course, the Federal question must not be merely colorable or fraudulently set up for the mere purpose of endeavoring to give the Court jurisdiction. Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Austin, 168 U. S. 685, 695; Michigan Railroad Tax Cases, 138 Fed. Rep. 223, supra.

The character of some of the Federal questions raised is such as to show that they are not merely colorable, and have not been fraudulently raised for the purpose of attempting to give jurisdiction to a Federal court. * * *

Where a case in this court can be decided without reference to questions arising under the Federal Constitution, that course is usually pursued and is not departed from without important reasons. In this case we think it much better to decide it with regard to the question of a local nature, involving the construction of the state statute and the authority therein given to the commission to make the order in question, rather than to unnecessarily decide the various constitutional questions appearing in the record.

The commission has assumed the power under this statute of making what are termed general maximum rates for the transportation of all commodities upon all railroads to and from all points within the State, and this company is included in the general order made by the commission. This is an enormous power. Jurisdiction so extensive and comprehensive as must exist in a commission in the making of rates by one general tariff upon all classes of commodities upon all the railroads throughout the State is not to be implied. The proper establishment of reasonable rates upon all commodities carried by railroads, and relating to each and all of them within the State depends upon so many facts which may be very different in regard to each road, that it is plain the work ought not to be attempted without a profound and painstaking investigation, which could not be intelligently or with discrimination accomplished by wholesale. * * * The power is not to be taken by implication; it must be given by language which admits of no other reasonable construction.

In this case we are without the benefit of a construction of the statute by the highest state court of Kentucky, and we must proceed in the absence of state adjudication upon the subject. Nevertheless, we are compelled to the belief that the statute does not grant to the commission any such great and extensive power as it has assumed to exercise in making the order in question. [The opinion proceeds to state the Court's reasons for this conclusion.]

We are of opinion that under the statute the commission had no authority to make a general tariff of rates, and the final decree of the Circuit Court is for that reason.

Affirmed.

NOTES

1. "The Court will not pass upon a constitutional question although properly presented by the record, if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed of. This rule has found most varied application. Thus, if a case can be decided on either of two grounds, one involving a constitutional question, the other a question of statutory construction or general law, the Court will decide only the latter. Siler v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 213 U. S. 175, 191; Light v. United States, 220 U. S. 523, 538." Mr. Justice Brandeis, concurring in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U. S. 288, 347, 80 L. ed. 688, 711, 56 Sup. Ct. 466 (1936).

2. The rule that a statute will be construed, wherever possible, to avoid constitutional issues was applied in United States v. Rumely, 345 U. S. 41, 97 L. ed. 770, 73 Sup. Ct. 543 (1953). Defendant had been convicted of contempt of the Select Committee on Lobbying Activities of the House of Representatives for refusing to give certain evidence pertaining to the activities of the Committee for Constitutional Government, of which he was secretary. The court held that the resolution defining the House Committee's powers had not conferred upon it the authority to inquire into the matters involved, thus avoiding determination of the constitutional issue raised under the First Amendment.

ENTERPRISE IRRIGATION DISTRICT v. FARMERS MUTUAL CANAL CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1917.

Appeal by writ of error from the Supreme Court of Nebraska.

[This was a suit begun in a Nebraska court to determine the relative rights of the two parties to divert water from a river for irrigation purposes. The issue turned on the validity of the claim of the canal company to certain priorities which it claimed had been adjudicated to it by the State Board of Irrigation acting under a statute which authorized the Board to adjudicate such claims. The plaintiff below pleaded that the Board's adjudication was void, alleging that the Board had proceeded without adequate notice to adverse parties and without allowing them a reasonable opportunity to be heard, in violation of the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The canal company contested this contention, and in addition pleaded that in reliance upon the Board's decision, and its right to the priorities claimed, it had in good faith expended about a million dollars in completing its canal and diverting works and that the plaintiff with knowledge of this expenditure and construction work had remained silent for a period of four years while the work was going on, and was therefore estopped from challenging the validity of the canal company's claims. The Supreme Court of Nebraska, reversing the trial court, gave judgment for the canal company. The plaintiff appealed by writ of error to the United States Supreme Court, assigning the errors stated in the following opinion.]

Concisely stated, the assignments of error complain that the Supreme Court infringed the due process and equal protection provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, first, by giving decisive effect to the state board's decision, instead of holding that it was made without lawful notice or opportunity to be heard and therefore was void, and, second, by misconceiving or misapplying the statute and common law of the State in disposing of other questions.

Our jurisdiction is disputed and must be considered, as, indeed, it should be, even if not challenged. As has been shown, several questions were presented to the Supreme Court and all were considered. One was whether the state board's decision could be given any conclusive effect consistently with the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, and another was whether the defense of estoppel in pais was well grounded. The first was plainly a federal question and the other as plainly non-federal. Both were resolved in favor of the canal company. The other questions, none of which was federal, may be put out of view in this connection. Thus we are concerned with a judgment placed upon two grounds, one involving a federal question and the other not. In such situations our jurisdiction is tested by inquiring whether the non-federal ground is independent of the other and broad enough to sustain the judgment. Where this is the case, the judgment does not depend upon the decision of any federal question and we have no power to disturb it. Hammond v. Johnston, 142 U. S. 73, 78; Eustis v. Bolles, 150 U. S. 361; Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45, 53; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 212 U. S. 112, 116; Gaar, Scott & Co. v. Shannon, 223 U. S. 468; Southern Pacific Co. v. Schuyler, 227 U. S. 601, 610. It has been so held in cases where the judgment was rested upon a federal ground and also upon an estoppel. Pierce v. Somerset Ry., 171 U. S. 641, 648; Lowry v. Silver City Gold & Silver Mining Co., 179 U. S.

196. But where the non-federal ground is so interwoven with the other as not to be an independent matter, or is not of sufficient breadth to sustain the judgment without any decision of the other, our jurisdiction is plain. See Moran v. Horsky, 178 U. S. 205, 208; Creswill v. Knights of Pythias, 225 U. S. 246, 261. And this is true also where the non-federal ground is so certainly unfounded that it properly may be regarded as essentially arbitrary or a mere device to prevent a review of the decision upon the federal question. Leathe v. Thomas, 207 U. S. 93, 99; Vandalia R. R. Co. v. South Bend, ibid., 359, 367. But, where the non-federal ground has fair support, we are not at liberty to inquire whether it is right or wrong, but must accept it, as we do other state decisions of non-federal questions. Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 590, 635; Eustis v. Bolles, supra, p. 369; Leathe v. Thomas, supra; Arkansas Southern R. R. Co. v. German National Bank, 207 U. S. 270, 275.

It does not, as we think, admit of doubt that the estoppel in pais is made an independent ground of the judgment. Instead of being interwoven with the validity of the state board's adjudication, which is the other ground, it is distinct from it, and is so treated in the court's opinion. * * *

In view of the facts before recited we think it cannot be said that the ruling upon the question of estoppel is without fair support or so unfounded as to be essentially arbitrary or merely a device to prevent a review of the other ground of the judgment. We therefore are not at liberty to inquire whether the ruling is right or wrong. And it may be well to add that the question did not originate with the court. It was presented by the pleadings, was in the minds of the parties when the stipulation was made, and was dealt with by counsel and court as a matter of obvious importance.

It is not urged, nor could it well be, that as a ground of decision the estoppel is not broad enough to sustain the judgment. * * *

The questions presented, other than those relating to the validity of the state board's adjudication, all turned exclusively upon the law of the state, and the state court's decision of them is controlling. * * *

It results from what has been said that the judgment is one which is not open to review by this court.

Writ of error dismissed.

NOTES

1. A comprehensive earlier statement of the rule applied in the reported case (i. e., that if the judgment of the state court rests on state grounds adequate to support it, it is not reviewable by the Supreme Court) is in Klinger v. Missouri, 13 Wall. 257, 263, 20 L. ed. 635 (1872), where Mr. Justice Bradley said: "Where it appears by the record that the judgment of the state court might have been based either upon a law which would raise a question of repugnancy to the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, or upon some other independent ground, and it appears that the court did, in fact, base its judgment on such independent ground, and not on the law raising the federal question, this court will not take jurisdiction of the case, even though it might think the position of the state court an unsound one. But where it does not appear on which of the two grounds the judgment was based, then, if the independent ground upon which it might have been based was a good and valid one, sufficient of itself to sustain the judgment, this court will not assume jurisdiction of the case; but if such independent ground was not a good and valid one, it will be presumed that the state court based its judgment on the law raising the federal question, and this court will then take jurisdiction."

2. In accord with the principal case is New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co., 125 U. S. 18, 31 L. ed. 607, 8 Sup. Ct. 741 (1888).

MINNESOTA v. NATIONAL TEA CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1933 Minnesota enacted a chain store tax (L. 1933, c. 213) one item of which was a tax on gross sales. § 2 (b). The gross sales tax was graduated: one-twentieth of one per cent was applied on that portion of gross sales not in excess of $100,000; and larger percentages were applied as the volume of gross sales increased, until one per cent was exacted on that portion of gross sales in excess of $1,000,000. Respondents (chain stores conducting retail business in Minnesota) paid under protest the gross sales tax demanded by the Minnesota Tax Commission for the years 1933 and 1934 and thereafter sued in the state court for refunds. Judgments granting refunds were affirmed by the Supreme Court of Minnesota, 205 Minn. 443; 286 N. W. 360. We granted certiorari because of the importance of the constitutional issues involved in Stewart Dry Goods Co. v. Lewis, 294 U. S. 550 and Valentine v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 299 U. S. 32, which cases, it was asserted, controlled the decision below.

At the threshold of an inquiry into the applicability of the Stewart and Valentine cases to these facts, we are met with a question which is decisive of the present petition. That is the question of jurisdiction.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota discussed not only the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution but also Art. 9, § 1 of the Minnesota constitution which provides: "Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects * * *" It said that "these provisions of the Federal and State Constitutions impose identical restrictions upon the legislative power of the state in respect to classification for purposes of taxation." It stated that the "question is * * * whether the imposition of a graduated gross sales tax upon all those engaged in conducting chain stores is discriminatory as between such owners, thus violating the constitutional requirement of uniformity." It quoted the conclusion of the lower Minnesota court that the statute violated both the federal and the state constitution. It then adverted briefly to three of its former decisions which had interpreted Art. 9, § 1 of the Minnesota constitution and quoted from one of them. * * *

Respondents contend that the court held the statute invalid for violation not only of the federal constitution but also of the state constitution. Hence they seek to invoke the familiar rule that where a judgment of a state court rests on two grounds, one involving a federal question and the other not, this Court will not take jurisdiction. Fox Film Corp. v. Muller, 296 U. S. 207; Lynch v. New York ex rel. Pierson, 293 U. S. 52; New York City v. Central Savings Bank, 306 U. S. 661. In support of this position they point to the court's discussion of the Minnesota constitution and to the fact that the syllabus states that such a tax is violative of both the Federal and State Constitutions. But as to the latter we are not referred to any Minnesota authority which, as in some states, makes the syllabi the law of the case. And as to the former the opinion is quite inconclusive. For the opinion as a whole leaves the impression that the court probably felt constrained to rule as it did because of the five decisions which it cited and which held such gross sales taxes unconstitutional by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment. That is at least the meaning, if the words used are taken literally. For if, as stated by the court, the "precise question here presented" was ruled by those five cases, that question was a federal one. And in that connection it is perhaps significant that the court stated not only that it "should follow" those decisions but that "it is our duty so to do."

Enough has been said to demonstrate that there is considerable uncertainty as to the precise grounds for the decision. That is sufficient reason for us to decline at this time to review the federal question asserted to be present, Honeyman v. Hanan, 300 U. S. 14, consistently with the policy of not passing upon questions of a constitutional nature which are not clearly necessary to a decision of the case.

But that does not mean that we should dismiss the petition. This Court has frequently held that in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction it has the power not only to correct errors of law in the judgment under review but also to make such disposition of the case as justice requires. State Tax Commission v. Van Cott, 306 U. S. 511; Patterson v. Alabama, 294 U. S. 600. That principle has been applied to cases coming from state courts where supervening changes had occurred since entry of the judgment, where the record failed adequately to state the facts underlying a decision of the federal question, and where the grounds of the state decision were obscure. Honeyman v. Hanan, supra, and cases there cited. That principle was also applied in State Tax Commission v. Van Cott, supra, where it was said p. 514:

"* * * if the state court did in fact intend alternatively to base its decision upon the state statute and upon an immunity it thought granted by the Constitution as interpreted by this Court, these two grounds are so interwoven that we are unable to conclude that the judgment rests upon an independent interpretation of the state law."

The procedure in those cases was to vacate the judgment and to remand the cause for further proceedings, so that the federal question might be dissected out or the state and federal questions clearly separated.

In this type of case we deem it essential that this procedure be followed. It is possible that the state court employed the decisions under the federal constitution merely as persuasive authorities for its independent interpretation of the state constitution. If that were true, we would have no jurisdiction to review. State Tax Commission v. Van Cott, supra. On the other hand we cannot be content with a dismissal of the petition where there is strong indication, as here, that the federal constitution as judicially construed controlled the decision below. * * *

It is important that this Court not indulge in needless dissertations on constitutional law. It is fundamental that state courts be left free and unfettered by us in interpreting their state constitutions. But it is equally important that ambiguous or obscure adjudications by state courts do not stand as barriers to a determination by this Court of the validity under the federal constitution of state action. Intelligent exercise of our appellate powers compels us to ask for the elimination of the obscurities and ambiguities from the opinions in such cases. Only then can we ascertain whether or not our jurisdiction to review should be invoked. Only by that procedure can the responsibility for striking down or upholding state legislation be fairly placed. * * *

For these reasons we vacate the judgment of the Supreme Court of Minnesota and remand the cause to that court for further proceedings.

Judgment vacated.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS took no part in the decision of this case.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES, dissenting:

I think that sound principle governing the exercise of our jurisdiction requires the dismissal of the writ. I see no reason to doubt that the Supreme Court of Minnesota held that the tax in question was laid in violation of the uniformity clause of the State Constitution. Not only is that shown, as it seems to me, from the court's discussion of that question, but it conclusively appears from the syllabus which definitely states that the tax is "violative of art. 9, § 1, of our state constitution." 205 Minn. 443; 286 N. W. 360. Minnesota requires that in all cases decided by the Supreme Court it shall give its decision in writing, "together with headnotes, briefly stating the points decided." Mason's Minn. Stat., § 134. In obedience to the statute, the court has thus given explicitly in its syllabus its own deliberate construction of what it has decided.

The decision thus rested upon an adequate non-federal ground and in accordance with long-established doctrine we are without jurisdiction. Fox Film Corp. v. Muller, 296 U. S. 207, 210. * * *

The fact that provisions of the state and federal constitutions may be similar or even identical does not justify us in disturbing a judgment of a state court which adequately rests upon its application of the provision of its own constitution. That the state court may be influenced by the reasoning of our opinions makes no difference. The state court may be persuaded by majority opinions in this Court or it may prefer the reasoning of dissenting judges, but the judgment of the state court upon the application of its own constitution remains a judgment which we are without jurisdiction to review. Whether in this case we thought that the state tax was repugnant to the federal constitution or consistent with it, the judgment of the state court that the tax violated the state constitution would still stand. It cannot be supposed that the Supreme Court of Minnesota is not fully conscious of its independent authority to construe the constitution of the state, whatever reasons it may adduce in so doing. * * *

MR. JUSTICE STONE and MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS join in this opinion.

NOTES

1. On the remand of this case the Supreme Court of Minnesota affirmed its judgment and rested its decision squarely on the state Constitution. National Tea Co. v. State, 208 Minn. 607, 294 N. W. 230 (1940).

2. In accord with the reported case is Standard Oil Co. v. Johnson, 316 U. S. 481, 86 L. ed. 1611, 62 Sup. Ct. 1168 (1942). In Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U. S. 117, 89 L. ed. 789, 65 Sup. Ct. 459 (1945), a case similar to Minnesota v. National Tea Co., the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the case to the state court, continued the case on its docket pending application to the state court for amendment of its decision or a certificate to show whether that court intended to rest its decision on an independent state ground or whether decision of the federal question was necessary to the judgment. Upon receipt of clarification from the state court basing its decision on the federal question, the Supreme Court decided the issue. The delay involved in the use of this procedural device was less than three months.

The procedure used in Herb v. Pitcairn was followed with less satisfactory results, however, in Dixon v. Duffy, 344 U. S. 143, 97 L. ed. 153, 73 Sup. Ct. 193 (1952). Here petitioner, after continuance of the case on the docket of the Supreme Court, was unable to obtain a determination by the Supreme Court of California as to whether the judgment sought to be reviewed had been based on adequate independent state grounds, as that court felt it was without power, for want of jurisdiction, to issue any further order therein. The Supreme Court (Mr. Justice Jackson dissenting) thereupon vacated the judgment and remanded the cause for further proceedings, saying: "A new judgment may be entered, and petitioner also may be informed by an official determination from the Supreme Court of California whether or not that judgment rests on an adequate state ground."

In Lynch v. New York ex rel. Pierson, 293 U. S. 52, 79 L. ed. 191, 55 Sup. Ct. 16 (1934), certain provisions of the New York income tax law, as construed by the State Tax Commission, were alleged to violate both the federal and state

Constitutions. The Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court, in annulling the determination of the Tax Commission, cited decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States under the Fourteenth Amendment but did not state that its decision rested upon the application of the federal Constitution. The Court of Appeals, the highest court of the state, affirmed without opinion. The Supreme Court refused to review, stating, through Mr. Chief Justice Hughes: "Jurisdiction cannot be founded upon surmise. Nor can claim of jurisdiction be sustained by reference to briefs and statements which are not part of the record. * * * Where the judgment of the state court rests on two grounds, one involving a federal question and the other not, or if it does not appear upon which of two grounds the judgment was based, and the ground independent of a federal question is sufficient in itself to sustain it, this Court will not take jurisdiction."

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF TEXAS v. PULLMAN CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1941.
312 U. S. 496, 85 L. ed. 971, 61 Sup. Ct. 643.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

In those sections of Texas where the local passenger traffic is slight, trains carry but one sleeping car. These trains, unlike trains having two or more sleepers, are without a Pullman conductor; the sleeper is in charge of a porter who is subject to the train conductor's control. As is well known, porters on Pullmans are colored and conductors are white. Addressing itself to this situation, the Texas Railroad Commission after due hearing ordered that "no sleeping car shall be operated on any line of railroad in the State of Texas * * * unless such cars are continuously in the charge of an employee * * * having the rank and position of Pullman conductor." Thereupon, the Pullman Company and the railroads affected brought this action in a federal district court to enjoin the Commission's order. Pullman porters were permitted to intervene as complainants, and Pullman conductors entered the litigation in support of the order. Three judges having been convened, Judicial Code, § 266, as amended, 28 U. S. C. § 380, the court enjoined enforcement of the order. From this decree, the case came here directly. Judicial Code, § 238, as amended, 28 U. S. C. § 345.

The Pullman Company and the railroads assailed the order as unauthorized by Texas law as well as violative of the Equal Protection, the Due Process and the Commerce Clauses of the Constitution. The intervening porters adopted these objections but mainly objected to the order as a discrimination against Negroes in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The complaint of the Pullman porters undoubtedly tendered a substantial constitutional issue. It is more than substantial. It touches a sensitive area of social policy upon which the federal courts ought not to enter unless no alternative to its adjudication is open. Such constitutional adjudication plainly can be avoided if a definitive ruling on the state issue would terminate the controversy. It is therefore our duty to turn to a consideration of questions under Texas law.

The Commission found justification for its order in a Texas statute * * *. It is common ground that if the order is within the Commission's authority its subject matter must be included in the Commission's power to prevent "unjust discrimination * * * and to prevent any and all other abuses" in the conduct of railroads. Whether arrangements pertaining to the staffs of Pullman cars are covered by the Texas concept of "discrimination" is far from clear. What practices of the railroads may be deemed to be "abuses" subject to the Commission's correction is equally doubtful. Reading the Texas statutes and the Texas decisions as outsiders without special competence in Texas law, we would have little confidence in our independent judgment regarding the application of that law to the present situation. The lower court did deny that the Texas statute sustained the Commission's assertion of power. And this represents the view of an able and experienced circuit judge of the circuit which includes Texas and of two capable district judges trained in Texas law. Had we or they no choice in the matter but to decide what is the law of the state, we should hesitate long before rejecting their forecast of Texas law. But no matter how seasoned the judgment of the district court may be, it cannot escape being a forecast rather than a determination. The last word on the meaning of Article 6445 of the Texas Civil Statutes, and therefore the last word on the statutory authority of the Railroad Commission in this case, belongs neither to us nor to the district court but to the supreme court of Texas. In this situation a federal court of equity is asked to decide an issue by making a tentative answer which may be displaced tomorrow by a state adjudication. Glenn v. Field Packing Co., 290 U. S. 177; Lee v. Bickell, 292 U. S. 415. The reign of law is hardly promoted if an unnecessary ruling of a federal court is thus supplanted by a controlling decision of a state court. The resources of equity are equal to an adjustment that will avoid the waste of a tentative decision as well as the friction of a premature constitutional adjudication.

An appeal to the chancellor, as we had occasion to recall only the other day, is an appeal to the "exercise of the sound discretion, which guides the determination of courts of equity." Beal v. Missouri Pacific R. Corp., 312 U. S. 45. The history of equity jurisdiction is the history of regard for public consequences in employing the extraordinary remedy of the injunction. There have been as many and as variegated applications of this supple principle as the situations that have brought it into play. * * *

Regard for these important considerations of policy in the administration of federal equity jurisdiction is decisive here. If there was no warrant in state law for the Commission's assumption of authority there is an end of the litigation; the constitutional issue does not arise.

The law of Texas appears to furnish easy and ample means for determining the Commission's authority. Article 6453 of the Texas Civil Statutes gives a review of such an order in the state courts. Or, if there are difficulties in the way of this procedure of which we have not been apprised, the issue of state law may be settled by appropriate action on the part of the state to enforce obedience to the order. Beal v. Missouri P. R. Corp., supra; Article 6476, Texas Civil Statutes. In the absence of any showing that these obvious methods for securing a definitive ruling in the state courts cannot be pursued with full protection of the constitutional claim, the district court should exercise its wise discretion by staying its hands. Compare Thompson v. Magnolia Co., 309 U. S. 478.

We therefore remand the cause to the district court, with directions to retain the bill pending a determination of proceedings, to be brought with reasonable promptness, in the state court in conformity with this opinion. Compare Atlas Ins. Co. v. W. I. Southern, Inc., 306 U. S. 563, 573, and cases cited.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE

1. In Spector Motor Service v. McLaughlin, 323 U. S. 101, 89 L. ed. 101, 65 Sup. Ct. 152 (1944) the judgment of the circuit court of appeals was vacated and the cause remanded to the district court with directions to retain the bill pending the determination of proceedings to be brought "with reasonable promptitude in the state court in conformity with this opinion." The court said, through Mr. Justice Frankfurter: "If there is one doctrine more deeply rooted than any other in the process of constitutional adjudication, it is that we ought not to pass on questions of constitutionality—here the distribution of the taxing power as between the State and the Nation—unless such adjudication is unavoidable. And so, as questions of federal constitutional power have become more and more intertwined with preliminary doubts about local law, we have insisted that federal courts do not decide questions of constitutionality on the basis of preliminary guesses regarding local law." The doctrine of the principal case was also followed in Chicago v. Fieldcrest Dairies, 316 U. S. 168, 86 L. ed. 1355, 62 Sup. Ct. 986 (1942). The rule does not apply, however, where no adequate state remedy is available to which the complainant can resort on the remand of the cause. Hillsborough Township v. Cromwell, 326 U. S. 620, 90 L. ed. 358, 66 Sup. Ct. 445 (1946).

HERNDON v. GEORGIA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1935.
295 U. S. 441, 79 L. ed. 1530, 55 Sup. Ct. 794.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant was sentenced to a term of imprisonment upon conviction by a jury in a Georgia court of first instance of an attempt to incite insurrection by endeavoring to induce others to join in combined resistance to the authority of the state to be accomplished by acts of violence, in violation of § 56 of the Penal Code of Georgia. The supreme court of the state affirmed the judgment. 178 Ga. 832, 174 S. E. 597, rehearing denied, 179 Ga. 597, 176 S. E. 620. On this appeal, the statute is assailed as contravening the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in certain designated particulars. We find it unnecessary to review the points made, since this court is without jurisdiction for the reason that no federal question was seasonably raised in the court below or passed upon by that court.

It is true that there was a preliminary attack upon the indictment in the trial court on the ground, among others, that the statute was in violation "of the Constitution of the United States," and that this contention was overruled. But, in addition to the insufficiency of the specification, the adverse action of the trial court was not preserved by exceptions pendente lite or assigned as error in due time in the bill of exceptions, as the settled rules of the state practice require. In that situation, the state Supreme Court declined to review any of the rulings of the trial court in respect of that and other preliminary issues; and this determination of the state court is conclusive here.

The federal question was never properly presented to the state supreme court unless upon motion for rehearing; and that court then refused to consider it. The long-established general rule is that the attempt to raise a federal question after judgment, upon a petition for rehearing, comes too late, unless the court actually entertains the question and decides it. * * *

Petitioner, however, contends that the present case falls within an exception to the rule—namely, that the question respecting the validity of the statute as applied by the lower court first arose from its unanticipated act in giving to the statute a new construction which threatened rights under the Constitution. There is no doubt that the federal claim was timely if the ruling of the state court could not have been anticipated and a petition for rehearing presented the first opportunity for raising it. * * * The whole point, therefore, is whether the ruling here assailed should have been anticipated.

The trial court instructed the jury that the evidence would not be sufficient to convict the defendant if it did not indicate that his advocacy would be acted upon immediately; and that—"In order to convict the defendant, * * * it would appear clearly by the evidence that immediate serious violence against the State of Georgia was to be expected or was advocated." Petitioner urges that the question presented to the state Supreme Court was whether the evidence made out a violation of the statute as thus construed by the trial court, while the supreme court construed the statute (178 Ga., p. 855) as not requiring that an insurrection should follow instantly or at any given time, but that "it would be sufficient that he [the defendant] intended it to happen at any time, as a result of his influence, by those whom he sought to incite," and upon that construction determined the sufficiency of the evidence against the defendant. If that were all, the petitioner's contention that the federal question was raised at the earliest opportunity well might be sustained; but it is not all.

The verdict of the jury was returned on January 18, 1933, and judgment immediately followed. On July 5, 1933, the trial court overruled a motion for new trial. The original opinion was handed down and the judgment of the state supreme court entered May 24, 1934, the case having been in that court since the preceding July.

On March 18, 1933, several months prior to the action of the trial court on the motion for new trial, the state supreme court had decided Carr v. State, 176 Ga. 747, 169 S. E. 201. In that case § 56 of the Penal Code, under which it arose, was challenged as contravening the Fourteenth Amendment. The court in substance construed the statute as it did in the present case. In the course of the opinion it said (p. 750):

"It [the state] can not reasonably be required to defer the adoption of measures for its own peace and safety until the revolutionary utterances lead to actual disturbances of the public peace or imminent and immediate danger of its own destruction; but it may, in the exercise of its judgment, suppress the threatened danger in its incipency. * * * Manifestly, the legislature has authority to forbid the advocacy of a doctrine designed and intended to overthrow the government without waiting until there is a present and imminent danger of the success of the plan advocated. If the State were compelled to wait until the apprehended danger became certain, then its right to protect itself would come into being simultaneously with the overthrow of the government, when there would be neither prosecuting officers nor courts for the enforcement of the law."

The language contained in the subquotation is taken from People v. Lloyd, 304 Ill. 23, 35, 136 N. E. 505, and is quoted with approval by this court in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U. S. 652, 669.

In the present case, following the language quoted at an earlier point in this opinion to the effect that it was sufficient if the defendant intended an insurrection to follow at any time, etc., the court below, in its original opinion (178 Ga. 855) added—"It was the intention of this law to arrest at its incipency any effort to overthrow the State government, where it takes the form of an actual attempt to incite others to insurrection." The phrase "at any time" is not found in the foregoing excerpt from the Carr Case, but it is there in effect, when the phrase is given the meaning disclosed by the context, as that meaning is pointed out by the court below in its opinion denying the motion for a rehearing (179 Ga. 600), when it said that the phrase was necessarily intended to mean within a reasonable time—"that is, within such time as one's persuasion or other adopted means might reasonably be expected to be directly operative in causing an insurrection."

Appellant, of course, cannot plead ignorance of the ruling in the Carr Case, and was therefore bound to anticipate the probability of a similar ruling in his own case, and preserve his right to a review here by appropriate action upon the original hearing in the court below. It follows that his contention that he raised the federal question at the first opportunity is without substance, and the appeal must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Dismissed.

[MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO dissented in an opinion which MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS and MR. JUSTICE STONE joined. In their view the "protection of the Constitution was seasonably invoked," since the "settled doctrine is that when a constitutional privilege or immunity has been denied for the first time by a ruling made upon appeal, a litigant thus surprised may challenge the unexpected ruling by a motion for rehearing, and the challenge will be timely."]

NOTES

1. After commitment to serve his sentence, Herndon petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus in the state court, alleging the unconstitutionality of the Georgia statute under the Fourteenth Amendment. In the new proceeding the state courts recognized that issues of constitutional right under the federal Constitution were properly raised, and in Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242, 81 L. ed. 1066, 57 Sup. Ct. 732 (1937), the Supreme Court took jurisdiction and reversed the judgment of conviction on the ground that the statute was "so vague and indeterminate" as to prescribe "no reasonably ascertainable standard of guilt" and thus violated the guarantees of liberty embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment.

2. Where the decision of the highest court of the state places a construction upon a statute which is at variance with that formerly adopted by it, and this could not have been anticipated, the petition for rehearing then affords the first opportunity to present a federal question raised by such decision and it is raised in time to sustain the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Brinkerhoff-Paris Trust & Savings Co. v. Hill, 281 U. S. 673, 74 L. ed. 1107, 50 Sup. Ct. 451 (1930); Missouri ex rel. Missouri Insurance Co. v. Gehner, 281 U. S. 313, 74 L. ed. 870, 50 Sup. Ct. 326 (1930). Generally, however, a federal question first presented in a petition for rehearing to the highest court of the state, after a final decision of that court, and there denied without opinion, is raised too late. American Surety Co. v. Baldwin, 287 U. S. 156, 77 L. ed. 231, 53 Sup. Ct. 98, 77 A. L. R. 298 (1932). Cf. Great Northern Railway Co. v. Sunburst Oil & Refining Co., 287 U. S. 358, 77 L. ed. 360, 53 Sup. Ct. 145, 85 A. L. R. 254 (1932).

CENTRAL UNION TELEPHONE CO. v. EDWARDSVILLE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1925.
269 U. S. 190, 70 L. ed. 229, 46 Sup. Ct. 90.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the Court.

The City of Edwardsville, in July, 1882, by ordinance granted to the Central Union Telephone Company a right in its streets to erect and maintain the necessary poles and wires for the operation of a telephone system. The Central Telephone Company transferred its rights to the Central Union Telephone Company. Later the city council adopted a resolution requesting the Central Union Telephone Company to furnish to the city, free of charge, one telephone and such additional telephones as the city council might call for at a reduction of 25 per cent from the regular rates, and the right to attach, without charge, fire and police alarm wires to the top cross arm of each pole. The company filed its acceptance of this resolution as provided in the resolution. It maintains 1,000 poles in the City of Edwardsville. The city in 1914 passed an ordinance which in effect imposes a tax of 50 cents a pole upon every person, firm or corporation owning, controlling or occupying any such poles in the streets of Edwardsville. The city brought suit for the amount due under the tax law at 50 cents a pole. A jury was waived, and after a hearing the court entered judgment for $3,000 against the company. The circuit court held that neither the ordinance by which the Central Telephone Company was permitted to occupy the streets, nor the subsequent resolution accepted by the Central Union Telephone Company constituted a contract and that the tax law was not therefore a violation of the Constitution of the United States in impairing a contract, or in depriving the company of property without due process of law. Upon this record an appeal was taken to the appellate court of the state for the fourth circuit. That court transferred the case to the supreme court of Illinois, on the ground that the appellate court had no jurisdiction of it. Edwardsville v. Central U. Teleph. Co., 302 Ill. 362, 134 N. E. 716. The supreme court held that as the appeal had been taken to the appellate court and errors assigned which that court had jurisdiction to hear, the case was improperly transferred to the supreme court, and remanded it to the appellate court, which gave judgment affirming the circuit court. The plaintiff then obtained a certiorari from the supreme court to review the decision of the appellate court, and in that hearing the supreme court declined to hear the constitutional questions on the ground that they had been waived by the failure to carry the case from the circuit court directly to the supreme court to review those questions.

"Par. 89. Appeal from trial court to appellate court—From trial court to supreme court. Sec. 88. Appeals from and writs of error to circuit courts, the superior court of Cook county, the criminal court of Cook county, county courts and city courts in all criminal cases, below the grade of felony, shall be taken directly to the appellate court, and in all criminal cases above the grade of misdemeanors, and cases in which a franchise or freehold or the validity of a statute or construction of the Constitution is involved; and in all cases relating to revenue, or in which the State is interested as a party or otherwise, shall be taken directly to the supreme court."

The construction of this statute has been uniformly held to be that where a question involves the Constitution, it must be taken on error or appeal to the supreme court, and that if it be taken to the appellate court on other grounds, the party taking the appeal or suing out the writ of error shall be held to have waived the constitutional questions. * * * The city, therefore, moves to dismiss the writ of error.

It is objected on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the words "validity of a statute or construction of the Constitution" refers to the Constitution of Illinois and not to the Federal Constitution. The supreme court of Illinois has held otherwise in this case. 309 Ill. 482-484, 141 N. E. 206.

But counsel for plaintiff in error insist that it is for this court to determine finally whether a litigant in a state court has waived his Federal right—citing Davis v. O'Hara, 266 U. S. 314; Davis v. Wechsler, 263 U. S. 22; American R. Exp. Co. v. Levee, 263 U. S. 19; Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312; Union P. R. Co. v. Public Serv. Commission, 248 U. S. 67. But there is nothing in these cases which justifies this court in ignoring or setting aside a required form of practice under the appellate statutes of the state by which Federal constitutional rights, as well as state constitutional rights, may be asserted in the supreme court of the state or be held to be waived, if the practice gives to the litigant a reasonable opportunity to have the issue as to the claimed right heard and determined by that court. We said in John v. Paullin, 231 U. S. 583, 588: "Without any doubt it rests with each state to prescribe the jurisdiction of its appellate courts, the mode and time of invoking that jurisdiction, and the rules of practice to be applied in its exercise; and the state law and practice in this regard are no less applicable when Federal rights are in controversy than when the case turns entirely upon questions of local or general law," and many cases are there cited.

It seems to us that the practice under the statute of Illinois above quoted is entirely fair. If the litigant has a constitutional question, Federal or state, he may take the case directly to the supreme court and have that question decided, together with all the other questions in the case, and then if the Federal constitutional question is decided against him, he may bring it here by writ of error or application for certiorari. If he elects to take his case to the appellate court, he may have the nonconstitutional questions considered and decided, but he gives up the right to raise constitutional objections in any court. There is some complaint that counsel could not infer that the constitutional questions referred to in the statute were Federal questions, because the supreme court of Illinois had not so decided before this case. We have not been able to determine from the Illinois decision cited above whether any of the constitutional questions held to be waived therein were Federal until the present case. It is not, however, a forced or strained interpretation to hold that "cases * * * in which the validity of a statute or construction of the Constitution is involved" include validity under, or construction of, both Constitutions. When so declared by the state court it should bind us unless so unfair or unreasonable in its application to those asserting a Federal right as to obstruct it. This is no such case. * * *

The motion to dismiss the writ of error is granted.

NOTES

1. Consider the fact situation presented in Parker v. Illinois, 333 U. S. 571, 92 L. ed. 886, 68 Sup. Ct. 708 (1948). Petitioner, who was engaged in litigation in the Illinois courts, was ordered on a motion for discovery to produce certain documents. He produced them by filing them with the clerk of the Illinois courts. Petitioner was thereupon found guilty of contempt, the court holding that the order required only that petitioner produce the documents, not that he file them in court so as to make them public records; and that his action in so doing, since the documents contained statements deemed to be scurrilous, constituted an obstruction of justice. Petitioner was sentenced to jail for ninety days. He sought writ of error in the Illinois Supreme Court for review of the order. The writ of error was refused and on the same day an amended contempt order was issued to "cure certain defects" in the prior order and to bring it into conformity with the Illinois law. Petitioner then sought relief in the Illinois Appellate Court, where he attacked the order on the ground that it violated the federal Constitution. This court sustained the order on state grounds, refusing to consider the constitutional questions. On writ of error, the Illinois Supreme Court affirmed, refusing also to consider the constitutional questions under the well-settled rule in Illinois that if an appellant takes his case to the Appellate Court where errors are assigned of which that court has jurisdiction, he is deemed to have waived any constitutional questions. On certiorari, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed on the authority of Central Union Telephone Co. v. Edwardsville.

Speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Douglas said that "when petitioner acting through counsel decided to seek review in the Appellate Court he made a choice which involved abandonment of the constitutional issues which he had raised in the proceedings" and that "even though the attempt may have seemed futile, it was only by first seeking review in the Illinois Supreme Court that he could bring to this Court the constitutional questions raised under the amended order." Mr. Justice Rutledge, with the concurrence of Justices Black and Murphy, dissented on the ground that the original order and the amended order were in reality the same order, so that the appellate route taken by petitioner should not have been held to operate as a waiver of his constitutional objections to a commitment which the dissenters characterized as a denial of due process. "Constitutional rights," said the dissenting opinion, "may be nullified quite as readily and completely by hypertechnical procedural obstructions to their effective assertion and maintenance as by outright substantive denial."

2. Power to issue writs of habeas corpus has been conferred upon the federal courts by statute (28 U. S. C. §2241 et seq.) and includes the authority to issue the writ where the petitioner is held in custody by state authority in violation of his rights under the Constitution or laws of the United States. It is well-settled that the exercise of this power is within the sound discretion of the federal courts. The power to interfere with state proceedings, however, is a delicate one and is subject to the general qualification that a federal court should require that the judicial remedies afforded by state courts shall first have been exhausted. In Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U. S. 103, 79 L. ed. 791, 55 Sup. Ct. 340, 98 A. L. R. 406 (1935), application for habeas corpus was denied by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that, although Mooney had prosecuted numerous appeals to the highest court of the State of California, his proper remedy before that court was habeas corpus, and that until he availed himself of that remedy a federal court could not consider his petition. See also, Ex parte Hawk, 321 U. S. 114, 88 L. ed. 572, 64 Sup. Ct. 448 (1944). For an annotation on the exhaustion of judicial remedies afforded by state courts as a condition of issuance of a writ of habeas corpus by a federal court for release of a petitioner held by state authorities, see 88 L. ed. 576.

3. In Young v. Ragen, 337 U. S. 235, 93 L. ed. 1333, 69 Sup. Ct. 1073 (1949), the Supreme Court was "again faced with the recurring problem of determining what, if any, is the appropriate post-trial procedure in Illinois by which claims of infringement of federal rights may be raised." Various persons in custody under judgments of Illinois circuit courts petitioned in these courts for writs of habeas corpus on the ground of denial of due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment. These petitions were denied as "insufficient in law and substance." The Attorney General of the state explained that the denials were based on procedural grounds, i. e., that habeas corpus was not an appropriate remedy for the relief of denials of due process. He contended, however, that certain statements in three opinions of the Illinois Supreme Court handed down subsequent to the denials of the writ strongly indicated that the scope of habeas corpus in Illinois had been broadened and that it would be considered an appropriate remedy if petitions for relief were again presented. However, many circuit courts, whose decisions upon habeas corpus are unreviewable by the state supreme court under Illinois law, had continued to deny habeas corpus on procedural grounds since the new pronouncements. In an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Vinson, the Supreme Court vacated the orders denying the writ and remanded the causes to the state courts for reconsideration of the availability of habeas corpus in the light of the state supreme court's opinions in the later cases. The court stated its position as follows:

"Of course we do not review decisions which rest upon adequate nonfederal grounds, and of course Illinois may choose the procedure it deems appropriate for the vindication of federal rights. * * * But it is not simply a question of state procedure when a state court of last resort closes the door to any consideration of a claim of denial of a federal right. * * * Unless habeas corpus is available, therefore, we are led to believe that Illinois offers no post-trial remedy in cases of this kind. The doctrine of exhaustion of state remedies, to which this Court has required the scrupulous adherence of all federal courts * * * presupposes that some adequate state remedy exists. * * * If there is now no post-trial procedure by which federal rights may be vindicated in Illinois, we wish to be advised of that fact upon remand of this case."

4. The doctrine of exhaustion of judicial remedies is provided for in the Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. § 2254).

MUSKRAT v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1911.

219 U. S. 346, 55 L. ed. 246, 31 Sup. Ct. 250.

[Appeals from the Court of Claims. An Act of Congress authorized Muskrat and others to bring suits in the Court of Claims, with an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to determine the constitutionality of certain congressional legislation altering the terms of certain prior allotments of Cherokee Indian lands. From two such suits in which the validity of the Acts was sustained, these appeals were taken.]

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The first question in these cases, as in others, involves the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain the proceeding, and that depends upon whether the jurisdiction conferred is within the power of Congress, having in view the limitations of the judicial power as established by the Constitution of the United States.

Section 1 of Article III of the Constitution provides:

Section 2 of the same Article provides:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;—to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls;—to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;—to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States;—between a State and citizens of another State;—between citizens of different States;—between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects."

* * * It therefore becomes necessary to inquire what is meant by the judicial power thus conferred by the Constitution upon this court, and with the aid of appropriate legislation upon the inferior courts of the United States. * * *

As we have already seen by the express terms of the Constitution, the exercise of the judicial power is limited to "cases" and "controversies." Beyond this it does not extend, and unless it is asserted in a case or controversy within the meaning of the Constitution, the power to exercise it is nowhere conferred. * * *

The power being thus limited to require an application of the judicial power to cases and controversies, is the act which undertook to authorize the present suits to determine the constitutional validity of certain legislation within the constitutional authority of the court? This inquiry in the case before us includes the broader question, When may this court, in the exercise of the judicial power, pass upon the constitutional validity of an act of Congress? That question has been settled from the early history of the Court, the leading case on the subject being Marbury v. Madison, supra.

In that case Chief Justice Marshall, who spoke for the court, was careful to point out that the right to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional could only be exercised when a proper case between opposing parties was submitted for judicial determination; that there was no general veto power in the court upon the legislation of Congress; and that the authority to declare an act unconstitutional sprung from the requirement that the court, in administering the law and pronouncing judgment between the parties to a case, and choosing between the requirements of the fundamental law established by the people and embodied in the Constitution and an act of the agents of the people, acting under authority of the Constitution, should enforce the Constitution as the supreme law of the land. * * *

See also in this connection Chicago & Grand Trunk Railway Company v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339. On page 345 of the opinion in that case the result of the previous decisions of this court was summarized in these apposite words by Mr. Justice Brewer, who spoke for the court:

"Whenever, in pursuance of an honest and actual antagonistic assertion of rights by one individual against another, there is presented a question involving the validity of any act of any legislature, State or Federal, and the decision necessarily rests on the competency of the legislature to so enact, the court must, in the exercise of its solemn duties, determine whether the act be constitutional or not; but such an exercise of power is the ultimate and supreme function of courts. It is legitimate only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest and vital controversy between individuals. It never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of the legislative act." * * *

It is therefore evident that there is neither more nor less in this procedure than an attempt to provide for a judicial determination, final in this court, of the constitutional validity of an act of Congress. Is such a determination within the judicial power conferred by the Constitution, as the same has been interpreted and defined in the authoritative decisions to which we have referred? We think it is not. That judicial power, as we have seen, is the right to determine actual controversies arising between adverse litigants, duly instituted in courts of proper jurisdiction. The right to declare a law unconstitutional arises because an act of Congress relied upon by one or the other of such parties in determining their rights is in conflict with the fundamental law. The exercise of this, the most important and delicate duty of this court, is not given to it as a body with revisory power over the action of Congress, but because the rights of the litigants in justiciable controversies require the court to choose between the fundamental law and a law purporting to be enacted within constitutional authority, but in fact beyond the power delegated to the legislative branch of the Government. This attempt to obtain a judicial declaration of the validity of the act of Congress is not presented in a "case" or "controversy," to which, under the Constitution of the United States, the judicial power alone extends. It is true the United States is made a defendant to this action, but it has no interest adverse to the claimants. The object is not to assert a property right as against the Government, or to demand compensation for alleged wrongs because of action upon its part. The whole purpose of the law is to determine the constitutional validity of this class of legislation, in a suit not arising between parties concerning a property right necessarily involved in the decision in question, but in a proceeding against the Government in its sovereign capacity, and concerning which the only judgment required is to settle the doubtful character of the legislation in question. Such judgment will not conclude private parties, when actual litigation brings to the court the question of the constitutionality of such legislation. In a legal sense the judgment could not be executed, and amounts in fact to no more than an expression of opinion upon the validity of the acts in question. Confining the jurisdiction of this court within the limitations conferred by the Constitution, which the court has hitherto been careful to observe, and whose boundaries it has refused to transcend, we think the Congress, in the act of March 1, 1907, exceeded the limitations of legislative authority, so far as it required of this court action not judicial in its nature within the meaning of the Constitution. * * *

The questions involved in this proceeding as to the validity of the legislation may arise in suits between individuals, and when they do and are properly brought before this court for consideration they, of course, must be determined in the exercise of its judicial functions. For the reasons we have stated, we are constrained to hold that these actions present no justiciable controversy within the authority of the court, acting within the limitations of the Constitution under which it was created. * * *

The judgments will be reversed and the cases remanded to the Court of Claims, with directions to dismiss the petitions for want of jurisdiction.

NOTES

1. The constitutions of a few states require either the judges of their supreme courts or "the Supreme Court" (Colorado) to give advisory opinions on questions of law, in Massachusetts at the request of "each branch of the legislature, as well as the Governor and Council" (construed not to mean the Governor alone), in New Hampshire similar provision, in Maine at the request of the "Governor, Council, Senate or House of Representatives," in Rhode Island, Colorado and formerly Missouri at the request of the Governor or either house, and in Florida and South Dakota at the request of the Governor. Commonly these questions are as to the validity of legislation or proposed legislation. Such opinions are generally not regarded as binding either upon the legislature or executive advised or upon the judges who give the advice, should the same question come before them in a litigated case. This institution has as a forerunner the practice in England under which the King and the House of Lords, in their legislative capacity, required the opinions of the judges. In the absence of an express requirement in a state Constitution, American judges usually but not invariably have declined to give such opinions, following a precedent set by Chief Justice Jay and the associate justices of the United States Supreme Court in 1793, when President Washington requested their opinion. The function has been regarded as nonjudicial, and where a Constitution makes no provision for its exercise by the courts it has been held generally that a statute is invalid which attempts to impose it upon them. 2. The present status of the Court of Claims is considered in Williams v. United States, 289 U. S. 553, 77 L. ed. 1372, 53 Sup. Ct. 751 (1933), where it is pointed out that the court was created originally by Congress not under Article III of the Constitution but as a special tribunal of an administrative or advisory nature to consider claims for money against the United States. This is a function which belongs primarily to Congress as an incident of its constitutional power to pay the debts of the United States. The court could therefore be required to give advisory opinions. Later legislation converted the Court of Claims into a court, in fact as well as in name, and vested in it jurisdiction over controversies which were susceptible of judicial cognizance. The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is now properly extended by Congress to the judicial decisions of the Court of Claims but not to its legislative or advisory decisions.

The distinction between "constitutional" courts, established under Article III of the Constitution, and "legislative" courts, established under authority given by other provisions of the Constitution, is discussed in O'Donoghue v. United States, 289 U. S. 516, 77 L. ed. 1356, 53 Sup. Ct. 740 (1933). See also, Katz, Federal Legislative Courts, 43 *Harv. L. ## INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION v. BRIMSON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1894.

[The Act of February 4, 1887, establishing the Interstate Commerce Commission provided: "* * * for the purposes of this act the Commission shall have power to require, by subpoena, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

"Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence, may be required from any place in the United States, at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpoena the Commission, or any party to a proceeding before the Commission, may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

"And any of the Circuit Courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such common carrier or other person to appear before said Commission (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding."

Brimson and others having refused to answer questions put to them in an investigation conducted by the Commission, the latter filed in the proper Circuit Court of the United States a bill praying the court to issue an order directing them to answer. The court dismissed the petition and the Commission appealed.]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

Is the twelfth section of the act unconstitutional and void, so far as it authorizes or requires the Circuit Courts of the United States to use their process in aid of inquiries before the Commission? The Court recognizes the importance of this question, and has bestowed upon it the most careful consideration.

As the Constitution extends the judicial power of the United States to all cases in law and equity arising under that instrument or under the laws of the United States, as well as to all controversies to which the United States shall be a party (Art. III, Sec. 2), and as the Circuit

Courts of the United States are capable, under the statutes defining and regulating their jurisdiction, of exerting such power in cases or controversies of that character, within the limits prescribed by Congress, 25 Stat. 434, c. 866, the fundamental inquiry on this appeal is whether the present proceeding is a "case" or "controversy," within the meaning of the Constitution. The Circuit Court, as we have seen, regarded the petition of the Interstate Commerce Commission as nothing more than an application by an administrative body to a judicial tribunal for the exercise of its functions in aid of the execution of duties not of a judicial nature, and accordingly adjudged that this proceeding did not constitute a case or controversy to which the judicial power of the United States could be extended. * * *

What is a case or controversy to which, under the Constitution, the judicial power of the United States extends? * * *

We have before us an act of Congress authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to summon witnesses, and to require the production of books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to the matter under investigation. The constitutionality of this provision—assuming it to be applicable to a matter that may be legally intrusted to an administrative body for investigation—is, we repeat, not disputed, and is beyond dispute. * * * Whether the Commission is entitled to the evidence it seeks, and whether the refusal of the witness to testify or to produce books, papers, etc., in his possession, is or is not in violation of his duty or in derogation of the rights of the United States, seeking to execute a power expressly granted to Congress, are the distinct issues between that body and the witness. They are issues between the United States and those who dispute the validity of an act of Congress and seek to obstruct its enforcement. And these issues, made in the form prescribed by the act of Congress, are so presented that the judicial power is capable of acting on them. * * *

Without the aid of judicial process of some kind, the regulations that Congress may establish in respect to interstate commerce cannot be adequately or efficiently enforced. One mode, as already suggested,—the validity of which is not questioned,—of compelling a witness to testify before the Interstate Commerce Commission to answer questions propounded to him relating to the matter under investigation, and which the law makes it his duty to answer, and to produce books, papers, etc., is to make his refusal to appear and answer, or to produce the documentary evidence called for, an offense against the United States, punishable by fine or imprisonment. A criminal prosecution of the witness under such a statute, it is conceded, would be a case or controversy, within the meaning of the Constitution, of which a court of the United States could take jurisdiction. Another mode would be to proceed by information to recover any penalty imposed by the statute. A proceeding of that character, it is also conceded, would be a case or controversy of which a court of the United States could take cognizance. If, however, Congress, in its wisdom, authorizes the Commission to bring before a court of the United States for determination the issues between it and a witness, that mode of enforcing the act of Congress, and of compelling the witness to perform his duty, is said not to be judicial, and is beyond the power of Congress to prescribe.

We cannot assent to any view of the Constitution that concedes the power of Congress to accomplish a named result indirectly, by particular forms of judicial procedure, but denies its power to accomplish the same result directly, and by a different proceeding judicial in form.

The present proceeding is not merely ancillary and advisory. * * * If it be adjudged that the defendants are, in law, obliged to do what they have refused to do, that determination will not be merely ancillary and advisory, but, in the words of Sanborn's Case, will be a "final and indisputable basis of action," as between the Commission and the defendants, and will furnish a precedent in all similar cases. It will be as much a judgment that may be carried into effect by judicial process as one for money, or for the recovery of property, or a judgment in mandamus commanding the performance of an act or duty which the law requires to be performed, or a judgment prohibiting the doing of something which the law will not sanction. It is none the less the judgment of a judicial tribunal dealing with questions judicial in their nature, and presented in the customary forms of judicial proceedings, because its effect may be to aid an administrative or executive body in the performance of duties legally imposed upon it by Congress in execution of a power granted by the Constitution. * * *

[MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER and JUSTICES BREWER and JACKSON dissented. See 155 U. S. 3.]

1. The power of courts to punish contempts of court—contumacy of witnesses, refusal to obey orders of the court, obstructions of the proceedings of the court, etc.—was invariably held to be inherent in courts of record at common law. There is some divergence of view as to whether the power is inherent in inferior courts not of record, but there is no doubt that the power may be vested by statute in the latter courts. The cases are collected in 8 A. L. R. 1543 (1920); 54 A. L. R. 318 (1928); 73 A. L. R. 1185 (1931). On the nature and scope of the contempt power, see 17 C. J. S., Contempt § 43 et seq. The more usual method adopted in current legislation to enforce the attendance of witnesses and insure their testifying and producing documents before administrative bodies is the device held valid in the reported case.

2. Clyde Wilson Summers complied with all the prerequisites for admission to the Illinois bar except obtaining the certificate of the Committee on Character and Fitness. He filed a petition in the Supreme Court of Illinois, alleging that the certificate was refused solely because he was a conscientious objector to participation in war and that his exclusion from the bar for this reason violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which secured to him protection against state action violative of the principles of the First Amendment. The court did not make a formal decision, but the Chief Justice wrote a letter to Summers stating that "the Court is of the opinion that the report of the Committee on Character and Fitness should be sustained." None of the correspondence with Summers appeared on the records of the court. In their return to a rule to show cause why the record should not be certified to the United States Supreme Court and certiorari granted, the justices of the Illinois Supreme Court stated that under the law of that state the proceeding was not a matter of judicial cognizance and did not constitute a case or controversy under Article III of the federal Constitution but was a mere application for appointment as an officer of the court. The Supreme Court of the United States held, however, that there was a case or controversy under Article III of the Constitution, even though for state purposes the action was nonjudicial. "A claim of a present right to admission to the bar of a state and a denial of that right is a controversy. When the claim is made in a state court and a denial of the right is made by judicial order, it is a case which may be reviewed under Article III of the Constitution when Federal questions are raised and proper steps taken to that end, in this Court." Re Summers, 325 U. S. 561, 89 L. ed. 1795, 65 Sup. Ct. 1307 (1945).

3. The Federal Radio Commission granted an application for a renewal license to the General Electric Company upon terms not acceptable to the licensee. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, to which the company had appealed under section 16 of the Radio Act of 1927, found that the terms of the existing license would better serve the public interest, convenience and necessity and remanded the proceeding to the commission with a direction to carry the court's decision into effect. Granting certiorari on petition of the commission, the Supreme Court of the United States concluded that the proceeding in the Court of Appeals was not a case or controversy under Article III of the Constitution but merely an administrative proceeding, and therefore that the decision therein was not reviewable. "We think it plain from this résumé of the pertinent parts of the act that the powers confided to the commission respecting the granting and renewal of station licenses are purely administrative, and that the provision for appeals to the Court of Appeals does no more than make that court a superior and revising agency in the same field." Federal Radio Commission v. General Electric Co., 281 U. S. 464, 74 L. ed. 969, 50 Sup. Ct. 389 (1930). Congress later amended the statute so as to confine the review by the Court of Appeals to "questions of law" and provided that "findings of fact by the Commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it shall clearly appear that the findings of the Commission are arbitrary or capricious." Jurisdiction was vested in the Supreme Court to review judgments of the Court of Appeals under the act. In a subsequent action to review a decision of the Court of Appeals reversing the Commission's order terminating a license, the Supreme Court held that it had jurisdiction, since the amended procedure had provided for a judicial judgment of the lower court and was in sharp contrast with the previous grant of authority. Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U. S. 266, 77 L. ed. 1166, 53 Sup. Ct. 627, 89 A. L. R. 406 (1933).

4. For a recent case holding that the court below should have dismissed the suit for lack of a case or controversy, see International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union v. Boyd, 347 U. S. 222, 98 L. ed. 650, 74 Sup. Ct. 447 (1954).

NASHVILLE, CHATTANOOGA & ST. LOUIS R. CO.
v. WALLACE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1933.

MR. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant brought suit in the Chancery Court of Davidson County, Tennessee, under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act of that state, c. 29, Tennessee Public Acts, 1923, to secure a judicial declaration that a state excise tax levied on the storage of gasoline, c. 58, Tennessee Public Acts, 1923, as amended by c. 67, Tennessee Public Acts, 1925, is, as applied to appellant, invalid under the commerce clause and the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution. A decree for appellees was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State and the case comes here on appeal under § 237(a) of the Judicial Code.

After the jurisdictional statement required by Rule 12 was submitted, this Court, in ordering the cause set down for argument, invited the attention of counsel to the question "whether a case or controversy is presented in view of the nature of the proceedings in the state court." This preliminary question, which has been elaborately briefed and argued, must first be considered, for the judicial power with which this Court is invested by Art. 3, § 1 of the Constitution, extends by Art. 3, § 2, only to "cases" and "controversies"; if no "case" or "controversy" is presented for decision, we are without power to review the decree of the court below. Muskraat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346.

In determining whether this litigation presents a case within the appellate jurisdiction of this Court, we are concerned, not with form, but with substance. See Fidelity National Bank v. Swope, 274 U. S. 123; compare Gasoline Products Co. v. Champlin Refining Co., 283 U. S. 494, 498. Hence, we look not to the label which the legislature has attached to the procedure followed in the state courts, or to the description of the judgment which is brought here for review, in popular parlance, as "declaratory," but to the nature of the proceeding which the statute authorizes, and the effect of the judgment rendered upon the rights which the appellant asserts.

Section 1 of the Tennessee Declaratory Judgments Act confers jurisdiction on courts of record "to declare rights * * * whether or not further relief is or could be claimed" and provides that "no action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a declaratory judgment or decree is prayed for. The declaration may be either affirmative or negative in form and effect and such declaration shall have the force and effect of a final judgment or decree." By § 2 it is provided that "any person * * * whose rights, status or other legal relations are affected by a statute * * * may have determined any question of construction or validity arising under the * * * statute * * * and obtain a declaration of rights * * * thereunder."

Under § 6, the Court may refuse to render a declaratory judgment where, if rendered, it "would not terminate the uncertainty or controversy giving rise to the proceeding." Declaratory judgments may, in accordance with § 7, be reviewed as are other orders, judgments or decrees, and under § 8 "further relief based on a declaratory judgment or decree may be granted whenever necessary or proper." Section 11 requires that "when declaratory relief is sought all persons shall be made parties who have or claim any interest which would be affected by the declaration, and no declaration shall prejudice the rights of persons not parties to the proceeding."

This statute has often been considered by the highest court of Tennessee, which has consistently held that its provisions may only be invoked when the complainant asserts rights which are challenged by the defendant, and presents for decision an actual controversy to which he is a party, capable of final adjudication by the judgment or decree to be rendered. * * * It has also held that no judgment or decree will be rendered when all the parties who will be adversely affected by it are not before the court. * * *

That the issues thus raised and judicially determined would constitute a case or controversy if raised and decided in a suit brought by the taxpayer to enjoin collection of the tax cannot be questioned. See Risty v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 270 U. S. 378; compare Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510; Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U. S. 365. The proceeding terminating in the decree below, unlike that in South Spring Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Amador Medean Gold Mining Co., 145 U. S. 300; Musk-rat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, was between adverse parties, seeking a determination of their legal rights upon the facts alleged in the bill and admitted by the demurrer. Unlike Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U. S. 126; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 258 U. S. 158; Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 447; New Jersey v. Sargent, 269 U. S. 328, valuable legal rights asserted by the complainant and threatened with imminent invasion by appellees, will be directly affected to a specific and substantial degree by the decision of the question of law; and unlike Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1; Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649; Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118; Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co., 261 U. S. 428; Federal Radio Commission v. General Electric Co., 281 U. S. 464, the question lends itself to judicial determination and is of the kind which this Court traditionally decides. The relief sought is a definitive adjudication of the disputed constitutional right of the appellant, in the circumstances alleged, to be free from the tax, see Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, 279 U. S. 716, 724; and that adjudication is not, as in Gordon v. United States, 2 Wall. 561, and Postum Cereal Co. v. California Fig

Nut Co., 272 U.S. 693, subject to revision by some other and more authoritative agency. Obviously the appellant, whose duty to pay the tax will be determined by the decision of this case, is not attempting to secure an abstract determination by the Court of the validity of a statute, compare Muskrat v. United States, supra, 361; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, supra, 162; or a decision advising what the law would be on an uncertain or hypothetical state of facts, as was thought to be the case in Liberty Warehouse Co. v. Grannis, 273 U.S. 70, and Willing v. Chicago Auditorium Assn., 277 U.S. 274; see also Warehouse Co. v. Tobacco Growers Assn., 276 U.S. 71, 88; compare Arizona v. California, 283 U.S. 423, 463. Thus the narrow question presented for determination is whether the controversy before us, which would be justiciable in this Court if presented in a suit for injunction, is any the less so because through a modified procedure appellant has been permitted to present it in the state courts, without praying for an injunction or alleging that irreparable injury will result from the collection of the tax.

While the ordinary course of judicial procedure results in a judgment requiring an award of process or execution to carry it into effect, such relief is not an indispensable adjunct to the exercise of the judicial function. Fidelity National Bank v. Swope, supra, 132. This Court has often exerted its judicial power to adjudicate boundaries between states, although it gave no injunction or other relief beyond the determination of the legal rights which were the subject of controversy between the parties, Louisiana v. Mississippi, 202 U.S. 1; Arkansas v. Tennessee, 246 U.S. 158; Georgia v. South Carolina, 257 U.S. 516; Oklahoma v. Texas, 272 U.S. 21; Michigan v. Wisconsin, 272 U.S. 398, and to review judgments of the Court of Claims, although no process issues against the Government. United States v. Jones, 119 U.S. 477; compare District of Columbia v. Eslin, 183 U.S. 62; Ex parte Pocono Pines Hotels Co., 285 U.S. 526, reported below in 73 Ct. Cls. 447. As we said in Fidelity National Bank v. Swope, supra, 132, "Naturalization proceedings, Tutun v. United States, 270 U.S. 568; suits to determine a matrimonial or other status; suits for instructions to a trustee or for the construction of a will; Traphagen v. Levy, 45 N. J. Eq. 448, 18 Atl. 222; bills of interpleader so far as the stakeholder is concerned, Wakeman v. Kingsland, 46 N. J. Eq. 113, 18 Atl. 680; bills to quiet title where the plaintiff rests his claim on adverse possession, Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U.S. 533; are familiar examples of judicial proceedings which result in an adjudication of the rights of litigants, although execution is not necessary to carry the judgment into effect, in the sense that damages are required to be paid or acts to be performed by the parties." See also Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, supra, 725; La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, 175 U.S. 423.

The issues raised here are the same as those which under old forms of procedure could be raised only in a suit for an injunction or one to recover the tax after its payment. But the Constitution does not require that the case or controversy should be presented by traditional forms of procedure, invoking only traditional remedies. The judiciary clause of the Constitution defined and limited judicial power, not the particular method by which that power might be invoked. It did not crystallize into changeless form the procedure of 1789 as the only possible means for presenting a case or controversy otherwise cognizable by the federal courts. Whenever the judicial power is invoked to review a judgment of a state court, the ultimate constitutional purpose is the protection, by the exercise of the judicial function, of rights arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The states are left free to regulate their own judicial procedure. Hence, changes merely in the form or method of procedure by which federal rights are brought to final adjudication in the state courts are not enough to preclude review of the adjudication by this Court, so long as the case retains the essentials of an adversary proceeding, involving a real, not a hypothetical, controversy, which is finally determined by the judgment below. See Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, supra, 724. As the prayer for relief by injunction is not a necessary prerequisite to the exercise of judicial power, allegations of threatened irreparable injury which are material only if an injunction is asked, may likewise be dispensed with if, in other respects, the controversy presented is, as in this case, real and substantial. Such was the purport and effect of our decision in Fidelity National Bank v. Swope, supra, where it was held that a final judgment rendered by a state court in an adversary proceeding brought under a state statute to determine the validity of liens about to be imposed for benefits assessed under a city improvement ordinance, presented a case within the appellate jurisdiction of this Court. Accordingly, we must consider the constitutional questions raised by the appeal. [In doing so the Court came to the conclusion that the Tennessee tax as applied to appellants did not violate either the Commerce Clause or the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution and affirmed the decree of the Tennessee court.]

NOTES

1. Statutes authorizing declaratory judgments have been adopted in most states and by Congress. The principal differences between declaratory judgment procedure and proceedings for an injunction are that in the former the imminence of the threatened injury need not be alleged or shown and no executory process must follow the court's action in declaring the rights of the parties. For a full discussion of the subject, see Borchard, Declaratory Judgments (2d ed. 1941).

held that a United States district court was thereby given authority to make a binding declaration of the legal rights and obligations of the plaintiff insurance company to defendant policyholder, arising out of insurance contracts, there being a dispute whether the latter had become "totally and permanently disabled" and thereby entitled to certain rights under policies held by him. The policyholder had refrained from suing, with the result that the company had no means of bringing the dispute to a judicial test other than by petition for a declaration under the Declaratory Judgment Act. No federal question being involved, the basis of the district court's jurisdiction was diverse state citizenship of the parties. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, for the court, said in part: "The Declaratory Judgment Act of 1934, in its limitation to 'cases of actual controversy,' manifestly has regard to the constitutional provision and is operative only in respect to controversies which are such in the constitutional sense. The word 'actual' is one of emphasis rather than of definition. Thus the operation of the Declaratory Judgment Act is procedural only. * * * In dealing with methods within its sphere of remedial action the Congress may create and improve as well as abolish or restrict. The Declaratory Judgment Act must be deemed to fall within this ambit of congressional power, so far as it authorizes relief which is consonant with the exercise of the judicial function in the determination of controversies to which under the Constitution the judicial power extends."

3. Subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court have emphasized the requirement that in order to secure declaratory relief the controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. In Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419, 82 L. ed. 936, 58 Sup. Ct. 678, 115 A. L. R. 105 (1938), where a declaratory judgment was sought that the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 was unconstitutional, the court, through Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, said: "The District Court did not err in dismissing the cross bill. Defendants are not entitled to invoke the Federal Declaratory Judgment Act in order to obtain an advisory decree upon a hypothetical state of facts. * * * By the cross bill, defendants seek a judgment that each and every provision of the Act is unconstitutional. It presents a variety of hypothetical controversies which may never become real. We are invited to enter into a speculative inquiry for the purpose of condemning statutory provisions the effect of which in concrete situations, not yet developed, cannot now be definitely perceived. We must decline that invitation." See also Coffman v. Breeze Corporations, 323 U. S. 316, 89 L. ed. 264, 65 Sup. Ct. 298 (1945); Alabama State Federation of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U. S. 450, 89 L. ed. 1725, 65 Sup. Ct. 1384 (1945).

PACIFIC STATES TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.
v. OREGON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1912.
223 U. S. 118, 56 L. ed. 377, 32 Sup. Ct. 224.

[In 1902 the State of Oregon amended its constitution and made provision, in addition to legislation by the ordinary legislatures, for legislation by popular initiative and direct vote of the people. By this method a statute taxing corporations was adopted. In a suit brought by the state to collect the tax the defendant, the telephone company, pleaded that the tax statute was invalid by reason of Article IV, Section 4 of the federal Constitution. The State Supreme Court affirmed a decision which sustained a demurrer to this defense and on writ of error the case was brought to this court. The chief contention of the plaintiff in error is:

"The guaranty of Article IV, Section 4, of the federal Constitution is to the people of the states, and to each citizen, as well as to the states as political entities. Section 4 of Article IV therefore prohibits the majority in any state from adopting an unrepubli- can constitution. The initiative is in contravention of a republican form of government. Government by the people directly is the attribute of a pure democracy and is subversive of the principles upon which the republic is founded. Direct legislation is, therefore, repugnant to that form of government with which alone Congress could admit a state to the Union and which the state is bound to maintain."

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

We premise by saying that while the controversy which this record presents is of much importance, it is not novel. It is important, since it calls upon us to decide whether it is the duty of the courts or the province of Congress to determine when a state has ceased to be republican in form and to enforce the guarantee of the Constitution on that subject. It is not novel, as that question has long since been determined by this court conformably to the practice of the Government from the beginning to be political in character, and therefore not cognizable by the judicial power, but solely committed by the Constitution to the judgment of Congress. * * *

The contention [of the plaintiff in error], if held to be sound, would necessarily affect the validity, not only of the particular statute which is before us, but of every other statute passed in Oregon since the adoption of the initiative and referendum. And indeed the propositions go further than this, since in their essence they assert that there is no governmental function, legislative or judicial, in Oregon, because it cannot be assumed, if the proposition be well founded, that there is at one and the same time one and the same government which is republican in form and not of that character.

Before immediately considering the text of § 4 of Art. IV, in order to uncover and give emphasis to the anomalous and destructive effects upon both the state and the national governments which the adoption of the proposition implies, as illustrated by what we have just said, let us briefly fix the inconceivable expansion of the judicial power and the ruinous destruction of legislative authority in matters purely political which would necessarily be occasioned by giving sanction to the doctrine which underlies and would be necessarily involved in sustaining the propositions contended for. First. That however perfect and absolute may be the establishment and dominion in fact of a state government, however complete may be its participation in and enjoyment of all its powers and rights as a member of the national government, and however all the departments of that government may recognize such state government, nevertheless every citizen of such state or person subject to taxation therein, or owing any duty to the established government, may be heard, for the purpose of defeating the payment of such taxes or avoiding the discharge of such duty, to assail in a court of justice the rightful existence of the state. Second. As a result, it becomes the duty of the courts of the United States, where such a claim is made, to examine as a justiciable issue the contention as to the illegal existence of a state and if such contention be thought well founded to disregard the existence in fact of the state, of its recognition by all of the departments of the federal government, and practically award a decree absolving from all obligation to contribute to the support of or obey the laws of such established state government. And as a consequence of the existence of such judicial authority a power in the judiciary must be implied, unless it be that anarchy is to ensue, to build by judicial action upon the ruins of the previously established government a new one, a right which by its very terms also implies the power to control the legislative department of the government of the United States in the recognition of such new government and the admission of representatives therefrom, as well as to strip the executive department of that government of its otherwise lawful and discretionary authority.

We shall not stop to consider the text to point out how absolutely barren it is of support for the contentions sought to be based upon it, since the repugnancy of those contentions to the letter and spirit of that text is so conclusively established by prior decisions of this court as to cause the matter to be absolutely foreclosed * * * [by] the leading and absolutely controlling case—Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1.

The case came from a Circuit Court of the United States. It was an action of damages for trespass. The case grew out of what is commonly known as the Dorr Rebellion in Rhode Island and the conflict which was brought about by the effort of the adherents of that alleged government sometimes described as "the government established by a voluntary convention" to overthrow the established charter government. The defendants justified on the ground that the acts done by them charged as a trespass were done under the authority of the charter government during the prevalence of martial law and for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of an armed revolt by the supporters of the insurrectionary government. The plaintiffs, on the contrary, asserted the validity of the voluntary government and denied the legality of the charter government. In the course of the trial the plaintiffs to support the contention of the illegality of the charter government and the legality of the voluntary government "although that government never was able to exercise any authority in the state nor to command obedience to its laws or to its officers," offered certain evidence tending to show that nevertheless it was "the lawful and established government," upon the ground that its powers to govern have been ratified by a large majority of the male people of the state of the age of 21 years and upwards and also by a large majority of those who were entitled to vote for general officers cast in favor of a constitution which was submitted as the result of a voluntarily assembled convention of what was alleged to be the people of the State of Rhode Island. The Circuit Court rejected this evidence and instructed the jury that as the charter government was the established state government at the time the trespass occurred, the defendants were justified in acting under the authority of that government. This court, coming to review this ruling, * * * pointed out that owing to the inherent political character of such a question its decision was not by the Constitution vested in the judicial department of the government, but was on the contrary exclusively committed to the legislative department by whose action on such subject the judiciary were absolutely controlled. The Court said (p. 42):

"Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind, and authorized the general government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a state, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department.

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on the application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a state. For, as the United States guarantee to each state a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the state before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the senators and representatives of a state are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue; and as no senators or representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts." * * *

The fundamental doctrines thus so lucidly and cogently announced by the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the case which we have thus reviewed, have never been doubted or questioned since, and have afforded the light guiding the orderly development of our constitutional system from the day of the deliverance of that decision up to the present time. * * *

As the issues presented, in their very essence, are, and have long since by this court been, definitely determined to be political and governmental, and embraced within the scope of the powers conferred upon Congress, and not therefore within the reach of judicial power, it follows that the case presented is not within our jurisdiction, and the writ of error must therefore be, and it is, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

NOTES

1. The development of the doctrine of political questions is a striking example of "judicial self-limitation." In the main, the Supreme Court's refusal to take jurisdiction in cases of this type has been due either to fear of the consequences of a judicial determination of the thorny issues involved or to lack of adequate data. The doctrine has thus been utilized not only in situations where the court has felt that decisions by the legislative or executive branches of government would be more appropriate but where the court would be dependent upon these branches to make its own decisions effective. The subject is discussed in Finkelstein, Judicial Self-Limitation, 37 Harv. L. Rev. 338 (1923), 1 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 397; Weston, Political Questions, 38 Harv. L. Rev. 296 (1925), 1 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 418; Finkelstein, Further Notes on Judicial Self-Limitation, 39 Harv. L. Rev. 221 (1926); Field, The Doctrine of Political Questions in the Federal Courts, 8 Minn. L. Rev. 485, (1924); Dodd, Judicially Nonenforceable Provisions of Constitutions, 80 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 54 (1931), 1 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 355.

2. In Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 83 L. ed. 1385, 59 Sup. Ct. 972, 122 A. L. R. 695 (1939) the Supreme Court was asked to pass upon the efficacy of the ratification by the State of Kansas of the proposed Child Labor Amendment to the federal Constitution. As regards the question of whether the Lieutenant Governor was part of the legislature so that he would have a deciding vote (when the senate was equally divided) on the ratification of the amendment, the court said it was equally divided as to whether this presented a question which was political in nature and hence not justiciable and expressed no opinion on the point. As regards the question of the efficacy of legislative ratification in the light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, the Court said the question must be regarded as political, with the ultimate authority in Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment. On the issue of whether the proposal had lost its vitality through lapse of time since its submission, and hence could not be effectively ratified by the Kansas legislature, the court said this, too, involved considerations appropriate for the decision of Congress and therefore was essentially political.

3. In Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549, 90 L. ed. 1432, 66 Sup. Ct. 1198 (1946) the Supreme Court refused to restrain election officials of Illinois from acting under a state statute which created Congressional districts of noncontiguous territory and grossly unequal population. The complaint was brought under the federal Declaratory Judgment Act for a decree declaring the Illinois statute apportioning the state into Congressional districts invalid in that the districts lacked compactness of territory and approximate equality of population, and therefore violated various provisions of the United States Constitution and legislation of Congress dealing with apportionment. Seven justices sat in the case. Three justices (Frankfurter, Reed and Burton) thought the issues involved were political in nature. Three other justices (Black, Douglas and Murphy) dissented on the ground that the question was justiciable and that personal harm had been shown which entitled appellants to the equitable relief demanded. The remaining justice (Rutledge) agreed with the dissenters that the question was justiciable, but concurred in the result of dismissal on the ground that, as a matter of equitable discretion, jurisdiction was properly declined. In announcing the "judgment" of the court, Mr. Justice Frankfurter said: "Nothing is clearer than that this controversy concerns matters that bring courts into immediate and active relations with party contests. From the determination of such issues this Court has traditionally held aloof. It is hostile to a democratic system to involve the judiciary in the politics of the people. And it is not less pernicious if such judicial intervention in an essentially political contest be dressed up in the abstract phrases of the law."

4. In South v. Peters, 339 U. S. 276, 94 L. ed. 834, 70 Sup. Ct. 641 (1950) residents of the most populous county of Georgia sought to enjoin operation of a state statute which allegedly reduced the weight of plaintiff's votes to one-tenth the weight of those in other counties by providing that all of a county's "unit votes" in a primary election would be awarded the candidate receiving the highest popular vote in the county. Each county is allotted a number of unit votes, running from six for the eight most populous counties, to two for most of the counties. Plaintiffs showed that a vote in one county will be worth over 120 times each of their votes. They showed that in 45 counties a vote will be given 20 times the weight of each of theirs. They showed that on a state-wide average each vote outside their county (Fulton) will have over 11 times the weight of each vote of the plaintiffs. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's dismissal of the petition, saying: "Federal courts consistently refuse to exercise their equity powers in cases posing political issues arising from a state's geographical distribution of electoral strength among its political subdivisions." Justices Douglas and Black dissented on the ground that the unit system violated plaintiffs' constitutional rights. They said: "There is more to the right to vote than the right to mark a piece of paper and drop it in a box or the right to pull a lever in a voting booth. The right to vote includes the right to have the ballot counted. It also includes the right to have the vote counted at full value without dilution or discount. That federally protected right suffers substantial dilution in this case. * * *"

FAIRCHILD v. HUGHES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1922.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

On July 7, 1920, Charles S. Fairchild of New York brought this suit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the Secretary of State and the Attorney General. The prayers of the bill are that "the so-called Suffrage Amendment [the Nineteenth to the federal Constitution] be declared unconstitutional and void"; that the Secretary of State be restrained from issuing any proclamation declaring that it has been ratified; and that the Attorney General be restrained from enforcing it. There is also a prayer for general relief and for an interlocutory injunction. The plaintiff, and others on whose behalf he sues, are citizens of the United States, taxpayers and members of the American Constitutional League, a voluntary association which describes itself as engaged in diffusing "knowledge as to the fundamental principles of the American Constitution, and especially that which gives to each State the right to determine for itself the question as to who should exercise the elective franchise therein."

The claim to relief was rested upon the following allegations: The legislatures of thirty-four of the States have passed resolutions purporting to ratify the Suffrage Amendment; and from one other State the Secretary of State of the United States has received a certificate to that effect purporting to come from the proper officer. The proposed Amendment cannot, for reasons stated, be made a part of the Constitution through ratification by the legislatures; and there are also specific reasons why the resolutions already adopted in several of the States are inoperative. But the Secretary has declared that he is without power to examine into the validity of alleged acts of ratification, and that, upon receiving from one additional State the customary certificate, he will issue a proclamation declaring that the Suffrage Amendment has been adopted. Furthermore, "a force bill" has been introduced in the Senate which provides fine and imprisonment for any person who refuses to allow women to vote; and if the bill is enacted, the Attorney General will be required to enforce its provisions. The threatened proclamation of the adoption of the Amendment would not be conclusive of its validity, but it would lead election officers to permit women to vote in States whose constitutions limit suffrage to men. This would prevent ascertainment of the wishes of the legally qualified voters, and elections, state and federal, would be void. Free citizens would be deprived of their right to have such elections duly held; the effectiveness of their votes would be diminished; and election expenses would be nearly doubled. Thus irremediable mischief would result. [The Supreme Court of the District decreed a dismissal, the Court of Appeals of the District affirmed the decree and the plaintiff appealed to this Court.]

Plaintiff's alleged interest in the question submitted is not such as to afford a basis for this proceeding. It is frankly a proceeding to have the Nineteenth Amendment declared void. In form it is a bill in equity; but it is not a case within the meaning of § 2 of Article III of the Constitution, which confers judicial power on the federal courts, for no claim of plaintiff is "brought before the court[s] for determination by such regular proceedings as are established by law or custom for the protection or enforcement of rights or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs." See In re Pacific Railway Commission, 32 Fed. 241, 255, quoted in Muskraat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, 356. The alleged wrongful act of the Secretary of State, said to be threatening, is the issuing of a proclamation which plaintiff asserts will be vain but will mislead election officers. The alleged wrongful act of the Attorney General, said to be threatening, is the enforcement, as against election officers, of the penalties to be imposed by a contemplated act of Congress which plaintiff asserts would be unconstitutional. But plaintiff is not an election officer; and the State of New York, of which he is a citizen, had previously amended its own constitution so as to grant the suffrage to women and had ratified this Amendment. Plaintiff has only the right, possessed by every citizen, to require that the Government be administered according to law and that the public moneys be not wasted. Obviously this general right does not entitle a private citizen to institute in the federal courts a suit to secure by indirection a determination whether a statute if passed, or a constitutional amendment about to be adopted, will be valid. Compare Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475; Tyler v. Judges of Court of Registration, 179 U. S. 405.

Decree affirmed.

NOTES

1. In Smith v. Indiana, 191 U. S. 138, 48 L. ed. 125, 24 Sup. Ct. 51 (1903) an Indiana taxpayer petitioned an Indiana court for a mandamus to compel an Indiana county officer to allow a deduction from the tax assessment on his land by reason of a mortgage thereon, in accordance with an Indiana statute. The defending officer set up that the statute was invalid both under the state and federal Constitutions. The state Supreme Court affirmed a judgment holding the statute valid and granting the writ. The defending officer appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which refused to hear the appeal on the ground that the appealing officer had no personal interest in the litigation.

2. In Ex parte Levitt, 302 U. S. 633, 82 L. ed. 493, 58 Sup. Ct. 1 (1937), which involved an effort to contest the appointment of Mr. Justice Black to the Supreme Court of the United States, the court said that the petitioner's interest as a citizen and a member of the bar of the court was insufficient. "It is an established principle that to entitle a private individual to invoke the judicial power to determine the validity of executive or legislative action he must show that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining a direct injury as the result of that action and it is not sufficient that he has merely a general interest common to all members of the public."

3. In Tilston v. Ullman, 318 U. S. 44, 87 L. ed. 603, 63 Sup. Ct. 493 (1943) the plaintiff, a registered physician, brought an action in the state courts for a declaratory judgment as to whether Connecticut statutes prohibited him from prescribing the use of contraceptive devices for married women patients and, if so, whether such statutes violated the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. Plaintiff alleged that if the statutes did apply to him they would prevent his prescribing contraceptives for three patients whose health was such that their lives would be endangered by childbearing. The state court ruled that the statutes applied to the plaintiff and were constitutional. On appeal the Supreme Court said: "We are of the opinion that the proceedings in the state courts present no constitutional question which appellant has standing to assert. The sole constitutional attack upon the statutes under the Fourteenth Amendment is confined to their deprivation of life—obviously not appellant's but his patients'. There is no allegation or proof that appellant's life is in danger. His patients are not parties to this proceeding and there is no basis on which we can say that he has standing to secure an adjudication of his patients' constitutional right to life, which they do not assert in their own behalf."

4. The Premier-Pabst Sales Company, a Delaware corporation, brought a bill in a federal district court to restrain Pennsylvania officers from enforcing a Pennsylvania beer license statute. It alleged that the statute violated both the commerce and equal protection clauses of the federal Constitution because it imposed higher license fees for distributing beer brought into the state than for beer made in the state. Under the Pennsylvania law no corporation could obtain a license to distribute beer wherever made unless all of its officers and directors and 51 per cent of its stockholders were residents of the state for two years prior to application for a license. None of the plaintiff officers or shareholders were residents of the state. Affirming the district court's dismissal of the bill, the Supreme Court said: "As no license could legally issue to the Company in any event, it cannot be injured by the alleged unconstitutional discrimination; and hence has no standing to challenge provisions of the Act." Premier-Pabst Sales Co. v. Grosscup, 298 U. S. 226, 80 L. ed. 1155, 56 Sup. Ct. 754 (1936).

5. In Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 83 L. ed. 1385, 59 Sup. Ct. 972, 122 A. L. R. 695 (1939) the Supreme Court held (Justices Frankfurter, Roberts, Black and Douglas dissenting on the point) that twenty state senators of the State of Kansas whose votes, if their contention were sustained, would have been sufficient to defeat ratification of the proposed Child Labor Amendment to the Constitution, had a "plain, direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes." The court said: "They have set up and claimed a right and privilege under the Constitution of the United States to have their votes given effect and the state court has denied that right and privilege."

6. Informative discussions of justiciability and standing to sue are to be found in the several opinions in Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 95 L. ed. 817, 71 Sup. Ct. 624 (1951), particularly the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter. In Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485, 96 L. ed. 517, 72 Sup. Ct. 380, 27 A. L. R. (2d) 472 (1952), sustaining the constitutionality of New York's Feinberg Law, the purpose of which is to provide for the disqualification and removal from New York public schools of teachers and other employees who advocate the overthrow of the government by unlawful means or who are members of organizations that advocate such overthrow, the Supreme Court made no reference to the requirement that plaintiffs must have proper standing to raise constitutional questions. Mr. Justice Frankfurter's dissenting opinion took the position that the issues were not ripe for constitutional review and that the four teachers who were plaintiffs had no standing to challenge the statute, relying upon the authority of United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 91 L. ed. 754, 67 Sup. Ct. 556 (1947). For a discussion of this aspect of the Adler case, see Davis, Standing, Ripeness and Civil Liberties: A Critique of Adler v. Board of Education, 38 A. B. A. J. 924 (1952).

7. It is thus apparent from the cases that for one reason or another a person may have no standing in court to raise a constitutional issue, even though the elements of a case or controversy are present. In the language of Mr. Justice Brandeis, concurring in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U. S. 288, 347, 80 L. ed. 688, 711, 56 Sup. Ct. 466 (1936): "The Court will not pass upon the validity of a statute upon complaint of one who fails to show that he is injured by its operation. * * * Among the many applications of this rule, none is more striking than the denial of the right of challenge to one who lacks a personal or property right." This requirement that the petitioner show present or impending injury serves to exclude from the court's consideration objections that are deemed premature, or that are urged by public officials in their official or governmental capacity. Even if an interest is shown, it may be considered too remote, as in Fairchild v. Hughes. See generally: Note, Who May Test the Constitutionality of a Statute in the Supreme Court, 47 Harv. L. Rev. 677 (1934), 1 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 609; Note, The Power of a State Officer to Raise a Constitutional Question, 33 Col. L. Rev. 1036 (1933), 1 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 614; Culp, Methods of Attacking Unconstitutional Legislation, 22 Va. L. Rev. 723 (1936).

BOOTH FISHERIES CO. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1926.
271 U. S. 208, 70 L. ed. 908, 46 Sup. Ct. 491.

Error to a judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin sustaining an award under the state Workmen's Compensation Act.

This was a suit begun in the Circuit Court of Dane County, Wisconsin, to review and set aside the findings and award under the Wisconsin Workmen's Compensation Act of a death benefit in favor of Mary McLaughlin as widow of William McLaughlin, against his employer, the Booth Fisheries Company, and that company's surety, the Zurich General Accident & Liability Company.

The petition avers that the Industrial Commission in making the award "acted without and in excess of its powers" in finding that the personal injuries and death of William McLaughlin were proximately caused by accident and not intentionally self-inflicted, and that this finding was contrary to the evidence and contrary to the law. The Circuit Court and the Supreme Court of the State held that the findings of fact by the Commission were supported by evidence, and so were conclusive.

The only question raised on the appeal to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin was the constitutionality under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Workmen's Compensation Act of Wisconsin in its limitation of the judicial review of the findings of fact of the Industrial Commission to cases in which "the findings of fact by the Commission do not support the order or award." Wisconsin Statutes, 1921, § 2394-19. This limitation has been held by the state Supreme Court to mean that the findings of fact made by the Industrial Commission are conclusive, if there is any evidence to support them. * * * It follows that the court may not in its review weigh the evidence or set aside the finding on the ground that it is against the preponderance of the testimony.

It is argued that the employer in a suit for compensation under the Act is entitled under the Fourteenth Amendment to his day in court, and that he does not secure it unless he may submit to a court the question of the preponderance of the evidence on the issues raised.

A complete answer to this claim is found in the elective or voluntary character of the Wisconsin Compensation Act. That Act provides that every employer who has elected to do so shall become subject to the Act, that such election shall be made by filing a written statement with the Commission, which shall subject him to the terms of the law for a year and until July 1st following, and to successive terms of one year unless he withdraws. Wisconsin Stat. § 2394-3, 4, 5. It is conceded by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error that the Act is elective, and that it is so is shown by the decisions of the Wisconsin court in Borgnis v. Falk Company, 147 Wis. 327, 350, and in the present case. 185 Wis. 127. If the employer elects not to accept the provisions of the Compensation Act, he is not bound to respond in a proceeding before the Industrial Commission under the Act, but may await a suit for damages for injuries or wrongful death by the person claiming recovery therefor, and make his defense at law before a court in which the issues of fact and law are to be tried by jury. In view of such an opportunity for choice, the employer who elects to accept the law may not complain that, in the plan for assessing the employer's compensation for injury sustained, there is no particular form of judicial review. This is clearly settled by the decision of this Court in Hawkins v. Bleakly, 243 U. S. 210, 216.

More than this, the employer in this case having elected to accept the provisions of the law, and such benefits and immunities as it gives, may not escape its burdens by asserting that it is unconstitutional. The election is a waiver and estops such complaint. Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Osborn, 193 U. S. 17. * * *

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin is

NOTE

1. The doctrine of estoppel operates to prevent a party from raising the constitutional issue as to the invalidity of a statute because of some conduct of his own. The fact that there has been a previous adjudication of unconstitutionality is thus immaterial. In cases where the Supreme Court has recognized the doctrine, receipt of benefits from the statute and invocation of its provisions have been the generally stated criteria, although the court has not always distinguished clearly between them. The cases are discussed in Note, Estoppel to Contest the Constitutionality of a Statute, 34 Col. L. Rev. 1495 (1934), 1 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 658.

MASSACHUSETTS v. MELLON. FROTHINGHAM v. MELLON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1923.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases were argued and will be considered and disposed of together. The first is an original suit in this Court. The other was brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. That court dismissed the bill and its decree was affirmed by the District Court of Appeals. Thereupon the case was brought here by appeal. Both cases challenge the constitutionality of the Act of November 23, 1921, c. 135, 42 Stat. 224, commonly called the Maternity Act. Briefly, it provides for an initial appropriation and thereafter annual appropriations for a period of five years, to be apportioned among such of the several states as shall accept and comply with its provisions, for the purpose of co-operating with them to reduce maternal and infant mortality and protect the health of mothers and infants. It creates a bureau to administer the act in co-operation with state agencies, which are required to make such reports concerning their operations and expenditures as may be prescribed by the federal bureau. Whenever that bureau shall determine that funds have not been properly expended in respect of any State, payments may be withheld.

It is asserted that these appropriations are for purposes not national, but local to the states, and together with numerous similar appropriations constitute an effective means of inducing the states to yield a portion of their sovereign rights. It is further alleged that the burden of the appropriations provided by this act and similar legislation falls unequally upon the several states, and rests largely upon the industrial states, such as Massachusetts; that the act is a usurpation of power not granted to Congress by the Constitution—an attempted exercise of the power of local self-government reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment; and that the defendants are proceeding to carry the act into operation. In the Massachusetts case it is alleged that the plaintiff's rights and powers as a sovereign state and the rights of its citizens have been invaded and usurped by these expenditures and acts; and that, although the state has not accepted the act, its constitutional rights are infringed by the passage thereof and the imposition upon the state of an illegal and unconstitutional option either to yield to the federal government a part of its reserved rights or lose the share which it would otherwise be entitled to receive of the moneys appropriated. In the Frothingham case plaintiff alleges that the effect of the statute will be to take her property, under the guise of taxation, without due process of law.

We have reached the conclusion that the cases must be disposed of for want of jurisdiction without considering the merits of the constitutional questions.

In the first case, the State of Massachusetts presents no justiciable controversy either in its own behalf or as the representative of its citizens. The appellant in the second suit has no such interest in the subject-matter, nor is any such injury inflicted or threatened, as will enable her to sue.

First. The State of Massachusetts in its own behalf, in effect, complains that the act in question invades the local concerns of the state, and is a usurpation of power, viz.: the power of local self-government reserved to the states.

Probably, it would be sufficient to point out that the powers of the state are not invaded, since the statute imposes no obligation but simply extends an option which the state is free to accept or reject. But we do not rest here. Under Article III, § 2, of the Constitution, the judicial power of this Court extends "to controversies * * * between a State and citizens of another State" and the Court has original jurisdiction "in all cases * * * in which a State shall be party." The effect of this is not to confer jurisdiction upon the Court merely because a state is a party, but only where it is a party to a proceeding of judicial cognizance. Proceedings not of a justiciable character are outside the contemplation of the constitutional grant. * * *

What, then, is the nature of the right of the state here asserted and how is it affected by this statute? Reduced to its simplest terms, it is alleged that the statute constitutes an attempt to legislate outside the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution and within the field of local powers exclusively reserved to the states. Nothing is added to the force or effect of this assertion by the further incidental allegations that the ulterior purpose of Congress thereby was to induce the states to yield a portion of their sovereign rights; that the burden of the appropriations falls unequally upon the several states; and that there is imposed upon the states an illegal and unconstitutional option either to yield to the federal government a part of their reserved rights or lose their share of the moneys appropriated. But what burden is imposed upon the states, unequally or otherwise? Certainly there is none, unless it be the burden of taxation, and that falls upon their inhabitants, who are within the taxing power of Congress as well as that of the states where they reside. Nor does the statute require the states to do or to yield anything. If Congress enacted it with the ulterior purpose of tempting them to yield, that purpose may be effectively frustrated by the simple expedient of not yielding.

In the last analysis, the complaint of the plaintiff state is brought to the naked contention that Congress has usurped the reserved powers of the several states by the mere enactment of the statute, though nothing has been done and nothing is to be done without their consent; and it is plain that that question, as it is thus presented, is political and not judicial in character, and therefore is not a matter which admits of the exercise of the judicial power. * * *

It follows that in so far as the case depends upon the assertion of a right on the part of the state to sue in its own behalf we are without jurisdiction. In that aspect of the case we are called upon to adjudicate, not rights of persons or property, not rights of dominion over physical domain, not quasi-sovereign rights actually invaded or threatened, but abstract questions of political power, of sovereignty, of government. No rights of the state falling within the scope of the judicial power have been brought within the actual or threatened operation of the statute. * * *

We come next to consider whether the suit may be maintained by the state as the representative of its citizens. To this the answer is not doubtful. We need not go so far as to say that a state may never intervene by suit to protect its citizens against any form of enforcement of unconstitutional acts of Congress; but we are clear that the right to do so does not arise here. Ordinarily, at least, the only way in which a state may afford protection to its citizens in such cases is through the enforcement of its own criminal statutes, where that is appropriate, or by opening its courts to the injured persons for the maintenance of civil suits or actions. But the citizens of Massachusetts are also citizens of the United States. It cannot be conceded that a state, as parens patriae, may institute judicial proceedings to protect citizens of the United States from the operation of the statutes thereof. While the state, under some circumstances, may sue in that capacity for the protection of its citizens (Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208, 241), it is no part of its duty or power to enforce their rights in respect of their relations with the federal government. In that field it is the United States, and not the state, which represents them as parens patriae, when such representation becomes appropriate; and to the former, and not to the latter, they must look for such protective measures as flow from that status.

Second. The attack upon the statute in the Frothingham case is, generally, the same, but this plaintiff alleges in addition that she is a taxpayer of the United States; and her contention, though not clear, seems to be that the effect of the appropriation complained of will be to increase the burden of future taxation and thereby take her property without due process of law. The right of a taxpayer to enjoin the execution of a federal appropriation act, on the ground that it is invalid and will result in taxation for illegal purposes, has never been passed upon by this Court. In cases where it was presented, the question has either been allowed to pass sub silentio or the determination of it expressly withheld. Millard v. Roberts, 202 U. S. 429, 438; Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U. S. 24, 31; Bradfield v. Roberts, 175 U. S. 291, 295. The case last cited came here from the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and that court sustained the right of the plaintiff to sue by treating the case as one directed against the District of Columbia, and therefore subject to the rule frequently stated by this Court, that resident taxpayers may sue to enjoin an illegal use of the moneys of a municipal corporation. Roberts v. Bradfield, 12 App. D. C. 453, 459-460. The interest of a taxpayer of a municipality in the application of its moneys is direct and immediate and the remedy by injunction to prevent their misuse is not inappropriate. It is upheld by a large number of state cases and is the rule of this Court. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 601, 609. Nevertheless, there are decisions to the contrary. See, for example, Miller v. Grandy, 13 Mich. 540, 550. The reasons which support the extension of the equitable remedy to a single taxpayer in such cases are based upon the peculiar relation of the corporate taxpayer to the corporation, which is not without some resemblance to that subsisting between stockholder and private corporation. IV Dillon Municipal Corporations, 5th ed., § 1580, et seq. But the relation of a taxpayer of the United States to the federal government is very different. His interest in the moneys of the Treasury—partly realized from taxation and partly from other sources—is shared with millions of others; is comparatively minute and indeterminable; and the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds, so remote, fluctuating and uncertain, that no basis is afforded for an appeal to the preventive powers of a court of equity.

The administration of any statute, likely to produce additional taxation to be imposed upon a vast number of taxpayers, the extent of whose several liability is indefinite and constantly changing, is essentially a matter of public and not of individual concern. If one taxpayer may champion and litigate such a cause, then every other taxpayer may do the same, not only in respect of the statute here under review but also in respect of every other appropriation act and statute whose administration requires the outlay of public money, and whose validity may be questioned. The bare suggestion of such a result, with its attendant inconveniences, goes far to sustain the conclusion which we have reached, that a suit of this character cannot be maintained. It is of much significance that no precedent sustaining the right to maintain suits like this has been called to our attention, although, since the formation of the government, as an examination of the acts of Congress will disclose, a large number of statutes appropriating or involving the expenditure of moneys for non-federal purposes have been enacted and carried into effect.

The functions of government under our system are apportioned. To the legislative department has been committed the duty of making laws; to the executive the duty of executing them; and to the judiciary the duty of interpreting and applying them in cases properly brought before the courts. The general rule is that neither department may invade the province of the other and neither may control, direct or restrain the action of the other. We are not now speaking of the merely ministerial duties of officials. Gaines v. Thompson, 7 Wall. 347. We have no power per se to review and annul acts of Congress on the ground that they are unconstitutional. That question may be considered only when the justification for some direct injury suffered or threatened, presenting a justifiable issue, is made to rest upon such an act. Then the power exercised is that of ascertaining and declaring the law applicable to the controversy. It amounts to little more than the negative power to disregard an unconstitutional enactment, which otherwise would stand in the way of the enforcement of a legal right. The party who invokes the power must be able to show not only that the statute is invalid but that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with people generally. If a case for preventive relief be presented the court enjoins, in effect, not the execution of the statute, but the acts of the official, the statute notwithstanding. Here the parties plaintiff have no such case. Looking through forms of words to the substance of their complaint, it is merely that officials of the executive department of the government are executing and will execute an act of Congress asserted to be unconstitutional; and this we are asked to prevent. To do so would be not to decide a judicial controversy, but to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which plainly we do not possess.

No. 24, Original, dismissed.

No. 962 [Frothingham case] affirmed.

NOTES

1. The Alabama Power Company was a private corporation with charter power to manufacture and sell electrical energy throughout the State of Alabama. It brought a bill in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia to restrain defendant Ickes, Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, from making loans and grants-in-aid from the federal treasury, authorized by act of Congress, to four municipalities in Alabama to help them establish municipally-owned electricity distribution systems in competition with the plaintiff, which had a nonexclusive franchise in each of the four cities to sell electricity. The bill alleged that the loans and grants-in-aid were unconstitutional. Each of the municipalities was authorized by state law to establish and operate its proposed distribution system and to receive the loans and grants-in-aid. On appeal the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held that the petitioner had no standing to challenge the constitutionality of the statute or the making of the grants and loans. The Supreme Court affirmed this conclusion and said in support of it that the competition of the cities with the power company, "albeit destructive," being lawful, the use of federal money to bring it about would cause no legal wrong to the company. "The claim that petitioner will be injured, perhaps ruined, by the competition of the municipalities brought about by the use of the moneys, therefore, presents a clear case of damnum absque injuria. Stated in other words, these municipalities have the right under state law to engage in the business in competition with petitioner, since it has been given no exclusive franchise. If its business be curtailed or destroyed by the operations of the municipalities, it will be by lawful competition from which no legal wrong results." Alabama Power Co. v. Ickes, 302 U. S. 464, 82 L. ed. 374, 58 Sup. Ct. 300 (1938).

2. A like fate met the suit of several power companies for an injunction brought against the Tennessee Valley Authority to restrain it from generating electricity out of water power created or to be created pursuant to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act and from distributing it and selling it in competition with these private companies. The T. V. A. admitted that damage would result to the companies but contended that it would be "damnum absque injuria,"—a damage not consequent upon the violation of any right recognized by law." The court agreed, and held that the companies had no standing to challenge the constitutionality of the statute. The court pointed out that the companies had no exclusive franchises. To the contention that the operations of the T. V. A. violated powers reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment, the court answered that the states were not objecting, but enacting cooperative legislation. "The sale of government property in competition with others is not a violation of the Tenth Amendment. As we have seen there is no objection to the Authority's operations by the states, and, if this were not so, the appellants, absent the states or their officers, have no standing in this suit to raise any question under the amendment." Tennessee Electric Power Co. v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 306 U. S. 118, 83 L. ed. 543, 59 Sup. Ct. 366 (1939).

3. Compare the less stringent rules on standing to sue applied on appeal from the orders of certain federal administrative agencies to a United States Court of Appeals under statutes giving such right of appeal to "any person aggrieved" by administrative orders. Persons "aggrieved" are permitted to bring suit to prevent alleged unlawful official action in order to vindicate the public interest, although no personal substantive interest of such persons has been or will be invaded. A leading case is Scripps-Howard Radio, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, 316 U. S. 4, 86 L. ed. 1229, 62 Sup. Ct. 875 (1942), where the court pointed out that the purpose of the Communications Act of 1934, which gave the right of appeal to persons "aggrieved or whose interests are adversely affected" by Commission action, was to protect the public interest in communications. "But these private litigants have standing only as representatives of the public interest * * *. That a court is called upon to enforce public rights and not the interests of private property does not diminish its power to protect such rights." See also American Power & Light Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 325 U. S. 385, 89 L. ed. 1683, 65 Sup. Ct. 1254 (1945). For a discussion of the cases see Associated Industries v. Ickes, 134 F. (2d) 694 (1943).

4. "It is only when a complainant possesses something more than a general interest in the proper execution of the laws that he is in a position to secure judicial intervention. His interest must rise to the dignity of an interest personal to him and not possessed by the people generally. Such a claim is of that character which constitutionally permits adjudication by courts under their general powers." Stark v. Wickard, 321 U. S. 288, 304, 88 L. ed. 733, 64 Sup. Ct. 559 (1944). In Williams v. Riley, 280 U. S. 78, 74 L. ed. 175, 50 Sup. Ct. 63 (1929) it was held that the fact that he is an owner and operator of an automobile does not give a citizen of a state sufficient interest to induce a federal court to entertain his bill to enjoin collection of a state tax on the sale of gasoline and pass upon his allegation that the tax violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

In Frothingham v. Mellon the Supreme Court said that the interest of an individual taxpayer is too remote, uncertain and indeterminable to warrant a contest of the validity of an act of Congress. In some states taxpayers' actions are permitted to contest the validity of state statutes appropriating money. For an opinion of a state court discussing the problem and reaching the same conclusion as Frothingham v. Mellon, see Asplund v. Hannett, 31 N. Mex. 641, 249 Pac. 1074, 58 A. L. R. 573 (1926). The use of taxpayers' actions to enjoin the alleged waste of municipal funds seems to be more generally recognized. See Annotation, 58 A. L. R. 588 (1929); Note, L. R. A. 1915D, 178. ### PENNSYLVANIA v. WEST VIRGINIA. OHIO v. WEST VIRGINIA.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER delivered the opinion of the Court.
These are suits, one by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the other by the State of Ohio, to enjoin the State of West Virginia from enforcing an act passed by her legislature (c. 71, Acts 1919) which the complainants believe will largely curtail or cut off the supply of natural gas heretofore and now carried by pipe lines from West Virginia into their territory and there sold and used for fuel and lighting purposes.

* * * The complainants challenge its validity on the ground that it directly interferes with interstate commerce and therefore contravenes the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States; and they rest their right to relief on the grounds that to enforce the act will subject them to irreparable injury in respect of many of their public institutions and governmental agencies, which long have been and now are using this gas, and will subject them to further and incalculable injury in that (a) it will imperil the health and comfort of thousands of their people who use the gas in their homes and are largely dependent thereon, and (b) will halt or curtail many industries which seasonably use great quantities of the gas and wherein thousands of persons are employed and millions of taxable wealth are invested. * * *

The act whose enforcement is sought to be enjoined was passed by the legislature of West Virginia February 10, 1919, and went into effect May 11th following. These suits were brought eight days thereafter by direction of the legislatures of the complainant States, and by leave of this Court. Interlocutory injunctions were prayed and granted at the outset and are still in force. * * *

The first question is whether the suits involve a justiciable controversy between States in the sense of the Judiciary Article of the Constitution. We are of opinion that they do and that every element of such a controversy is present.

Each suit presents a direct issue between two States as to whether one may withdraw a natural product, a common subject of commercial dealings, from an established current of commerce moving into the territory of the other. The complainant State asserts and the defendant State denies that such a withdrawal is an interference with interstate commerce forbidden by the Constitution. This is essentially a judicial question. It concededly is so in suits between private parties, and of course its character is not different in a suit between States.

What is sought is not an abstract ruling on that question, but an injunction against such a withdrawal presently threatened and likely to be productive of great injury. The purpose to withdraw is shown in the enactment of the defendant State before set forth and is about to be carried into effect by her officers acting in her name and at her command. The State is the principal and the action of her officers rightly may be imputed to her, even though a suit for an injunction might lie against them.

The attitude of the complainant States is not that of mere volunteers attempting to vindicate the freedom of interstate commerce or to redress purely private grievances. Each sues to protect a twofold interest—one as the proprietor of various public institutions and schools whose supply of gas will be largely curtailed or cut off by the threatened interference with the interstate current, and the other as the representative of the consuming public whose supply will be similarly affected. Both interests are substantial and both are threatened with serious injury.

The private consumers in each State not only include most of the inhabitants of many urban communities but constitute a substantial portion of the State's population. Their health, comfort and welfare are seriously jeopardized by the threatened withdrawal of the gas from the interstate stream. This is a matter of grave public concern in which the State, as the representative of the public, has an interest apart from that of the individuals affected. It is not merely a remote or ethical interest but one which is immediate and recognized by law. * * *

The second question is whether the suits were brought prematurely. They were brought a few days after the West Virginia act went into force. No order under it had been made by the Public Service Commission; nor had it been tested in actual practice. But this does not prove that the suits were premature. Of course they were not so, if it otherwise appeared that the act certainly would operate as the complainant States apprehended it would. One does not have to await the consummation of threatened injury to obtain preventive relief. If the injury is certainly impending that is enough.

Turning to the act, we find that by its first section it lays on every pipe line company a positive duty,—to the extent of its supply of gas produced in the State, whether produced by it or others,—to satisfy the needs, whether for domestic, industrial or other use, of all intending consumers, whether old or new, who are willing to pay for the gas and want it for use within the section of the State in which it is produced, in that through which it is transported or in that wherein it is supplied to others. This is a substantive provision whose terms are both direct and certain, and to which immediate obedience is commanded. No order of the commission is required to give it precision or to make it obligatory, and it leaves nothing to the discretion of those who are to enforce it. On the contrary, it prescribes a definite rule of conduct and in itself puts the rule in force. It imposes an unconditional and mandatory duty, as counsel for the State admit, and obviously is intended to enforce a preferred recognition and satisfaction of the needs of consumers within the State, present and prospective, regardless of the effect on the interstate stream or on consumers outside the State. * * *

It must be held therefore that the suits were not brought prematurely.

The third question is whether the requisite parties have been brought into the suits. It is objected that the pipe line companies have not been brought in. But there is nothing which makes their presence essential. The complainant States make no complaint and seek no relief against them. They are supplying gas in those States and evidently will continue to do so, if not restrained or prevented by the defendant State.

It is only with her that the complainant States are in controversy. It also is objected that the consumers in the defendant State who will be benefited if the act is enforced have no representation in the suits. But this is a misconception. They are represented by that State, and there is nothing in the situation requiring that they be specially represented or brought in. With equal basis it could be objected in a suit to prevent the enforcement of a statute reducing railroad freight rates, or in one to prevent the enforcement of a municipal ordinance reducing telephone or electric light rates, that shippers or users who would be benefited by the reduction must be specially represented or brought in. Such an objection would of course be untenable; and so of the objection here. [The statute was held to violate the commerce clause and its enforcement enjoined.]

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS, dissenting. * * *

First. This Court is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

The bills present neither a "case," nor a "controversy," within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cr. 137; Muskraat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, 356, 359; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 258 U. S. 158. They are not proceedings "instituted according to the regular course of judicial procedure" to protect some right of property or personal right. They are, like McChord v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 183 U. S. 483, 495, an attempt to enjoin, not executive action, but legislation. They are instituted frankly to secure from this Court a general declaration that the West Virginia Act of February 17, 1919, is unconstitutional. Compare Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475, 486. The well settled rule that the Court is without power to entertain such a proceeding applies equally, whether the party invoking its aid is a State or a private person. And the rule cannot be overcome by giving to pleadings the form of a bill in equity for an injunction. Compare Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U. S. 126; Atherton Mills v. Johnston, 259 U. S. 13, 15; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, supra.

Moreover, it is not shown that there is, in a legal sense, danger of invasion of the alleged rights. It is shown that the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio are, in their public institutions, themselves consumers of West Virginia gas—a "makeweight" as suggested in Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237. And it is shown that these and many other consumers within the plaintiff States would suffer serious injury if the West Virginia supply were cut off. But it is not shown that discontinuance of the supply is threatened or that there is, in a legal sense, danger that the supply will be stopped. The mere enactment of the statute, obviously, does not constitute a threat to interrupt the flow of gas into the plaintiff States. The importation into Ohio and Pennsylvania is conducted, not by the State of West Virginia, but wholly by twelve privately owned public service corporations. If the importation ceases it will be, primarily at least, because of acts or omissions of these twelve corporations. Yet there is not even an allegation that these corporations threaten, or intend, to discontinue the importation; or that they will be compelled to do so unless the State of West Virginia is enjoined from enforcing the statute. * * *

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES. * * *

I agree substantially with my brothers McREYNOLDS and BRANDEIS, but think that there is jurisdiction in such sense as to justify a statement of my opinion upon the merits of the case. I think that the bill should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS, dissenting.

It seems to me quite clear that the record presents no justiciable controversy; certainly none within the original jurisdiction of this Court.

NOTES

1. Assuming that the opinion of the Court in the principal case is correct in holding that the facts present a real case or controversy, is it a situation where declaratory relief would have been appropriate? If a similar case arose today, would a declaratory judgment be sought as regards the issue of the constitutionality of the statute?

2. In Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416, 64 L. ed. 641, 40 Sup. Ct. 382, 11 A. L. R. 984 (1920), Missouri asserted its quasi-sovereign right to regulate the taking of wild birds within its borders and also, in its own behalf, alleged a pecuniary interest as owner of the birds. It brought a bill in equity to prevent the enforcement of the federal Migratory Bird Treaty Act of 1918, alleging it to be an unconstitutional interference with the rights reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment. The court said that "it is enough that the bill is a reasonable and proper means to assert the alleged quasi-sovereign rights of a state."

3. The State of Georgia moved for leave to file a bill of complaint and sought to invoke the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in a suit against some twenty railroads, charging a conspiracy among the defendants in restraint of trade and commerce among the states in respect of the fixing of arbitrary and noncompetitive rates for transportation of freight. She alleged that the effect of the conspiracy was to give manufacturers, sellers and other shippers in the North an advantage over manufacturers, shippers and others in Georgia. The court (Chief Justice Stone and Justices Roberts, Frankfurter and Jackson dissenting) granted the motion, holding that Georgia had properly invoked the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U. S. 439, 89 L. ed. 1051, 65 Sup. Ct. 716 (1945).

4. In Florida v. Mellon, 273 U. S. 12, 71 L. ed. 511, 47 Sup. Ct. 265 (1927) the state instituted an original proceeding in the Supreme Court to test the constitutionality of a provision of the federal Revenue Act of 1926 which imposed a tax upon the transfer of a decedent's estate, while at the same time permitting a credit, not exceeding 80 per cent, for the amount of any estate, inheritance, legacy or succession taxes actually paid to any state or territory. The state sought leave to file a bill to enjoin the collection of taxes on estates of Florida decedents. Florida was one of the few states that levied no inheritance or estate tax, being forbidden to do so by her Constitution. Consequently, she was unable to place her citizens on an equality with those of other states in respect of the challenged tax. The Supreme Court denied Florida leave to file the bill of complaint, saying in part: "The claim of immediate injury to the state rests upon the allegation that the act will have the result of inducing potential taxpayers to withdraw property from the state, thereby diminishing the subjects upon which the state power of taxation may operate. The averment to that effect, however, affords no basis for relief, because, not only is the state's right of taxation subordinate to that of the general government, but the anticipated result is purely speculative, and, at the most, only remote and indirect. * * * Plainly, there is no substance in the contention that the state has sustained, or is immediately in danger of sustaining, any direct injury as the result of the enforcement of the act in question."

5. In Massachusetts v. Missouri, 308 U. S. 1, 84 L. ed. 3, 60 Sup. Ct. 39 (1939) the Commonwealth of Massachusetts sought leave to file a bill of complaint in the Supreme Court against the State of Missouri to determine whether, under reciprocal provisions of the tax laws of the defendant state, the complainant state was the one which could levy a succession, transfer or inheritance tax in respect of a trust created by a deceased resident but having a situs in the defendant state. In denying Massachusetts leave to file the bill of complaint the court said: "The proposed bill of complaint does not present a justiciable controversy between the States. To constitute such a controversy, it must appear that the complaining State has suffered a wrong through the action of the other State which is susceptible of judicial enforcement according to the accepted principles of the common law or equity systems of jurisprudence. * * * Missouri, in claiming a right to recover taxes from the respondent trustees, or in taking proceedings for collection, is not injuring Massachusetts. By the allegations, the property held in Missouri is amply sufficient to answer the claims of both States and recovery by either does not impair the exercise of any right the other may have. It is not shown that there is danger of the depletion of a fund or estate at the expense of the complainant's interest. It is not shown that the tax claims of the two States are mutually exclusive. On the contrary, the validity of each claim is wholly independent of that of the other and, in the light of our recent decisions, may constitutionally be pressed by each State without conflict in point of fact or law with the decision of the other."

McCHORD v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1902.

183 U. S. 483, 46 L. ed. 289, 22 Sup. Ct. 165.

These are appeals from the final decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, perpetually enjoining Charles C. McChord and others, railroad commissioners of the State of Kentucky, from doing any of the things required by, or from taking any action whatever against complainants under a certain act of the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, approved March 10, 1900, c. 2, * * *

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the Court.

By the decrees the Railroad Commission of the Commonwealth of Kentucky was permanently restrained from proceeding under the act of March 10, 1900, which was alleged and held to be unconstitutional.

Conceding that the mere fact that a duly enacted law is unconstitutional does not entitle a party to relief by injunction against proceedings in compliance therewith, it is contended that ground of equity jurisdiction existed here in the want of adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of law for the threatened consequences of the exercise of the power to fix rates in multiplicity of suits and irreparable injury. * * *

The fixing of rates is essentially legislative in its character, and the general rule is that legislative action cannot be interfered with by injunction. * * *

In New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. New Orleans, 164 U. S. 471, 472, the general rule was stated and applied, and Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "We repeat that when the city council shall pass an ordinance that infringes the rights of the plaintiff, and is unconstitutional and void as impairing the obligation of its contract with the state, it will be time enough for equity to interfere, and, by injunction to prevent the execution of such ordinance. If the ordinances already passed are in derogation of the plaintiff's contract rights, their enforcement can be prevented by appropriate proceedings instituted directly against the parties who seek to have the benefit of them. This may involve the plaintiff in a multiplicity of actions. But that circumstance cannot justify any such decree as it asks."

The rule was also applied by Mr. Justice Field in Alpers v. San Francisco, 32 Fed. Rep. 503, where complainant sought an injunction to restrain the passage of an ordinance which he alleged would impair the obligation of a contract he had with the city. Mr. Justice Field said: "This no one will question as applied to the power of the legislature of the state. The suggestion of any such jurisdiction of the court over that body would not be entertained for a moment. The same exemption from judicial interference applies to all legislative bodies, so far as their legislative discretion extends. * * * The courts cannot in the one case forbid the passage of a law nor in the other the passage of a resolution, order or ordinance. If by either body, the legislature or the board of supervisors, an unconstitutional act be passed, its enforcement may be arrested. The parties seeking to execute the invalid act can be reached by the courts, while the legislative body of the state or of the municipality, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, is beyond their jurisdiction. The fact that in either case the legislative action threatened may be in disregard of constitutional restraints, and impair the obligation of a contract, as alleged in this case, does not affect the question. It is legislative discretion which is exercised, and that discretion, whether rightfully or wrongfully exercised, is not subject to interference by the judiciary." * * *

The result of these considerations is that the duty of enforcing its rates rests on the commission and that none of the consequences alleged to be threatened can be set up as the basis of equity interposition before the rates are fixed at all. Whether after they are determined their enforcement can be restrained is a question not arising for decision on this record, and we are not called on to dispose of other contentions of grave importance, which were pressed in argument, as if now requiring adjudication.

Decrees reversed and cases remanded to the Circuit Court with a direction to sustain the demurrers and dismiss the bills.

NOTES

1. The principle of the separation of governmental powers operates to limit the judicial branch in its relations with the legislative and executive departments. No court will attempt to exert its power to enjoin a legislative body from enacting a proposed measure into law nor compel it to perform duties imposed upon it by the constitution. The legislative responsibility is political in character and a court would have no practicable means of enforcing its order.

"Being a co-ordinate branch of the state government, distinct from and independent of the judiciary, it is unquestionably true that the legislature is not amenable to the courts. They have no power to interfere in any manner with the proceedings of either of its component branches, or with the action of their respective clerks in making up the journals of their proceedings, so long as they are acting in obedience to the will of those bodies. This proposition is self-evident, otherwise the judiciary would be superior to the legislative branch of the government." Fox v. Harris, 79 W. Va. 419, 423, 91 S. E. 209 (1916).

2. There is some divergence of view as to whether the rate-making function is legislative or judicial. In Prentiss v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 211 U. S. 210, 53 L. ed. 150, 29 Sup. Ct. 67 (1908) the Supreme Court reasserted the view that the fixing of rates by a state administrative body is a legislative act. Two leading decisions sustaining state statutes which vested rate-making functions in state courts are In re Janvrin, 174 Mass. 514, 55 N. E. 381, 47 L. R. A. 319 (1899), and People ex rel. Central Park, N. & E. R. R. Co. v. Willcox, 194 N. Y. 383, 87 N. E. 517 (1909). The weight of authority seems to support the view that the function is legislative. It is, however, generally recognized that to determine whether existing or prescribed rates are unreasonable or confiscatory is a judicial function. The cases are discussed in Note, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529 (1907).

3. In many cases the enforcement of rates fixed by state commissions has been enjoined by a federal court when the rates have been found by the court to be so low as to be "confiscatory" and therefore in violation of the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution,—that is, the executive or administrative, not the legislative, action of the commissions has been enjoined. "The principle is not confined to the maintenance of suits for restraining the enforcement of statutes which as enacted by the state legislature are in themselves unconstitutional. Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 154 U. S. 362, 390, 38 L. ed. 1014, 14 Sup. Ct. 1047, was a case not of an unconstitutional statute, but of confiscatory, and therefore unconstitutional, action taken by a state commission under a constitutional statute. * * * In Raymond v. Chicago Union Traction Co., 207 U. S. 20, 38, 52 L. ed. 78, 28 Sup. Ct. 7, 12 Ann. Cas. 757, the court upheld the right of action in a federal court to restrain the collection of taxes that had been assessed at a different rate and by a different method from that employed with respect to other taxpayers of the same class, in defiance of the provisions of a constitutional statute that required equalization, and also in denial of the equal protection of the laws within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment." Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co., 244 U. S. 499, 507, 61 L. ed. 1280, 37 Sup. Ct. 673 (1917).

In recent decisions the Supreme Court has given evidence of its disinclination to interfere with the state rate-making process. At all events, it is much less likely today to hold that a rate fixed by a state commission is confiscatory than it was during the earlier years of this century. See Federal Power Commission v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., 315 U. S. 575, 86 L. ed. 1037, 62 Sup. Ct. 736 (1942); Federal Power Commission v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U. S. 591, 88 L. ed. 333, 64 Sup. Ct. 281 (1944). Also, the Johnson Act (28 U. S. C. § 1342) provides that federal district courts shall not enjoin the operation of, or compliance with, any order affecting rates chargeable by a public utility and made by a state administrative agency or a rate-making body of a state political subdivision, where jurisdiction is based solely on diversity of citizenship or repugnance of the order to the federal Constitution, and the order does not interfere with interstate commerce, has been made after reasonable notice and hearing, and a plain, speedy and efficient remedy may be had in the state courts.

EX PARTE YOUNG.

[The case turned upon the question whether the United States Circuit (now District) Court had jurisdiction of a bill to enjoin the Attorney General and the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, of the State of Minnesota, from enforcing against the Northern Pacific Railway a state statute which provided for the regulation of railroad rates in a manner alleged to be unconstitutional. The bill was filed the day before the legislation was to take effect. The decision of the Circuit Court that it had jurisdiction was affirmed in the following opinion:]

MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

This inquiry necessitates an examination of the most material and important objection made to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, the objection being that the suit is, in effect, one against the State of Minnesota, and that the injunction issued against the Attorney General illegally prohibits state action, either criminal or civil, to enforce obedience to the statutes of the state. * * * The Eleventh Amendment prohibits the commencement or prosecution of any suit against one of the United States by citizens of another state or citizens or subjects of any foreign State. * * * It applies to a suit brought against a state by one of its own citizens as well as to a suit brought by a citizen of another state. Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S. 1. * * * Osborn v. United States Bank (1824), 9 Wheat. 738, 846, 857, * * * held that the Amendment applied only to those suits in which the state was a party, on the record. In the subsequent case of Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo (1828), 1 Pet. 110, 122, 123, that holding was somewhat enlarged, and Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, while citing Osborn v. United States Bank, supra, said that where the claim was made, as in the case then before the court, against the Governor of Georgia as governor, and the demand was made upon him, not personally, but officially (for moneys in the treasury of the state and for slaves in possession of the state government), the state might be considered as the party on the record and therefore the suit could not be maintained. * * *

The cases upon the subject were reviewed, and it was held, In re Ayers, 123 U. S. 443, that a bill in equity brought against officers of a state, who, as individuals, have no personal interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and defend only as representing the state, where the relief prayed for, if done, would constitute a performance by the state of the alleged contract of the state, was a suit against the state, following in this respect Hagood v. Southern, supra. [117 U. S. 52, 67.]

A suit of such a nature was simply an attempt to make the state itself, through its officers, perform its alleged contract, by directing those officers to do acts which constituted such performance. The state alone had any interest in the question, and a decree in favor of plaintiff would affect the treasury of the state.

On the other hand, United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, determined that an individual in possession of real estate under the Government of the United States, which claimed to be its owner, was, nevertheless, properly sued by the plaintiff, as owner, to recover possession, and such suit was not one against the United States, although the individual in possession justified such possession under its authority. See also Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 204, to the same effect. * * *

The various authorities we have referred to furnish ample justification for the assertion that individuals, who, as officers of the state, are clothed with some duty in regard to the enforcement of the laws of the State, and who threaten and are about to commence proceedings, either of a civil or criminal nature, to enforce against parties affected an unconstitutional act, violating the federal Constitution, may be enjoined by a Federal court of equity from such action.

In making an officer of the state a party defendant in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an act alleged to be unconstitutional it is plain that such officer must have some connection with the enforcement of the act, or else it is merely making him a party as a representative of the state, and thereby attempting to make the state a party.

It is also argued that the only proceeding which the Attorney General could take to enforce the statute, so far as his office is concerned, was one by mandamus, which would be commenced by the state in its sovereign and governmental character, and that the right to bring such action is a necessary attribute of a sovereign government. It is contended that the complainants do not complain and they care nothing about any action which Mr. Young might take or bring as an ordinary individual, but that he was complained of as an officer, to whose discretion is confided the use of the name of the State of Minnesota so far as litigation is concerned, and that when or how he shall use it is a matter resting in his discretion and cannot be controlled by any court.

The answer to all this is the same as made in every case where an official claims to be acting under the authority of the state. The act to be enforced is alleged to be unconstitutional, and if it be so, the use of the name of the state to enforce an unconstitutional act to the injury of complainants is a proceeding without the authority of and one which does not affect the state in its sovereign or governmental capacity. It is simply an illegal act upon the part of a state official in attempting by the use of the name of the state to enforce a legislative enactment which is void because unconstitutional. If the act which the state Attorney General seeks to enforce be a violation of the federal Constitution, the officer in proceeding under such enactment comes into conflict with the superior authority of that Constitution, and he is in that case stripped of his official or representative character and is subjected in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct. The state has no power to impart to him any immunity from responsibility to the supreme authority of the United States. See In re Ayres, supra, page 507. It would be an injury to complainant to harass it with a multiplicity of suits or litigation generally in an endeavor to enforce penalties under an unconstitutional enactment, and to prevent it ought to be within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. If the question of unconstitutionality with reference, at least, to the federal Constitution be first raised in a federal court that court, as we think is shown by the authorities cited hereafter, has the right to decide it to the exclusion of all other courts. * * *

It is further objected that there is a plain and adequate remedy at law open to the complainants and that a court of equity, therefore, has no jurisdiction in such case. It has been suggested that the proper way to test the constitutionality of the act is to disobey it, at least once, after which the company might obey the act pending subsequent proceedings to test its validity. * * * Another obstacle to making the test on the part of the company might be to find an agent or employee who would disobey the law, with a possible fine and imprisonment staring him in the face if the act should be held valid. * * * If, however, one should be found and the prosecutor should elect to proceed against him, the defense that the act was invalid, because the rates established by it were too low, would require a long and difficult examination of quite complicated facts upon which the validity of the act depended. Such investigation it would be almost impossible to make before a jury, as such body could not intelligently pass upon the matter. * * *

To await proceedings against the company in a state court grounded upon a disobedience of the act, and then, if necessary, obtain a review in this court by writ of error to the highest state court, would place the company in peril of large loss and its agents in great risk of fines and imprisonment if it should be finally determined that the act was valid. This risk the company ought not to be required to take. Over eleven thousand millions of dollars, it is estimated, are invested in railroad property, owned by many thousands of people who are scattered over the whole country from ocean to ocean, and they are entitled to equal protection from the laws and from the courts, with the owners of all other kinds of property, no more, no less. The courts having jurisdiction, federal or state, should at all times be open to them as well as to others, for the purpose of protecting their property and their legal rights.

[Mr. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered a dissenting opinion.]

NOTES

1. If the attempted enforcement of the Minnesota statute by Mr. Young, the Attorney-General, was not state action since Mr. Young was merely an individual wrongdoer, how could the Supreme Court hold, as it did, that the State of Minnesota had denied due process of law to the railroad company? The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is directed only toward state action. Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 27 L. ed. 835, 3 Sup. Ct. 18 (1883). In Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U. S. 278, 57 L. ed. 510, 33 Sup. Ct. 312 (1913) the Supreme Court, rejected the contention that the Fourteenth Amendment "deals only with the acts of state officers within the strict scope of the public powers possessed by them and does not include an abuse of power by an officer as the result of a wrong done in excess of the power delegated."

2. If a taxpayer sues a state treasurer to recover a tax which he alleges has been illegally collected by the state, is this a suit against the state? Smith v. Reeves, 178 U. S. 436, 44 L. ed. 1140, 20 Sup. Ct. 919 (1900) was an action brought against the state treasurer of California in his official capacity by the receiver of a railroad corporation to compel the state, through him, to perform its promise to return to taxpayers money alleged to have been taken under an illegal assessment. The Supreme Court said that this was in substance an action against the state itself, within the meaning of the Eleventh Amendment. In other words, whether a suit is one against a state is determined not by the names of the parties to the action but by the essential nature and effect of the proceeding as they appear from the entire record.

3. In his dissenting opinion in Ex parte Young Mr. Justice Harlan argued that where the question at issue is the constitutionality of a state statute the Attorney-General of a state should not be considered an individual wrongdoer in bringing suit on behalf of the state in its own courts to test the statute. If the state court decides the federal questions wrongly, its decision can of course be corrected by carrying the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. If the Attorney-General is doing no individual wrong in bringing suit on behalf of his state, any attempt to control his purely official acts is in effect an effort to prevent the state from acting, that is, to prevent the state from securing a determination of the validity of its own laws in its own courts. He thought the framers of the Eleventh Amendment "would have been amazed" by the court's decision.

4. A bill was filed in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Arkansas by a telegraph company asking that the prosecuting attorneys of the seventeen judicial districts of the State of Arkansas be enjoined from instituting proceedings to enforce against the company the penal provisions of the Arkansas statute alleged to be in violation of the federal Constitution. The court decreed dismissal of the bill, asserting that this was a suit against the state and therefore not within the court's jurisdiction. On the authority of the principal case the Supreme Court reversed the decree. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Andrews, 216 U. S. 165, 54 L. ed. 430, 30 Sup. Ct. 286 (1910).

5. Six wholesalers and retailers in Florida on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated joined in a suit to test the validity of a Florida statute which required all merchants who offered trading stamps with goods to pay license fees and made violation of the statute a criminal offense. They alleged that the statute was unconstitutional, that its enforcement was threatened, and if it materialized would injure their business. They sought an injunction to restrain "the tax collectors of each county in the state, the different state's attorneys, county solicitors and prosecuting attorneys of the circuits and counties of the State of Florida." The federal District Court took jurisdiction, held the statute invalid and granted the injunction. On appeal the Supreme Court concurred in the view that the District Court had jurisdiction but reversed on the ground that the statute was valid. Rast v. Van Deman & Lewis Co., 240 U. S. 342, 60 L. ed. 679, 36 Sup. Ct. 370 (1916).

6. On the ground of threatened injury to business, a sugar refining company obtained a decision that a statute complained of was unconstitutional and an injunction restraining the inspector of sugar refining, the Governor and the Attorney-General of Louisiana. This decree of the United States District Court was affirmed by the Supreme Court. McFarland v. American Sugar Refining Co., 241 U. S. 79, 60 L. ed. 899, 36 Sup. Ct. 498 (1916).

7. Tyson & Bro.—United Theatre Ticket Officers v. Banton, 273 U. S. 418, 71 L. ed. 718, 47 Sup. Ct. 426, 58 A. L. R. 1236 (1927) was an appeal from a decree of a federal district court denying a temporary injunction in a suit brought by appellant, a licensed ticket-broker corporation in New York, to restrain the District Attorney of New York County and the State Comptroller from forfeiting its license and prosecuting criminal proceedings, under the state law, because of appellant's failure to conform to a provision thereof limiting the price at which it could resell a theatre ticket to fifty cents in advance of the box-office price. The bill alleged that the terms of the statute were so drastic and the penalties for its violation so great that appellant would be compelled to submit to the statute whether valid or invalid unless its suit be entertained, and thereby would be deprived of its property without due process of law. The Supreme Court said that "equitable jurisdiction exists to restrain criminal prosecutions under unconstitutional enactments, when the prevention of such prosecutions is essential to the safeguarding of rights of property." It then held the statute invalid as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment and reversed the decree of the lower court.

CAVANAUGH v. LOONEY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1919.
248 U. S. 453, 63 L. ed. 354, 39 Sup. Ct. 142.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The University of Texas is a state institution under immediate control of officers known as Regents, appointed by the Governor, with its principal educational departments in Travis and Galveston counties. An act of the legislature, approved August 30, 1911 (S. B. No. 20, c. 6, General Laws, Texas), undertook to authorize the Regents to purchase or condemn through proceedings in the district courts such lands within those counties as they might deem expedient for extension of campus or other university purposes. Appellants have long owned and used as a residence homestead twenty-six acres in Travis County desirable as an addition to the university grounds. Having failed in their efforts to purchase, the Regents were about to meet and ask the Attorney General to institute proceedings to condemn this entire tract. Thereupon appellants instituted this proceeding against them and the Attorney General in the United States District Court seeking to restrain their threatened action "on the ground among others that said law conflicts with the Constitution of the United States, * * *."

A special court [of three judges] assembled as provided by § 266 Judicial Code, denied application for preliminary injunction without opinion and allowed this direct appeal.

It is now settled doctrine "that individuals, who, as officers of the state, are clothed with some duty in regard to the enforcement of laws of the state, and who threaten and are about to commence proceedings, either of a civil or criminal nature, to enforce against parties affected an unconstitutional act, violating the federal Constitution, may be enjoined by a federal court of equity from such action." Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 155, 156; [other citations are omitted]. But no such injunction "ought to be granted unless in a case reasonably free from doubt," and when necessary to prevent great and irreparable injury. Ex parte Young, supra, 166. The jurisdiction should be exercised only where intervention is essential in order effectually to protect property rights against injuries otherwise irremediable.

When considered in connection with established rules of law relating to the power of eminent domain, complainants' allegation of threatened "irreparable loss and damage" appears fanciful. The detailed circumstances negative such view and rather tend to support the contrary one. Nothing indicates that any objections to the validity of the statute could not be presented in an orderly way before the state court where defendants intended to institute condemnation proceedings; and if by any chance the state courts should finally deny a federal right the appropriate and adequate remedy by review here is obvious. Exercising a wise discretion we think the court below properly denied an injunction. Upon the record it was not called upon to inquire narrowly into the disputable points urged against the statute. No more are we.

The judgment of the court below is

Affirmed.

NOTES

1. In Spielman Motor Sales Co. v. Dodge, 295 U. S. 89, 79 L. ed. 1322, 55 Sup. Ct. 678 (1935) the motor sales company brought a bill in the United States District Court to enjoin the District Attorney of New York County from instituting a criminal prosecution for alleged violation of the Code of Fair Competition for the motor vehicle trade, a misdemeanor by a New York statute which plaintiff alleged to be unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment. The charge of violation of the code related to the provisions which limited the amount to be allowed for an old car traded in as part payment for a new car and required the maintenance of factory list prices, plus certain charges, with a prohibition against giving discounts or gratuities to induce purchases. The district court dismissed the bill, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, for the court, said in part: "The general rule is that equity will not interfere to prevent the enforcement of a criminal statute even though unconstitutional. * * * To justify such interference there must be exceptional circumstances and a clear showing that an injunction is necessary in order to afford adequate protection of constitutional rights. * * * Aside from the statement of general and unsupported conclusions, the case presented by the bill was the ordinary one of a criminal prosecution which would afford appropriate opportunity for the assertion of appellant's rights. So far as the bill disclosed, nothing more than a single prosecution was in contemplation, a point which the District Attorney emphasized by his disclaimer, on the hearing below, of any intention to institute any further prosecution against appellant until his rights, constitutional or otherwise, had been adjudicated in the pending criminal proceeding." See also Douglas v. Jeannette, 319 U. S. 157, 87 L. ed. 1324, 63 Sup. Ct. 877 (1943), where the Supreme Court, through Mr. Chief Justice Stone, emphasized the view expressed in the Spielman case.

2. The doctrine of Ex parte Young that a state officer who seeks to enforce an unconstitutional statute is thereby "stripped of his official or representative character" and becomes a mere individual wrongdoer subject to restraint by a federal court is sometimes referred to as the "stripping doctrine." Its ostensible justification is that a state is not entitled to erect an unfair barrier—either through the imposition of severe penalties or some other method—to a litigant's attempt to obtain a judicial determination of the validity of legislation which is about to be enforced against him and which adversely affects his property rights. But even where the elements are present to make the "stripping doctrine" applicable, the plaintiff must make an adequate showing of threatened irreparable injury in order to satisfy the requirements for injunctive relief. Cavanaugh v. Looney and subsequent cases clearly evidence a tightening of this requirement and show that the Supreme Court has become more insistent upon "exceptional circumstances" and "exceptional and irreparable injury" in order to sustain a "stripping doctrine" suit.

3. One of the main sources of dissatisfaction with the decision of Ex parte Young lay in the fact that it sanctioned a practice whereby a single federal judge, virtually without notice and in an ex parte proceeding, could restrain the enforcement by a state official or a state administrative agency of a state statute. In an effort to deal with this aspect of the problem, Congress in 1910 wrote into the law the mandatory requirement of a three-judge federal District Court where either an interlocutory or permanent injunction is sought restraining the enforcement, operation or execution of any state statute by a state officer, or of an order made by an administrative board or commission acting under state statutes, in cases where such relief is sought upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute. (For the present form of this provision see 28 U. S. C. §§ 2281, 2284.) Provision is made for the expeditious handling of such cases by permitting direct appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order granting or denying the interlocutory or permanent injunction. (28 U. S. C. § 1253.)

Federal interference with the state rate-making process was further curtailed in 1934 by the Johnson Act (28 U. S. C. § 1342), which deprives United States district courts of substantially all jurisdiction to enjoin the enforcement of public utility rates fixed by state administrative agencies or rate-making bodies where a plain, speedy and efficient remedy may be had in the state courts. See Note, Limitation of Lower Federal Court Jurisdiction Over Public Utility Rate Cases, 44 Yale L. J. 119 (1934), 4 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 1196; Heineman and Vail, The Johnson Act, 30 Ill. L. Rev. 215 (1935).

4. In California v. Latimer, 305 U. S. 255, 83 L. ed. 159, 59 Sup. Ct. 166 (1938), California sued in a federal court to enjoin certain federal officers from enforcing against its state-owned State Belt Railroad two federal statutes under which if valid the railroad was required to pay a federal tax as a contribution to a federal fund out of which aged employees of this and other railroads engaged in interstate commerce were to be paid federal pensions, alleging that these statutes were constitutionally inapplicable to the State Belt Railroad. The Supreme Court held that the bill should be dismissed without deciding the constitutional question. Under the federal tax laws the taxpayer after payment may sue to recover the payment and in that suit test the validity of the tax. Such a suit for a refund could not be brought until six months after payment, but the court said that tying up the state's money for that length of time did not constitute a "special circumstance" of irreparable injury within the rule. "For aught that appears prompt payment of the tax and claim of refund would have led to an early determination of the liability here contested."

Section 3.—The Effect of Unconstitutionality.

NORTON v. SHELBY COUNTY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1886.
118 U. S. 425, 30 L. ed. 178, 6 Sup. Ct. 1121.

[A Tennessee statute purported to alter the county government of Shelby county by substituting a board of commissioners in lieu of the existing governing board called the "County Court" which was composed of elected justices of the peace. The statute purported to confer all the powers of the County Court upon the commissioners, including its power to issue county bonds in exchange for shares in a railway company, as an aid to the construction of the road. Within a month after the enactment of the statute the justices of the peace brought suit in an inferior state court to test its validity and from a judgment against them they appealed to the state supreme court. Pending this appeal the commissioners issued the bonds in question, in conformity with the statute. On the appeal the state supreme court held the statute invalid, that the old County Court was recognized in the state constitution and could not be supplanted by the legislature. A few years later Norton brought suit on some of the bonds in a Circuit Court of the United States which gave judgment for the county. On writ of error:]

MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

But it is contended that if the act creating the board was void, and the commissioners were not officers de jure, they were nevertheless officers de facto, and that the acts of the board as a de facto court are binding upon the county. This contention is met by the fact that there can be no officer, either de jure or de facto, if there be no office to fill. As the act attempting to create the office of commissioner never became a law, the office never came into existence. Some persons pretended that they held the office, but the law never recognized their pretensions, nor did the supreme court of the state. Whenever such pretensions were considered in that court, they were declared to be without any legal foundation, and the commissioners were held to be usurpers.

The doctrine which gives validity to acts of officers de facto, whatever defects there may be in the legality of their appointment or election, is founded upon considerations of policy and necessity, for the protection of the public and individuals whose interests may be affected thereby. Officers are created for the benefit of the public, and private parties are not permitted to inquire into the title of persons clothed with the evidence of such offices and in apparent possession of their powers and functions. For the good order and peace of society their authority is to be respected and obeyed until in some regular mode prescribed by law their title is investigated and determined. It is manifest that endless confusion would result if in every proceeding before such officers their title could be called in question. But the idea of an officer implies the existence of an office which he holds. It would be a misapplication of terms to call one an officer who holds no office, and a public office can exist only by force of law. This seems to us so obvious that we should hardly feel called upon to consider any adverse opinion on the subject but for the earnest contention of plaintiff's counsel that such existence is not essential, and that it is sufficient if the office be provided for by any legislative enactment, however invalid. Their position is, that a legislative act, though unconstitutional, may in terms create an office, and nothing further than its apparent existence is necessary to give validity to the acts of its assumed incumbent. That position, although not stated in this broad form, amounts to nothing else. It is difficult to meet it by any argument beyond this statement. An unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed. * * *

It remains to consider whether the action of the commissioners in subscribing for stock of the Mississippi River Railroad Company and issuing the bonds, of which those in suit are a part, being originally invalid, was afterwards ratified by the county. * * *

It is unnecessary to pursue this subject further. We are satisfied that none of the positions taken by the plaintiff can be sustained. The original invalidity of the acts of the commissioners has never been subsequently cured. It may be, as alleged, that the stock of the railroad company, for which they subscribed, is still held by the county. If so, the county may, by proper proceedings, be required to surrender it to the company, or to pay its value; for, independently of all restrictions upon municipal corporations, there is a rule of justice that must control them as it controls individuals. If they obtain the property of others without right, they must return it to the true owners, or pay for its value. But questions of that nature do not arise in this case. Here it is simply a question as to the validity of the bonds in suit, and as that cannot be sustained, the judgment below must be

NOTE

1. The view of the principal case that a statute held to be unconstitutional is without legal force and effect from the time of its enactment, or void ab initio, has been applied in many cases which have imposed civil liability upon public officers who have taken official action in reliance on such statute. E.g., Campbell v. Sherman, 35 Wis. 103 (1874); Warren v. Kelley, 80 Me. 512, 15 Atl. 49 (1888); Sumner v. Beeler, 50 Ind. 341, 19 Am. Rep. 718 (1875).

STATE v. GODWIN.

Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1898.
123 N. Car. 697, 31 S. E. 221.

MONTGOMERY, J.: The defendants were justices of the peace and by virtue of their office (Code, Section 2014) were a board of supervisors and were required to look after the public roads in their townships. They were required also (Code, Section 2015) to hold stated meetings for the purpose of consulting on the condition of the roads, and, by Section 2024 of The Code, to make to the Superior Court at term time an annual report of the condition of the roads. The General Assembly of 1897 in Chapter 514 undertook to repeal the provisions of The Code, above referred to, as to Hertford County, and to impose upon others the duties required of the defendants. The defendants after the enactment of Act of 1897, failed and refused to discharge the duties enjoined upon them under the provisions of the former law (The Code) and they were indicted on account of such failure and refusal. The Act of 1897, in its entirety, is contrary to the provisions of our State Constitution and is therefore void.

The question for decision then is, is one who is a public officer under a former provision of law compelled under pain of indictment and punishment to perform the duties of the office during the time when there was on the statute books a subsequent [repealing] act unconstitutional in all its provisions? The matter is an important one both to the public and to the individual. With us, public office is a public trust and public officers are merely the agents of the people. * * * What an anomalous state of things would we have then, if a person believing himself to be a public officer, because of the discharge of the duties which he thought he owed to the public, should afterwards be indicted and punished because the courts had held the act, which created the office and prescribed its duties, to be against the provisions of the constitution and void. Such a proposition would be equivalent to declaring that the individual office holder must be wiser than the whole people represented in their general assembly. Such a proposition to us seems opposed to every idea of justice. It could not be true. The criminal law cannot be invoked to punish one who acts as a public officer—as an agent of the people—and who in the discharge of a public duty had obeyed an act of the law-making power even though the law be unconstitutional, unless the act itself had required the committal of a crime—a thought which could not be entertained for a moment. And it makes no difference that in the case before the court the defendants are indicted for a refusal to perform certain duties under a former law attempted to be repealed by a subsequent unconstitutional statute and not for doing positive acts under an unconstitutional law. The principle is the same in both cases. The defendants here cannot be punished under the criminal law for failing and refusing to perform the duties of an office which office and the duties pertaining to it had been sought to be repealed by a subsequent act of the legislature, afterwards declared by the courts to be unconstitutional. Until the subsequent statute was declared to be unconstitutional by competent authority, the defendants, under every idea of justice and under our theory of government had a right to presume that the law-making power had acted within the bounds of the constitution, and their highest duty was to obey.

It is not necessary, to a proper determination of this case, to go into the realm of the effect of contracts, executed or executory, made by a person claiming to be a public officer, but where there is no lawfully created office. The counsel for the prosecution cited to the court, in support of his position, the case of Norton v. Shelby Co., 118 U. S. 425, and especially to that portion of the opinion wherein it was declared by the court that "an unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never passed." The opinion in that case was rendered upon the effect of an executory contract made by one who claimed to be a public officer, the office having been created without authority of law. For the reasons given in this opinion, the case of Norton v. Shelby Co., supra, does not apply to the facts in this case. Upon the special verdict the judgment of the court below was that the defendants were not guilty, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

1. The principal case is representative of the view that it is unjust to subject public officers to civil or criminal liability for acts done in reliance upon statutes subsequently held to be unconstitutional or for refusing to act under statutes apparently repealed by statutes subsequently held to be unconstitutional. See also Henke v. McCord, 55 Iowa 378, 7 N. W. 623 (1880); Brooks v. Mangan, 86 Mich. 576, 49 N. W. 633, 24 Am. St. 137 (1891); Bohri v. Barnett, 144 Fed. 389 (1906).

A judgment which results from applying as the law of the case an unconstitutional statute is at worst an erroneous judgment, but it is not a "void" judgment if the court's jurisdiction of the case does not depend upon the statute. Brandhoefer v. Bain, 45 Nebr. 781, 64 N. W. 213 (1895). For instances in which justices of the peace acted wholly without jurisdiction see Heller v. Clarke, 121 Wis. 71, 98 N. W. 952 (1904); De Courcey v. Cox, 94 Cal. 665, 30 Pac. 95 (1892).

2. Individuals who have relied upon the decision of the highest court of a state as to the constitutionality of a statute have sometimes been protected from the legal consequences of their conduct in the event of a subsequent decision of the same court declaring its prior adjudication erroneous. State v. O'Neil, 147 Iowa 513, 126 N. W. 454, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 691 (1910). Cf. State v. Striggles, 202 Iowa 1318, 210 N. W. 137 (1926), where it was held that defendant could not rely upon the decision of an inferior state court to justify his act.

3. The principle of State v. O'Neil has been applied to decisions of an administrative agency with respect to statutory construction. Thus where a private person without a permit sold securities of a kind that a state statute, when subsequently construed by a court, required a permit be previously obtained from the corporation commissioner of the state, he was held not criminally responsible because, before selling the certificates, he was advised by the commissioner that no permit was required for selling the kind he sold. People v. Ferguson, 134 Cal. App. 41, 24 Pac. (2d) 965 (1933).

4. A state statute of 1925 fixed a speed limit of 30 miles per hour. An act of 1929 "was generally taken to have repealed the former law." Defendant in 1930, while driving a little in excess of 30 miles per hour, caused the death of another and was convicted of involuntary manslaughter on the ground of criminal negligence predicated on his violation of the act of 1925. On appeal the State Supreme Court held the repealing act unconstitutional and regarded it as not therefore repealing the act of 1925, but also exonerated the defendant on the ground that he relied upon the repealing act. Claybrook v. State, 164 Tenn. 440, 51 S. W. (2d) 499 (1932), noted in 17 Minn. L. Rev. 322 (1933).

5. A state statute made dentists' licenses revocable for specified misconduct. After the Circuit Court of the circuit in which a dentist resided had held the statute unconstitutional, a dentist did some of the forbidden acts. Subsequently the state Supreme Court held the statute valid, but also held that the dentist's license could not be revoked for the intervening acts. State ex rel. Williams v. Whitman, 116 Fla. 196, 150 So. 136, 156 So. 705, 95 A. L. R. 1416 (1934). Note that here the power to adjudicate revocation of licenses was lodged in an administrative board. The Supreme Court held in effect that this board was bound by the Supreme Court's rule that the license could not be revoked for intervening acts.

6. So far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, a state court has freedom of choice either to give retroactive effect to any decision by it that overrules a former decision or to give such a decision prospective effect only, if it chooses that alternative. In Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Sunburst Oil & Refining Co., 287 U. S. 358, 364-365, 77 L. ed. 360, 366-367, 53 Sup. Ct. 145, 85 A. L. R. 254 (1932), Mr. Justice Cardozo, speaking for the Court, said: "A state in defining the limits of adherence to precedent may make a choice for itself between the principle of forward operation and that of relation backward. It may say that decisions of its highest court, though later overruled, are law none the less for intermediate transactions. * * * On the other hand, it may hold to the ancient dogma that the law declared by its courts had a Platonic or ideal existence before the act of declaration, in which event the discredited declaration will be viewed as if it had never been, and the reconsidered declaration as law from the beginning. * * *

STATE v. GARDNER.

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1896.

54 Ohio St. 24, 42 N. E. 999, 31 L. R. A. 660.

BRADBURY, J. At the September term of the Court of Common Pleas of Summit County, Omar N. Gardner was indicted for offering a bribe to Joseph Hugill, a city commissioner of the city of Akron. The accused demurred to the indictment on the ground that the act of April 20, 1893, under which Hugill was performing the duties of his office, was unconstitutional and void. The demurrer was sustained and the defendant discharged. To this holding of the court the prosecuting attorney excepted, and, by virtue of the provisions of sections 7305, 7306, 7307 and 7308 of the Revised Statutes, has brought the question to this court for review. Two questions are presented by the record: First, whether the act of April 20, 1893, which provides a municipal government for the city of Akron, is unconstitutional or not, and second, if unconstitutional, whether its constitutionality may be assailed in the collateral way undertaken by the accused. The first question which logically arises is the latter of the two; for if the accused should not be allowed to raise the question, in the way he attempted, it follows that the constitutionality of the act which created the office was not before the court. Whether an act of the general assembly creating an office and providing a method for filling it may be collaterally attacked, is a question of the utmost importance in the practical administration of governmental affairs. Different courts have decided the question differently. Leach v. The People, 122 Ill. 420; Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 31 Minn. 472; Coyle v. Com., 104 Pa. St. 117; Mechem on Pub. Off., §§ 318, 327; Van Fleet on Collateral Attack, § 21, p. 33; Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425; Hildreth v. McIntire, 1 J. J. Marsh 206.

It is now before this court for the first time, and while we are not insensible to the consideration justly due to the high standing of those courts and authors we are bound to reach that conclusion which, in our judgment, is best sustained by sound reason; and that best comports with an enlightened public policy and the maintenance of public order.

If the official acts of officers acting in an office created by an unconstitutional statute should be regarded as falling within the principle that sustains the act of de facto officers until the statute has been held unconstitutional by competent judicial authority in a proceeding appropriate to that end, all difficulty vanishes. The opposite doctrine is based upon the assertion that there can be no de facto officer unless there is a de jure office. That is a simple and summary way to dispose of this grave question. That there can be no de jure officer without a de jure office is a proposition to which all minds will, of course, assent. But that there can [not] be a de facto officer without a de jure office is disputable if the phrase "de facto officer" includes one who in fact discharges the duties of a public office, recognized by the great body of the people and by virtue of a statute solemnly passed by the general assembly of the state, which may be unconstitutional. That there have been many officers who occupied and discharged the duties of offices created by laws that were afterwards held unconstitutional is a fact well known to every one. While in such occupancy innumerable official acts affecting both public and private rights may have been actually performed by them, the duration of the office may, and often does, extend through a series of years. In the case before us the act in question is one creating a municipal government for the city of Akron, and has been in force since its enactment in April, 1893. It superseded an act passed in the year 1891 for the government of that city, which latter act was subject to the same assault that was attempted to be made on the one under consideration. The existing government of the populous and thriving city of Youngstown also rests upon the act now assailed; while that of the city of Springfield depends upon an act, at least as vulnerable to the same attack as the act under consideration. The constitutionality of the governments of the cities of Springfield and Youngstown has not been assailed, even collaterally, and may continue unchallenged for many years. The officers who in these cities occupy offices created by the acts upon which the city government rests, are daily discharging duties affecting the rights of the city, and the private rights of individuals. These officers are either usurpers and trespassers, or de facto officers; if the latter, the rights of the public, or of individuals who have submitted to their authority, or acquiesced in its exercise, would be unaffected by a subsequent authoritative judicial declaration that the statute was unconstitutional; if they were usurpers merely every official act would be a nullity, and interminable confusion possibly follow such a decision. Were such results to follow, the courts might well pause, before declaring unconstitutional an act establishing a city government, unless its constitutionality was challenged upon the threshold of its existence.

The common law in relation to de facto officers had its origin in England. It was there laid upon a foundation as broad as their necessities required. Such a thing as a written constitution controlling legislative action was unknown to their jurisprudence; whatever office parliament chose to create was a de jure office. In the states of the American Union, however, we find written constitutions, limiting the otherwise absolute power of the people to act through the legislative branch of the government. As a consequence of this peculiar feature of our government, a statute, regularly enacted by the legislative branch thereof may, in express terms, create a public office, or it may authorize a municipal corporation to create one; an incumbent may be appointed in the mode prescribed by the statute. He may qualify, enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and continue to discharge those duties indefinitely—possibly for many years—during which he daily performs official acts affecting not only public rights, but private rights of the most sacred character. After all this has occurred, the constitutionality of the statute is successfully challenged, and the statute declared void, and for the first time in the history of the common law its principles must be invoked to ascertain the status of the rights of persons, and of the public, that accrued before the law was declared void.

We think that principle of public policy, declared by the English courts three centuries ago, which gave validity to the official acts of persons who intruded themselves into an office to which they had not been legally appointed, is as applicable to the conditions now presented as they were to the conditions that then confronted the English judiciary. We are not required to find a name by which officers are to be known, who have acted under a statute that has subsequently been declared unconstitutional, though we think such officers might aptly be called "de facto officers." They actually performed official acts authorized by a statute solemnly enacted by the law making department of the government. Such a statute is presumed to be constitutional. Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. County of Clinton Comrs., 1 Ohio St. 77. The unbroken current of authority supports this proposition. * * *

Exceptions sustained. * * *

NOTE

1. An indictment for extortion (exaction of illegal fees) charged that Kirby was a license commissioner and by color of his office extorted. The court said that such an indictment would be good against a de facto officer but that since the statute purporting to create the office was unconstitutional, the "inexorable legal conclusion" was that the indictment was fatally defective because it charged defendant with using for extortionate purposes an office that did not exist. Kirby v. State, 57 N. J. L. 320, 31 Atl. 213 (1894).

LANG v. MAYOR OF BAYONNE.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1907.
74 N. J. L. 455, 68 Atl. 90, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 93, 122 Am. St. 391, 12 Ann. Cas. 961.

[Plaintiff had been appointed a policeman under authority given the city by legislation prior to the act of 1905. A supplement to the act of 1905 purported to create a board of police commissioners with power to appoint and discharge for cause all members of the police force. After trial on charges before the commission it discharged the plaintiff from the force. The plaintiff petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to compel the mayor and chief of police to restore him on the ground that the act of 1905 was invalid. The Supreme Court denied the petition, whereupon he obtained this writ of error.]

GUMMERE, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * * At the term at which the hearing of this cause was had before the Supreme Court, that tribunal had before it for consideration and determination the case of State v. Nealon, 44 Vroom 100, which was a quo warranto proceeding attacking the right of the members of the board of police commissioners of Bayonne to hold their respective offices, on the ground that the supplement of 1905, above referred to, was unconstitutional, and the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court in that case was in favor of this contention.

Notwithstanding the conclusion reached by it in the Nealon case, however, the court considered that * * * the board of police commissioners, at the time when it dismissed the relator from his position as a member of the police force, was a de facto body, exercising a public function under color of right, and that therefore its action in dismissing the relator could not be successfully challenged, * * *.

Plaintiff in error rests his right to a reversal of the judgment against him upon the ground that the conclusion of the Supreme Court that the board of police commissioners of Bayonne, appointed under authority of the supplement of 1905, was a de facto body, notwithstanding the fact that the statute is unconstitutional, is unsound in law, and * * * cites the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Flaucher v. Camden, 27 Vroom 244, as an authority in support of his contention that this question must be answered in the negative. An examination of the opinion in the Flaucher case discloses not only that the legal question there presented for consideration is identical with that which this case presents, but that the conclusion then reached by the Supreme Court is in direct opposition to that announced in the opinion delivered by it in this case. In the earlier case the plaintiff in error was tried in the police court of the city of Camden for selling liquor without a license. His defence was that he held a license from the county board of license commissioners. Notwithstanding this fact he was convicted. On writ of error this conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court. The ground of affirmance was that the statute creating the county board of license commissioners was unconstitutional, as had already been determined by it at the same term in a quo warranto proceeding brought against the members of the board (Loucks v. Bradshaw, Id. 1); that being unconstitutional, the so-called county board of license commissioners never had legal existence, and that consequently the members of the board were neither de jure nor de facto officers; the court declaring that "where the office itself is created by an unconstitutional statute there can be no incumbent either de jure or de facto," and that consequently the license was mere waste paper. The opinion in the Flaucher case is a carefully considered one, and is fully supported by the authorities cited in it * * *, notably by that of Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425. * * * Notwithstanding that Norton v. Shelby County has been frequently cited with approval in other jurisdictions, I am unable to accept as sound the doctrine upon which it is rested, namely, that an unconstitutional law is void ab initio and affords no protection for acts done under its sanction. That it works injustice in its application to the citizen is apparent. The Flaucher case is a pregnant example of the truth of this assertion. The legislature had enacted a general law, making the unlicensed sales of intoxicating liquor a criminal offence, but legalizing such sales when made by a person holding a license from the proper authority. It then, by a subsequent statute, created the county board of license commissioners the proper authority to grant such licenses in the county of Camden. Flaucher applied to, and received from, this board a license to sell liquors at his saloon in the City of Camden. At that time the law creating the county board stood upon the statute book, apparently as valid, as much entitled to be respected and obeyed as the enactment which prohibited the sale of liquor without a license. And yet, notwithstanding that he scrupulously observed the law, as declared by the legislature, he was made a criminal by judicial decision, a decision which in its operation and effect was as much ex post facto as any statute which makes criminal an antecedent act which violated no law at the time when it was done.

The vice of the doctrine of Norton v. Shelby County, as it seems to me, is that it fails to recognize the right of the citizen, which is to accept the law as it is written, and not to be required to determine its validity. The latter is no more the function of the citizen than is the making of the law. Each of these functions has been delegated by the constitution, the one to the judicial and the other to the legislative branch of the government. And it is to be observed that the judicial function of determining the validity of statutes is confined within a very narrow scope. Courts are not vested with the general supervision of legislation. They have received no authority from the people to inspect each statute, as it comes from the hands of the legislature, and declare whether or not it infringes constitutional limitations. The function of the judicial department with respect to legislation deemed unconstitutional is not exercised in rem, but always in personam. Allison v. Corker, 38 Vroom 596. Only such statutes as affect the rights of parties to judicial proceedings are ever subjected to the scrutiny of the courts. And these are comparatively few. Of the twenty-four hundred and more acts of the legislature passed in this state during the last ten years, less than four hundred have received judicial consideration. The remaining two thousand which are upon the statute book (except those which have been repealed by the legislature) are accepted and enforced as a part of the law of the land. And this, in my judgment, is the only way in which a government such as ours can be safely administered. To require the citizen to determine for himself, at his peril, to what extent, if at all, the legislature has overstepped the boundaries defined by the constitution in passing this mass of statutes would be to place upon him an intolerable burden, one which it would be absolutely impossible for him to bear—a duty infinitely beyond his ability to perform. In my opinion the provisions of a solemn act of the legislature, so long as it has not received judicial condemnation, are as binding upon the citizen as is the judgment of a court rendered against him so long as it remains unreversed. * * * So necessary to the successful carrying on of a republican form of government is the principle * * *, that a statute which creates an office and provides an officer to perform its duties must have the force of law until condemned as unconstitutional by the courts, and that in the meantime the officer so provided is an officer de facto, that it is impliedly recognized and acted on, almost universally (so far as my examination has disclosed), in the case of municipal corporations which have been created by unconstitutional laws. Such corporations are declared to be de facto corporations. Dill. Mun. Corp., § 43a; Burt v. Winona, &c., Railroad Co., 31 Minn. 472, and cases cited. And not only so, but courts refuse to permit the legality of their existence to be called into question, except by the state itself, through its attorney-general, and hold that, so long as the state does not see fit to interfere and terminate the existence thereof by direct proceeding brought by the attorney-general, a municipal corporation which has been created by an unconstitutional statute may exercise upon the citizen, through its officers, the powers conferred upon it by the statute as fully and completely as if it was created by a law valid in every particular.

And yet, if it be true that there cannot be such a thing as a de facto officer unless there be a de jure office, on what theory can the acts of such officers be recognized as valid? How can it be true that a law of this character, the validity of which no one but the attorney-general can challenge, and which is permitted to be enforced to the fullest extent against the public, "confers no rights, imposes no duties, affords no protection, creates no office," and "is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as if it had never been passed?" * * *

I conclude that an officer appointed under authority of a statute to fill an office created by the statute is at least a de facto officer, and that acts done by him antecedent to a judicial declaration that the statute is unconstitutional are valid, so far as they involve the interests of the public and of third persons; and the doctrine promulgated by the Supreme Court in Flaucher v. Camden rests upon an unsound basis and should not be followed.

The judgment under review must be affirmed for the reason stated in the opinion delivered in the court below, namely, that the board of police commissioners of Bayonne, at the time of its dismissal of the plaintiff in error from the municipal police force, was a de facto body and its action, therefore, valid as against him.

NOTES

1. Plaintiff secured judgment against defendant in a municipal court. Thereafter the statute creating the municipal court, which had been in operation for six years, was declared unconstitutional. Plaintiff's writ of execution was returned unsatisfied and he secured an order in supplementary proceedings. Defendant appeared specially and moved to terminate the proceedings and strike the judgment on the ground that all the proceedings were void because the court was created under an unconstitutional statute. An order granting defendant's motion was reversed on appeal. The court held that where a court has gone into operation under an apparently valid legislative act, it is to be regarded as a court de facto, and any order or judgment entered antecedent to a determination that the statute creating the court is unconstitutional is valid and binding. Marckel Co. v. Zitzow, 218 Minn. 305, 15 N. W. (2d) 777 (1944), noted in 29 Minn. L. Rev. 36 (1944).

2. Many cases on both sides of the conflict between Norton v. Shelby County and Lang v. Mayor of Bayonne are digested in Note, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 94 (1908). The note discloses such a tendency to distinguish and qualify that it is doubtful if a preponderance of authority can be said to appear. Moreover, the note does not distinguish the character of the legal relations that were defeated or sustained by the adoption or rejection of the formula of Norton v. Shelby County. Compare, for example, the issues involved in the following cases: Ex parte Snyder, 64 Mo. 58 (1876) (the invalid statute purported to create a court and a person convicted by that court was discharged on habeas corpus by the Supreme Court, which recited the formula, no de facto officer where there is no de jure office); State v. Pooler, 105 Me. 224, 71 Atl. 119, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408, 134 Am. St. 543 (1909) (a conviction was sustained over an exception to the indictment that a special prosecuting attorney represented the state in the grand jury room and swore in the witnesses, although the court concluded that the statute which purported to create the office of special prosecutor was unconstitutional); King Lumber Co. v. Crow, 155 Ala. 504, 46 So. 646, 130 Am. St. 65 (1908) (where separate acknowledgment by a wife of assent to a mortgage on the homestead was necessary to bind her interest and a wife acknowledged before the "judge of the inferior court of Woodlawn," it was held in a bill to quiet title brought by a successor of the mortgagee that the acknowledgment was void because the statute which purported to create the court had not passed the legislature in the manner required by the state constitution,—that the de facto officer doctrine could not apply). For discussion of various aspects of the law of de facto officers see Constantineau, Public Officers and the De Facto Doctrine (1910). CHICOT COUNTY DRAINAGE DISTRICT v.

BAXTER STATE BANK.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.

Respondents brought this suit in the United States District Court for the Western Division of the Eastern District of Arkansas to recover on fourteen bonds of $1,000 each, which had been issued in 1924 by the petitioner, Chicot County Drainage District organized under statutes of Arkansas, and had been in default since 1932.

In its answer, petitioner pleaded a decree of the same District Court in a proceeding instituted by petitioner to effect a plan of readjustment of its indebtedness under the Act of May 24, 1934, providing for "Municipal-Debt Readjustment." * * * The decree provided for the application of the amount paid into court to the remaining old obligations of petitioner, that such obligations might be presented within one year, and that unless so presented they should be forever barred from participating in the plan of readjustment or in the fund paid into court. Except for the provision for such presentation, the decree canceled the old bonds and the holders were enjoined from thereafter asserting any claim thereon.

Petitioner pleaded this decree, which was entered in March, 1936, as res judicata. Respondents demurred to the answer. Thereupon the parties stipulated for trial without a jury.

The evidence showed respondents' ownership of the bonds in suit and that respondents had notice of the proceeding for debt readjustment. The record of that proceeding, including the final decree, was introduced. The District Court ruled in favor of respondents and the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. 103 F. (2d) 847. The decision was placed upon the ground that the decree was void because, subsequent to its entry, this Court in a proceeding relating to a municipal district in Texas had declared the statute under which the District Court had acted to be unconstitutional. Ashton v. Cameron County District, 298 U. S. 513. * * *

The courts below have proceeded on the theory that the Act of Congress, having been found to be unconstitutional, was not a law; that it was inoperative, conferring no rights and imposing no duties, and hence affording no basis for the challenged decree. Norton v.

Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425, 442; Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Hackett, 228 U. S. 559, 566. It is quite clear, however, that such broad statements as to the effect of a determination of unconstitutionality must be taken with qualifications. The actual existence of a statute, prior to such a determination, is an operative fact and may have consequences which cannot justly be ignored. The past cannot always be erased by a new judicial declaration. The effect of the subsequent ruling as to invalidity may have to be considered in various aspects,—with respect to particular relations, individual and corporate, and particular conduct, private and official. Questions of rights claimed to have become vested, of status, of prior determinations deemed to have finality and acted upon accordingly, of public policy in the light of the nature both of the statute and of its previous application, demand examination. These questions are among the most difficult of those which have engaged the attention of courts, state and federal, and it is manifest from numerous decisions that an all-inclusive statement of a principle of absolute retroactive invalidity cannot be justified. Without attempting to review the different classes of cases in which the consequences of a ruling against validity have been determined in relation to the particular circumstances of past transactions, we appropriately confine our consideration to the question of res judicata as it now comes before us.

First. Apart from the contention as to the effect of the later decision as to constitutionality, all the elements necessary to constitute the defense of res judicata are present. It appears that the proceedings in the District Court to bring about a plan of readjustment were conducted in complete conformity to the statute. The Circuit Court of Appeals observed that no question had been raised as to the regularity of the court's action. The answer in the present suit alleged that the plaintiffs (respondents here) had notice of the proceeding and were parties, and the evidence was to the same effect, showing compliance with the statute in that respect. As parties, these bondholders had full opportunity to present any objections to the proceeding, not only as to its regularity, or the fairness of the proposed plan of readjustment, or the propriety of the terms of the decree, but also as to the validity of the statute under which the proceeding was brought and the plan put into effect. Apparently no question of validity was raised and the cause proceeded to decree on the assumption by all parties and the court itself that the statute was valid. There was no attempt to review the decree. If the general principles governing the defense of res judicata are applicable, these bondholders, having the opportunity to raise the question of invalidity, were not the less bound by the decree because they failed to raise it. * * *

Second. The argument is pressed that the District Court was sitting as a court of bankruptcy, with the limited jurisdiction conferred by statute, and that, as the statute was later declared to be invalid, the District Court was without jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding and hence its decree is open to collateral attack. We think the argument untenable. The lower federal courts are all courts of limited jurisdiction, that is, with only the jurisdiction which Congress has prescribed. But none the less they are courts with authority, when parties are brought before them in accordance with the requirements of due process, to determine whether or not they have jurisdiction to entertain the cause and for this purpose to construe and apply the statute under which they are asked to act. Their determinations of such questions, while open to direct review, may not be assailed collaterally.

In the early case of M'Cormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. 192, where it was contended that the decree of the federal district court did not show that the parties to the proceedings were citizens of different States and hence that the suit was coram non iudice and the decree void, this Court said: "But this reason proceeds upon an incorrect view of the character and jurisdiction of the inferior Courts of the United States. They are all of limited jurisdiction; but they are not, on that account, inferior Courts, in the technical sense of those words, whose judgments, taken alone, are to be disregarded. If the jurisdiction be not alleged in the proceedings, their judgments and decrees are erroneous, and may, upon a writ of error, or appeal, be reversed for that cause. But they are not absolute nullities." * * * This rule applies equally to the decrees of the District Court sitting in bankruptcy, that is, purporting to act under a statute of Congress passed in the exercise of the bankruptcy power. The court has the authority to pass upon its own jurisdiction and its decree sustaining jurisdiction against attack, while open to direct review, is res judicata in a collateral action. Stoll v. Gottlieb, 305 U. S. 165, 171, 172.

Whatever the contention as to jurisdiction may be, whether it is that the boundaries of a valid statute have been transgressed, or that the statute itself is invalid, the question of jurisdiction is still one for judicial determination. If the contention is one as to validity, the question is to be considered in the light of the standing of the party who seeks to raise the question and of its particular application. In the present instance it is suggested that the situation of petitioner, Chicot County Drainage District, is different from that of the municipal district before the court in the Ashton Case, 298 U. S. 513. Petitioner contends that it is not a political subdivision of the State of Arkansas but an agent of the property owners within the district. See Drainage Dist. v. Hutchins, 184 Ark. 521, 42 S. W. (2d) 996. We do not refer to that phase of the case as now determinative but merely as illustrating the sort of question which the District Court might have been called upon to resolve had the validity of the Act of Congress in the present application been raised. As the question of validity was one which had to be determined by a judicial decision, if determined at all, no reason appears why it should not be regarded as determinable by the District Court like any other question affecting its jurisdiction. There can be no doubt that if the question of the constitutionality of the statute had actually been raised and decided by the District Court in the proceeding to effect a plan of debt readjustment in accordance with the statute, that determination would have been final save as it was open to direct review upon appeal. Stoll v. Gottlieb, 305 U. S. 165, supra.

The remaining question is simply whether respondents having failed to raise the question in the proceeding to which they were parties and in which they could have raised it and had it finally determined, were privileged to remain quiet and raise it in a subsequent suit. Such a view is contrary to the well-settled principle that res judicata may be pleaded as a bar, not only as respects matters actually presented to sustain or defeat the right asserted in the earlier proceeding, "but also as respects any other available matter which might have been presented to that end." Grubb v. Public Utilities Commission, 281 U. S. 470, supra; Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, supra.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded to the District Court with direction to dismiss the complaint.

Reversed.

1. The principal case was concerned with the res judicata character of a municipal debt readjustment proceeding under a federal statute subsequently held invalid. Consider the problem which arises in a criminal prosecution where the statute which the defendant was convicted of violating is subsequently held unconstitutional by a state court of last resort. Assuming that the time for direct appeal has lapsed, should the defendant be permitted to attack the judgment against him collaterally through habeas corpus, proceeding upon the theory that the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction of the convicting court? In such a situation the courts of some states afford no relief. Petition for executive clemency is the defendant's only recourse. In other states, however, the judgment may be attacked collaterally by habeas corpus and the prisoner discharged. Courts that refuse relief point out that traditionally habeas corpus, when used to attack a judicial conviction, is limited to instances where the convicting court acted without jurisdiction, which is not true where the only error made is as to the substantive law of the case. The court had jurisdiction to try the defendant on the charge made. Its error in holding the statute valid was an error made in the course of exercising its jurisdiction. Courts that allow such judgments to be attacked by habeas corpus have pursued a somewhat tortuous course of reasoning in arriving at a desirable result. Many cases—state and federal—are discussed in Note, 39 L. R. A. 449 (1898).

2. Contrast with the principal case decisions in criminal cases holding that where the statute upon which the jurisdiction of the convicting court depends is held unconstitutional, prisoners previously convicted may by habeas corpus attack the judgments against them as "void" for want of jurisdiction. Ex parte Settle, 114 Va. 715, 77 S. E. 496 (1913), and see State ex rel. Larkin v. Ryan, 70 Wis. 676, 36 N. W. 823 (1888). Contra: In re Parrish, 214 Mich. 24, 182 N. W. 46 (1921).

SHEPHERD v. WHEELING.

Supreme Court of West Virginia, 1887.
30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. 635.

[A West Virginia statute purported to authorize the state circuit court upon petition of "ten tax-payers" of a city to "supersede, revoke and annul" "any ordinance" "made contrary to law." Ten tax-payers of the city of Wheeling petitioned the circuit court to exercise this power against an ordinance of that city which purported to create a board of police and fire commissioners. The court directed the city and the commissioners to be summoned as defendants. They appeared and moved for a dismissal asserting that the state statute was invalid. Overruling this motion the circuit court gave judgment annulling the ordinance in part. The defendants obtained a writ of error.]

SNYDER, J. * * * The enactment of an ordinance by a city council, or the enactment of a statute by a legislature, being in each case the exercise of legislative power, the repeal of such ordinance or statute must likewise be the exercise of legislative power. It does not require any precise definition of judicial power, or any nice discrimination as to its extent and limitations to determine that the act of repealing a statute is not the exercise of judicial power. * * *

When, in the course of determining the rights of the parties to a particular suit or controversy, the court finds it necessary to ascertain whether or not a statute is unconstitutional, the court must necessarily pass upon that question; but in doing so it does not annul or repeal the statute if it finds it in conflict with the Constitution. It simply refuses to recognize it, and determines the rights of the parties just as if such statute had no existence. The court may give its reasons for ignoring or disregarding the statute, but the decision affects the parties only, and there is no judgment against the statute. The opinion or reasons of the court may operate as a precedent for the determination of other similar cases, but it does not strike the statute from the statute-book; it does not repeal, "supersede, revoke, or annul" the statute. The parties to that suit are concluded by the judgment, but no one else is bound. A new litigant may bring a new suit, based upon the very same statute, and the former decision cannot be pleaded as an estoppel, but can be relied on only as a precedent. This constitutes the reason and basis of the fundamental rule that a court will never pass upon the constitutionality of a statute unless it is absolutely necessary to do so in order to decide the cause before it. * * *

In a very able opinion by Shaw, C. J., * * * that eminent judge says: " * * * Prima facie, and upon the face of the act itself, nothing will generally appear to show that the act is not valid; and it is only when some person attempts to resist its operation, and calls in the aid of the judicial power to pronounce it void as to him, his property, or his rights, that the objection of unconstitutionality can be presented and sustained. Respect for the legislature, therefore, concurs with well-established principles of law in the conclusion that such act is not void, but voidable only; and it follows, as a necessary legal inference from this position, that this ground of avoidance can be taken advantage of by those only who have a right to question the validity of the act, and not by strangers. To this extent only is it necessary to go in order to secure and protect the rights of all persons against the unwarranted exercise of legislative powers; and to this extent only, therefore, are courts of justice called on to interpose." Wellington v. Petitioners, etc., 16 Pick. 96. * * *

The claim of the defendants in error requires them to maintain that the ordinance must be held naught by the court for all purposes, and not merely for the purposes of this proceeding; for unless such is the case, no one will be bound by the judgment, except, perhaps, the petitioners,—certainly, no other resident of the city would be bound. * * * The petitioners do not allege any personal grievance or special injury to themselves or their rights. * * *

The Circuit Court of Ohio county therefore erred in overruling the motion to dismiss the petition of J. B. Shepherd and others, and for that reason the judgment of said court must be reversed, and said petition dismissed, with costs.

NOTES

1. Iowa enacted a statute containing a provision prohibiting shipment of intoxicating liquor into the state. This provision was held unconstitutional in Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. ed. 1088, 18 Sup. Ct. 604 (1898), on the ground that such liquor was a legitimate article of interstate commerce and that under the commerce clause Congress alone could "outlaw" it. Subsequently Congress enacted a statute (the Webb-Kenyon Act) "outlawing" such liquor in interstate commerce, that is, in effect, making it subject to state prohibition of shipment into "dry" states. In Stajcar v. Dickinson, 185 Iowa 49, 169 N. W. 756 (1918), the Iowa court said of the above provision of the Iowa statute, "although nonenforceable, it remained a part of the statute, and by the enactment of the so-called Webb-Kenyon Act became operative and enforceable the same as though it had not previously been declared unconstitutional or had been enacted by the legislature subsequent to the passage of the law of Congress * * *."

2. A statute may be invalid as applied to one state of facts and valid as applied to another. The particular factor that makes its application invalid in one case may or may not be present in other cases arising under the statute. Where a court decides merely that a statute cannot constitutionally be applied to a case then before the court, the statute's general constitutional status remains unaffected by the decision. The reverse is true, however, where the invalidating factor is necessarily present in every case arising under the terms of the statute, as, for example, where the court holds that the statute is invalid because of a complete lack of power in the legislative body to enact it.

Where it appears from a decision of a court of last resort declaring a statute unconstitutional that the invalidating factor is bound to be present in every case arising within the purview of the statute, the decision is treated as having decided the issue of constitutionality for all other cases to which the statute, by its terms, applies. As a general rule, officials charged with the duty of administering such a statute make no further efforts to enforce it. In a situation of this type, therefore, it is unrealistic to say, as the court does in the principal case, that a decision holding a statute invalid "affects the parties only" and that the case "can be relied on only as a precedent." In some instances, indeed, a decision invalidating a law has even more serious consequences. For example, when the Supreme Court of the United States held the District of Columbia minimum wage statute unconstitutional in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U. S. 525, 67 L. ed. 785, 43 Sup. Ct. 394, 24 A. L. R. 1238 (1923), all states having similar statutes were affected by the decision. Fourteen years later, the Court's decision in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U. S. 379, 81 L. ed. 703, 57 Sup. Ct. 578, 108 A. L. R. 1330 (1937), overruling the Adkins case, apprised the states that such laws were no longer invalid under the federal Constitution. Many similar instances could be cited. For further discussion of the topic, see Rottschaefer, Constitutional Law (1939), 32-37.

WELLER v. NEW YORK.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1925.
268 U. S. 319, 69 L. ed. 978, 45 Sup. Ct. 556.

ERROR to a judgment of the Court of Special Sessions of the City of New York adjudging the plaintiff in error guilty of reselling theater tickets without a license, entered after successive affirmances by the Supreme Court, Appellate Division, and the Court of Appeals.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Chapter 590, New York Laws 1922, added eight sections, 167-174, to the General Business Law of the State. * * * Section 168 directs: "No person, firm or corporation shall resell or engage in the business of reselling any tickets of admission or any other evidence of the right of entry to a theatre, place of amusement or entertainment, or other places where public exhibitions, games, contests or performances are held without having first procured a license therefor from the comptroller." And § 173 declares every violation of the inhibition shall be a misdemeanor.

By an information of the Court of Special Sessions, New York City, the District Attorney accused plaintiff in error of engaging in the business of reselling theatre tickets without the license required by law. The evidence showed he was engaged in that business, and it was conceded he had never taken out a license or complied with Chapter 590. His defense rested upon the claim that the statute is repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court adjudged him guilty and imposed a fine of twenty-five dollars. This was affirmed by the Appellate Division and by the Court of Appeals. 207 App. Div. 337; 237 N. Y. 316. In an extended opinion the latter court upheld the challenged enactment, but said nothing of the possibility of sustaining the license provisions if those relating to resale prices were invalid.

Counsel for plaintiff in error now insists that the two provisions are inseparable; that those which undertake to establish resale prices are clearly invalid; and, consequently, the whole Act must fall. On the contrary, counsel for the people maintain that the power of the State to require such licenses is clear and that we need not determine the validity of the price restrictions.

It is not and, we think, it cannot seriously be urged that the State lacked power to require licenses of those engaging in the business of reselling theatre tickets. The conviction and sentence were for failure to observe that requirement. In the absence of an authoritative announcement of another view by some court of the state we shall hold this provision severable and valid. Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340. The statute itself declares (§ 174): "In case it be judicially determined that any section of this article is unconstitutional or otherwise invalid, such determination shall not affect the validity or effect of the remaining provisions of the article." If § 172, which restricts resale prices were eliminated, a workable plan would still remain. See Dorchy v. Kansas, 264 U. S. 286.

The judgment of the court below is

Affirmed.

1. On the doctrine applicable where a statute contains no saving or separability provision such as section 174 of the statute involved in the reported case, note the language of Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 158 U. S. 601, 635-636, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. 912 (1895): "It is elementary that the same statute may be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, and if the parts are wholly independent of each other, that which is constitutional may stand while that which is unconstitutional will be rejected. And in the case before us there is no question as to the validity of this act, except sections twenty-seven to thirty-seven, inclusive which relate to the subject which has been under discussion; and as to them we think the rule * * * is applicable, that if the different parts are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations or compensations for each other, as to warrant a belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and that, if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently, and some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional or connected, must fall with them." Or, as the point is put by Mr. Justice Matthews in Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 304: "It is undoubtedly true that there may be cases where one part of a statute may be enforced as constitutional, and another be declared inoperative and void, because unconstitutional; but these are cases where the parts are so distinctly separable that each can stand alone, and where the court is able to see and to declare, that the intention of the legislature was that the part pronounced valid should be enforceable, even though the other part should fail. To hold otherwise would be to substitute, for the law intended by the legislature, one they may never have been willing by itself to enact."

In People ex rel. Alpha Portland Cement Co. v. Knapp, 230 N. Y. 48, 60, 129 N. E. 202, 207 (1920), Judge Cardozo said: "Severance does not depend upon the separation of the good from the bad by paragraphs or sentences in the text of the enactment * * *. The principle of division is not a principle of form. It is a principle of function. The question is in every case whether the legislature, if partial invalidity has been foreseen, would have wished the statute to be enforced with the invalid part excised, or rejected altogether. The answer must be reached pragmatically, by the exercise of good sense and sound judgment, by considering how the statutory rule will function if the knife is laid to the branch instead of at the roots."

2. The question of separability with respect to a state statute is one which rests ultimately upon the courts of the state whose statute is involved. In Dorchy v. Kansas, 264 U. S. 286, 290-291, 68 L. ed. 686, 44 Sup. Ct. 323 (1924), Mr. Justice Brandeis said: "The task of determining the intention of the state legislature in this respect, like the usual function of interpreting a state statute, rests primarily upon the state court. Its decision as to the severability of a provision is conclusive upon this court * * *. In cases coming from the lower federal courts, such questions of severability, if there is no controlling state decision, must be determined by this court * * *. In cases coming from the state courts, this court, in the absence of a controlling state decision, may, in passing upon the claim under the federal law, decide, also, the question of severability. But it is not obliged to do so. The situation may be such as to make it appropriate to leave the determination of the question to the state court * * *."

3. The effect of a separability clause in a statute was considered in Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U. S. 235, 73 L. ed. 287, 49 Sup. Ct. 115, 60 A. L. R. 596 (1929), where the court said that in the absence of such a legislative declaration, the presumption is that the legislature intends an act to be effective as an entirety. "The effect of the statutory declaration is to create in the place of the presumption just stated the opposite one of separability. That is to say, we begin, in the light of the declaration, with the presumption that the legislature intended the act to be divisible; and this presumption must be overcome by considerations which make evident the inseparability of its provisions or the clear probability that the invalid part being eliminated the legislature would not have been satisfied with what remains." The fundamental question, then, is one of interpretation and of legislative intent. The separability declaration, while providing "a rule of construction which may sometimes aid in determining that intent," is not to be deemed "an inexorable demand." Many cases are collected in the Annotation in 73 L. ed. 287 (1929). See also, Stern, Separability and Separability Clauses in the Supreme Court, 51 Harv. L. Rev. 76 (1937); Note, 40 Harv. L. ## CHAPTER II

INDEPENDENCE AND INTERRELATION OF DEPARTMENTS

Section 1.—The Judicial Power.

EX PARTE BAKELITE CORPORATION.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1929.
279 U. S. 438, 73 L. ed. 789, 49 Sup. Ct. 411.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to the Court of Customs Appeals prohibiting it from entertaining an appeal from findings of the Tariff Commission in a proceeding begun and conducted under § 316 of the Tariff Act of 1922, c. 356, 42 Stat. 858, 943, U. S. C. title 19, §§ 174-179. A rule to show cause was issued; return was made to the rule; and a hearing has been had on the petition and return.

The grounds on which the jurisdiction of the Court of Customs Appeals was challenged in that court, and on which a writ of prohibition is sought here, are:

1. That the Court of Customs Appeals is an inferior court created by Congress under § 1 of Article 3 of the Constitution, and as such it can have no jurisdiction of any proceeding which is not a case or controversy within the meaning of § 2 of the same article.

2. That the proceeding presented by the appeal from the Tariff Commission is not a case or controversy in the sense of that section, but is merely an advisory proceeding in aid of executive action.

The Court of Customs Appeals considered these grounds in the order just stated and by its ruling sustained the first and rejected the second. 16 Ct. Cust. Appls. 378, 53 Treasury Decisions, 716.

In this Court counsel have addressed arguments not only to the two questions bearing on the jurisdiction of the Court of Customs Appeals, but also to the question whether, if that court be exceeding its jurisdiction, this Court has power to issue to it a writ of prohibition to arrest the unauthorized proceedings.

The power of this Court to issue writs of prohibition never has been clearly defined by statute or by decisions. And the existence of the power in a situation like the present is not free from doubt. But the doubt need not be resolved now, for, assuming that the power exists, there is here, as will appear later on, no tenable basis for exercising it. In such a case it is admissible, and is common practice, to pass the question of power and to deny the writ because without warrant in other respects.

While Article 3 of the Constitution declares, in § 1, that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in "such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," and prescribes, in § 2, that this power shall extend to cases and controversies of certain enumerated classes, it long has been settled that Article 3 does not express the full authority of Congress to create courts, and that other articles invest Congress with powers in the exertion of which it may create inferior courts and clothe them with functions deemed essential or helpful in carrying those powers into execution. But there is a difference between the two classes of courts. Those established under the specific power given in § 2 of Article 3 are called constitutional courts. They share in the exercise of the judicial power defined in that section, can be invested with no other jurisdiction, and have judges who hold office during good behavior, with no power in Congress to provide otherwise. On the other hand, those created by Congress in the exertion of other powers are called legislative courts. Their functions always are directed to the execution of one or more of such powers and are prescribed by Congress independently of § 2 of Article 3; and their judges hold for such term as Congress prescribes, whether it be a fixed period of years or during good behavior.

The first pronouncement on the subject by this Court was in American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. 511, where the status and jurisdiction of courts created by Congress for the territory of Florida were drawn in question. Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the Court, said, p. 546:

"These courts, then, are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the general government can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it. They are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the government, or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of that judicial power which is defined in the third article of the Constitution, but is conferred by Congress, in the execution of those general powers which that body possesses over the territories of the United States."

The ruling has been accepted and applied from that time to the present in cases relating to territorial courts. * * *

Legislative courts also may be created as special tribunals to examine and determine various matters, arising between the government and others, which from their nature do not require judicial determination and yet are susceptible of it. The mode of determining matters of this class is completely within congressional control. Congress may reserve to itself the power to decide, may delegate that power to executive officers, or may commit it to judicial tribunals.

Conspicuous among such matters are claims against the United States. These may arise in many ways and may be for money, lands or other things. They all admit of legislative or executive determination, and yet from their nature are susceptible of determination by courts; but no court can have cognizance of them except as Congress makes specific provision therefor. Nor do claimants have any right to sue on them unless Congress consents; and Congress may attach to its consent such conditions as it deems proper, even to requiring that the suits be brought in a legislative court specially created to consider them.

The Court of Claims is such a court. It was created, and has been maintained, as a special tribunal to examine and determine claims for money against the United States. This is a function which belongs primarily to Congress as an incident of its power to pay the debts of the United States. But the function is one which Congress has a discretion either to exercise directly or to delegate to other agencies. * * *

Before we turn to the status of the Court of Customs Appeals it will be helpful to refer briefly to the Customs Court. Formerly it was the board of general appraisers. Congress assumed to make the board a court by changing its name. There was no change in powers, duties or personnel. The board was an executive agency charged with the duty of reviewing acts of appraisers and collectors in appraising and classifying imports and in liquidating and collecting customs duties. But its functions, although mostly quasi judicial, were all susceptible of performance by executive officers and had been performed by such officers in earlier times.

The Court of Customs Appeals was created by Congress in virtue of its power to lay and collect duties on imports and to adopt any appropriate means of carrying that power into execution. The full province of the court under the act creating it is that of determining matters arising between the government and others in the executive administration and application of the customs laws. These matters are brought before it by appeals from decisions of the customs court, formerly called the board of general appraisers. The appeals include nothing which inherently or necessarily requires judicial determination, but only matters the determination of which may be, and at times has been, committed exclusively to executive officers. True, the provisions of the customs laws requiring duties to be paid and turned into the treasury promptly, without awaiting disposal of protests against rulings of appraisers and collectors, operate in many instances to convert the protests into applications to refund part or all of the money paid; but this does not make the matters involved in the protests any the less susceptible of determination by executive officers. In fact their final determination has been at times confided to the Secretary of the Treasury, with no recourse to judicial proceedings.

This summary of the court's province as a special tribunal, of the matters subjected to its revisory authority, and of its relation to the executive administration of the customs laws, shows very plainly that it is a legislative and not a constitutional court.

Some features of the act creating it are referred to in the opinion below as requiring a different conclusion; but when rightly understood they cannot be so regarded.

A feature much stressed is the absence of any provision respecting the tenure of the judges. From this it is argued that Congress intended the court to be a constitutional one, the judges of which would hold their offices during good behavior. And in support of the argument it is said that in creating courts Congress has made it a practice to distinguish between those intended to be constitutional and those intended to be legislative by making no provision respecting the tenure of judges of the former and expressly fixing the tenure of judges of the latter. But the argument is fallacious. It mistakenly assumes that whether a court is of one class or the other depends on the intention of Congress, whereas the true test lies in the power under which the court was created and in the jurisdiction conferred. Nor has there been any settled practice on the part of Congress which gives special significance to the absence or presence of a provision respecting the tenure of judges. This may be illustrated by two citations. The same Congress that created the Court of Customs Appeals made provision for five additional circuit judges and declared that they should hold their offices during good behavior; and yet the status of the judges was the same as it would have been had that declaration been omitted. In creating courts for some of the territories Congress failed to include a provision fixing the tenure of the judges; but the courts became legislative courts just as if such a provision had been included.

Another feature much stressed is a provision purporting to authorize temporary assignments of circuit and district judges to the Court of Customs Appeals when vacancies occur in its membership or when any of its members are disqualified or otherwise unable to act. This, it is said, shows that Congress intended the court to be a constitutional one, for otherwise such assignments would be inadmissible under the Constitution. But if there be constitutional obstacles to assigning judges of constitutional courts to legislative courts, the provision cited is for that reason invalid and cannot be saved on the theory that Congress intended the court to be in one class when under the Constitution it belongs in another. Besides, the inference sought to be drawn from that provision is effectually refuted by two later enactments—one permitting judges of that court to be assigned from time to time to the superior courts of the District of Columbia, which are legislative courts, and the other transferring to that court the advisory jurisdiction in respect of appeals from the Patent Office which formerly was vested in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

Another feature to which attention was given is the denomination of the court as a United States court. That the court is a court of the United States is plain; but this is quite consistent with its being a legislative court.

As it is plain that the Court of Customs Appeals is a legislative and not a constitutional court, there is no need for now inquiring whether the proceeding under § 316 of the Tariff Act of 1922, now pending before it, is a case or controversy within the meaning of § 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution, for this section applies only to constitutional courts. Even if the proceeding is not such a case or controversy, the Court of Customs Appeals, being a legislative court, may be invested with jurisdiction of it, as is done by § 316.

Of course, a writ of prohibition does not lie to a court which is proceeding within the limits of its jurisdiction, as the Court of Customs Appeals appears to be doing in this instance.

Prohibition denied.

NOTES

1. Note on the Separation of Powers. Aristotle's Politics (Book IV) contains what is generally considered to be the original statement of the doctrine of separation of powers. "All constitutions," he wrote, "have three elements, concerning which the good lawgiver has to regard what is expedient for each constitution." Aristotle classified those who participate in government as (1) the element which deliberates about public affairs; (2) those concerned with the magistracies; and (3) those exercising judicial power. This classification corresponds roughly with the division of our federal and state governments into legislative, executive and judicial departments. Aristotle's account was descriptive; he did not enlarge upon the merits of these tripartite arrangements.

The English philosopher, John Locke, influenced profoundly by his acquaintance with, and participation in, the struggles of the House of Commons with the Stuart kings, supplied a more elaborate analysis of the doctrine, distinguishing between function and organ and justifying a division of functions in order to promote efficiency and guard against despotism. In chapter twelve of his Essay Concerning the True Original Extent and End of Civil Government, published in 1690, Locke wrote, in part: "And because it may be too great a temptation to human frailty, apt to grasp at power, for the same persons, who have the power of making laws, to have also in their hands the power to execute them, whereby they may exempt themselves from obedience to the laws they make, and suit the law, both in its making and execution, to their own private advantage, and thereby come to have a distinct interest from the rest of the community, contrary to the end of society and government: therefore in well-ordered commonwealths, where the good of the whole is so considered, as it ought, the legislative power is put into the hands of divers persons, who duly assembled, have by themselves, or jointly with others, a power to make laws, which when they have done, being separated again, they are themselves subject to the laws they have made; which is a new and near tie upon them, to take care, that they make them for the public good. But because the laws, that are at once, and in a short time made, have a constant and lasting force, and need a perpetual execution, or an attendance thereunto; therefore it is necessary there should be a power always in being, which should see to the execution of the laws that are made, and remain in force. And thus the legislative and executive power come often to be separated."

Montesquieu's classic treatise, Spirit of the Laws, was translated from the French in 1750. Its celebrated chapter on the English Constitution (Book XI, ch. 6) dealt with the separation of powers. Building upon Locke's thesis, Montesquieu stressed the importance of an independent judiciary, thus recapturing the original Aristotelian classification. He wrote: "When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistracy, there can be no liberty; because apprehensions may arise, lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner. Again, there is no liberty, if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control; for the judge would be then the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor. Miserable indeed would be the case, were the same man, or the same body whether of the nobles or of the people, to exercise those three powers, that of enacting laws, that of executing the public resolutions, and that of judging the crimes or differences of individuals."

Montesquieu's work affected Blackstone's subsequent exposition of the English Constitution in his Commentaries and profoundly influenced the trend of political thought in the American colonies. Not only were the framers of the Constitution of the United States familiar with the views of both writers but they had profited from much practical experience under colonial and early state governments. Montesquieu's teachings on the separation of powers, however, were interpreted by some with a rigor and dogmatism which that philosopher doubtless never intended, and it became necessary for one of the founding fathers, James Madison, to defend the proposed Constitution from attack on the ground that its provisions offended the cherished concept in many particulars.

In Number 47 of The Federalist Madison argued forcibly that Montesquieu's warning was directed toward the accumulation or monopoly of powers in one department of government; he had never meant that the departments must be completely disconnected with, or exercise no control over, the acts of each other. In other words, the classic doctrine was to be flexibly, not rigidly, applied. The most effective way to safeguard the doctrine was to give each department the strength necessary to resist the encroachments of the others. Montesquieu's model, the British Constitution, as well as the several state constitutions, were examined and many instances in which the principle of the separation of powers had been departed from were enumerated. "His [Montesquieu's] meaning," wrote Madison, "as his own words import, and still more conclusively as illustrated by the example in his eye, can amount to no more than this, that where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department, the fundamental principles of a free constitution are subverted."

The theory of separation of powers is formally announced in forty state constitutions. While such a formal declaration is not found in eight state constitutions nor in the Constitution of the United States, the same constitutional result arises from the fact that these several documents create three departments of government, vesting the legislative power in one, the executive power in another, and the judicial power in a third.

J. 369 (1920), 4 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 195; Sharp, The Classical American Doctrine of "The Separation of Powers," 2 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 385 (1935), 4 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 168; Fairlie, The Separation of Powers, 21 Mich. L. Rev. 393 (1923); Dodd, State Government (2d ed. 1928), ch. III.

2. In O'Donoghue v. United States, 289 U. S. 516, 77 L. ed. 1356, 53 Sup. Ct. 740 (1933) the Supreme Court held that the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia (now termed, respectively, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit) are "constitutional" courts of the United States, established under Article III of the Constitution, that the judges of these courts hold their offices during good behavior, and that their compensation cannot be diminished during their continuance in office. The court said: "In respect of them we take the true rule to be that they are courts of the United States, vested generally with the same jurisdiction as that possessed by the inferior federal courts located elsewhere in respect of the cases enumerated in section 2 of Article III. The provision of this section of the article is that the 'judicial power shall extend' to the cases enumerated, and it logically follows that where jurisdiction over these cases is conferred upon the courts of the District, the judicial power, since they are capable of receiving it, is, ipso facto, vested in such courts as inferior courts of the United States." With reference to its statement in the opinion in Ex parte Bakelite Corporation that the courts of the District of Columbia are "legislative courts" the court said: "This observation, made incidentally, by way of illustration merely and without discussion or elaboration, was not necessary to the decision, and is not in harmony with the views expressed in the present opinion." The court pointed out, however, that in creating and defining the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia courts, Congress is not limited to Article III of the Constitution (as it is in dealing with other federal courts), but by virtue of the plenary legislative power which Congress exercises over the District (Art. I, § 8, cl. 17) may confer on its courts functions of a legislative, administrative or advisory character, citing its opinion in Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co., 261 U. S. 428, 442, 67 L. ed. 731, 736, 43 Sup. Ct. 445 (1923).

3. In 1929 Congress extended the jurisdiction of the Court of Customs Appeals to patent cases and its name was changed to the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. See 28 U. S. C. §§ 211-216, inc.

4. The United States Court of Claims has been held to have been established in the exercise of the power of Congress under the Constitution (Art. I, § 8, cl. 1) to provide for the investigation and settlement of those claims against the United States in respect of which it has waived its sovereign immunity from suit. Since this is not a part of the judicial power defined in Article III, the Court of Claims is a "legislative" court. Williams v. United States, 289 U. S. 553, 77 L. ed. 1372, 53 Sup. Ct. 751 (1933). Under the reasoning of this case the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is now properly extended by Congress to the "judicial" decisions of the Court of Claims but not to its "legislative" or "advisory" decisions. It would be a violation of the doctrine of the separation of powers for Congress to impose "nonjudicial" functions upon a "constitutional" court—unless, of course, empowered to do so by virtue of some specific provision of the Constitution, as in the case of the courts of the District of Columbia. But Congress may nevertheless vest in "constitutional" courts judicial powers that are no part of the judicial power defined by Article III. Thus the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction to review "judicial" judgments of the Court of Claims enables it to review cases that are not included in the judicial power as defined in Article III.

5. Cases in the Court of Claims are reviewable in the Supreme Court either on certiorari or on certification of a question of law by the Court of Claims itself. (28 U. S. C. § 1255; F. C. A. 28 § 1255.) Cases in the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals may be reviewed on certiorari only. (28 U. S. C. § 1256; F. C. A. 28 § 1256.) There is no appeal of right from either court.

6. For further discussion of the distinction between "constitutional" courts, created under the authority of Article III of the Constitution, and "legislative" courts, established under authority given by other provisions of the Constitution, and for consideration of the effect of judicial immunity from administrative duties, see: Katz, Federal Legislative Courts, 43 *Harv. 7. The power to promulgate rules of procedure was held to be judicial in Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 253 (1825). So, too, is the power to entertain a proceeding which results in a judgment that a person is entitled to a certificate of naturalization. Tutun v. United States, 270 U. S. 568, 70 L. ed. 738, 46 Sup. Ct. 425 (1926).

POPE v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1944.
323 U. S. 1, 89 L. ed. 3, 65 Sup. Ct. 16.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question for decision is whether Congress exceeded its constitutional authority in enacting the Special Act of February 27, 1942, 56 Stat. 1122, c. 122, by which, "notwithstanding any prior determination" or "any statute of limitations," it purported to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to "hear and determine," and directed it to "render judgment" upon, certain claims of petitioner against the Government in conformity to directions given in the Act.

Petitioner brought the present proceeding in the Court of Claims to recover upon his claims as specified and sanctioned by the Special Act. The court dismissed the proceeding on the ground that the Act was unconstitutional. 100 Ct. Cl. (F) 375. It thought that in requiring the court to make a mathematical calculation of the amount of petitioner's claims upon the basis of data enumerated in the Act and to give judgment for the amount so ascertained, notwithstanding the rejection of those claims in an earlier suit in the Court of Claims, the Act was an unconstitutional encroachment by Congress upon the judicial function of the court. Holding that it was free to ignore the congressional command because given without constitutional authority, the court gave judgment dismissing the proceeding.

The case comes here on petition for certiorari which assigns as error the ruling below that the congressional mandate was without constitutional authority. Because of the importance of the questions involved we issued the writ, 321 U. S. 761. For reasons which will presently appear, we hold that we have jurisdiction to review the judgment below.

Several years before the enactment of the Special Act, petitioner brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover amounts alleged to be due upon his contract with the Government for the construction of a tunnel as a part of the water system of the District of Columbia. The construction involved certain excavation and certain filling of the excavated space, in part with concrete and in part with dry packing and grout. Dry packing consists of closely packed broken rock, into which is pumped the grout, a thin liquid mixture of sand, cement and water, which, when it hardens, serves to solidify and strengthen the dry packing.

Included in the demands for which the suit was brought were certain claims which are now asserted in this proceeding. They comprise a claim for additional excavation and concrete work alleged to have been required because of certain orders of the contracting officer, and a claim for dry packing and grout furnished by petitioner and placed by him in certain excavated space outside the so-called "B" line shown on the contract drawings. The "B" line marked the outer limits of the tunnel beyond which, by the terms of the contract, petitioner was not to be paid for excavation.

In the first suit it appeared that petitioner sought recovery for excavation, for which he had not been paid, of the space at the top of the tunnel where the contracting officer had lowered the "B" line by three inches, thus decreasing the space for the excavation for which the contract authorized payment to be made. The Court of Claims denied recovery of this item. The contracting officer had also directed the omission of certain timber supports or lagging required by the contract to be placed on the side walls of certain sections of the tunnel. Cave-ins from the sides resulted, making it necessary that the caved-in material be removed and that the resulting space be filled with concrete, all at increased expense to petitioner. The Court of Claims made findings showing the amount of the additional excavation and concrete work claimed, but denied recovery on these items because the order of the contracting officer for the additional work involved a change in the contract which was not in writing as the contract required.

The Court of Claims also denied petitioner's claim for dry packing and grout. It was of opinion that the Government had received the benefit of and was liable for whatever dry packing petitioner had done and for so much of the grout as had actually found its way into the dry packed space and had remained there. But it denied recovery because of deficiency in the proof as to the extent of this space. The only proof offered was the "liquid method" of computation, based on the number of bags of cement used in the preparation of all the grout furnished by petitioner, the cement constituting a fixed proportion of the grout. The court held, with the Government, that the seepage of the grout into areas outside that dry packed rendered the liquid method an unreliable measure for determining either the volume of the dry packing or the amount of the grout required for it. The court gave judgment accordingly, while allowing to petitioner other claims upon his contract with which we are not here concerned. Petitioner's motions for a new trial were denied by the Court of Claims, and this Court denied certiorari. 303 U. S. 654.

The Special Act of Congress directed the Court of Claims to "render judgment at contract rates upon the claims" of petitioner for "certain work performed for which he has not been paid, but of which the Government has received the use and benefit," and gave jurisdiction to this Court to review the judgment by certiorari. Section 2 of the Act defined the work to be compensated as "the excavation and concrete work found by the court to have been performed by the said Pope in complying with certain orders of the contracting officer, whereby the plans for the work were so changed as to lower the upper 'B' or 'pay' line three inches, and as to omit the timber lagging from the side walls of the tunnel; and for the work of excavating materials which caved in over the tunnel arch and for filling such caved-in spaces with dry packing and grout, as directed by the contracting officer, the amount of dry packing to be determined by the liquid method as described by the court and based on the volume of grout actually used, and the amount of grout to be as determined by the court's previous findings based on the number of bags of cement used in the grout actually pumped into the dry packing." The Act further directed that the court should consider as evidence in the case "any or all of the evidence" taken by either party in the earlier suit, "together with any additional evidence which may be taken."

The Court of Claims in construing the Special Act said (100 Ct. Cl. (F) p. 379):

"A rereading of § 2 of the act will show that the task which the court is directed to perform is a small and unimportant one. It is directed to refer to its previous findings, take certain cubic measurements and certain numbers of bags of cement which are recited there by reference, multiply those figures by the several unit prices stipulated in the contract for the several kinds of work, add the results and render judgment for the plaintiff for the sum. If this reading of § 2 is correct, not only does the special act purport to confer upon the plaintiff the unusual privilege of litigating the same case a second time in a court which once finally decided it, and applying a second time for a review in the Supreme Court of the United States, which once considered and denied such a review. The special act also purports to decide the questions of law which were in the case upon its former trial and would, but for the act, be in it now, and to decide all questions of fact except certain simple computations." So construed it thought the Special Act directed the Court of Claims to decide again the case or controversy which it had decided in the first suit, "to decide it for the plaintiff and give him a judgment for an amount" determined by a "simple computation, based upon data referred to in the Special Act." This it concluded Congress could not "effectively direct."

For this conclusion it relied upon United States v. Klein, 13 Wall. 128, in which this Court ruled that Congress was without constitutional power to prescribe a rule of decision for a case pending on appeal in this Court so as to require it to order dismissal of the suit in which the Court of Claims had given judgment for the claimant. Decision was rested upon the ground that the judicial power over the pending appeal resided with this Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, and that Congress was without constitutional authority to control the exercise of its judicial power and that of the court below by requiring this Court to set aside the judgment of the Court of Claims by dismissing the suit.

As the opinion in the Klein case pointed out, pp. 144, 145, the Act of March 17, 1866, 14 Stat. 9, c. 19, conferred on the Court of Claims judicial power by giving it authority to render final judgments in those cases and controversies which, pursuant to existing statutes, had been previously litigated before it. By later statutes this authority was extended to future cases and the Court has since exercised the judicial power thus conferred upon it. See Ex parte Bakelite Corp., 279 U. S. 438, 454; United States v. Jones, 119 U. S. 477. We do not consider just what application the principles announced in the Klein case could rightly be given to a case in which Congress sought, pendente lite, to set aside a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the Government and to require relitigation of the suit. For we do not construe the Special Act as requiring the Court of Claims to set aside the judgment in a case already decided or as changing the rules of decision for the determination of a pending case.

Before the Special Act the claims of petitioner on his contract with the Government had been passed upon judicially and merged in a judgment which was final. United States v. Jones, supra; Re Sanborn, 148 U. S. 222, 225; Luckenbach S. S. Co. v. United States, 272 U. S. 533, 536 et seq. This Court denied certiorari, and the judgment, which remains undisturbed by any subsequent legislative or judicial action, conclusively established that petitioner was not entitled to recover on his claims. The Special Act did not purport to set aside the judgment or to require a new trial of the issues as to the validity of the claims which the Court had resolved against petitioner. While inartistically drawn the Act's purpose and effect seem rather to have been to create a new obligation of the Government to pay petitioner's claims where no obligation existed before. And such being its effect, the Act's impact upon the performance by the Court of Claims of its judicial duties seems not to be any different than it would have been if petitioner's claims had not been previously adjudicated there.

We perceive no constitutional obstacle to Congress's imposing on the Government a new obligation where there had been none before, for work performed by petitioner which was beneficial to the Government and for which Congress thought he had not been adequately compensated. The power of Congress to provide for the payment of debts, conferred by § 8 of Article 1 of the Constitution, is not restricted to payment of those obligations which are legally binding on the Government. It extends to the creation of such obligations in recognition of claims which are merely moral or honorary. Roberts v. United States, 92 U. S. 41; United States v. Realty Co., 163 U. S. 427; United States v. Cook, 257 U. S. 523; Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U. S. 308, 314. Congress, by the creation of a legal, in recognition of a moral, obligation to pay petitioner's claims plainly did not encroach upon the judicial function which the Court of Claims had previously exercised in adjudicating that the obligation was not legal. Nor do we think it did so by directing that court to pass upon petitioner's claims in conformity to the particular rule of liability prescribed by the Special Act and to give judgment accordingly. * * *

Congress having exercised its constitutional authority to impose on the Government a legally binding obligation, the decisive question is whether it invaded the judicial province of the Court of Claims by directing it to determine the extent of the obligation by reference, as directed, to the specified facts, and to give judgment for that amount. In answering, it is important that the Act contemplated that petitioner should bring suit on his claims in the usual manner, that the court was given jurisdiction to decide it and that petitioner by bringing the suit has invoked, for its decision, whatever judicial power the court possesses. Cf. United States v. Realty Co., 163 U. S. 427. In this posture of the case it is pertinent to inquire what, if anything, Congress added to or subtracted from the judicial duties of the Court of Claims by directing that it consider the case and give judgment for the amount found to be due. Stripped of all complexities of detail the case is one in which, simply stated, petitioner has sought to enforce the obligation, which the Government has assumed, to pay him for work done and not paid for. Congress has in effect consented to judgment in an amount to be ascertained by reference to the specified data.

When a plaintiff brings suit to enforce a legal obligation it is not any the less a case or controversy upon which a court possessing the federal judicial power may rightly give judgment, because the plaintiff's claim is uncontested or incontestable. Nor is it any the less so because the amount recoverable depends upon a mathematical computation based upon data to be ascertained which by the terms of the obligation are its measure. For in any case the court is called on to sanction, by its judgment, an alleged obligation in a proceeding in which the existence, validity and extent of the obligation, the existence of the data, and the correctness of the computation may be put in issue.

The court below seems to have assumed that its only function under the Special Act was to make a calculation based upon data to be found in the Act and in the findings of the earlier suit. In view of the provisions of the Special Act for taking evidence and for considering the evidence in the first suit, we cannot say that all the earlier findings are to be deemed conclusive and that the court could not have been called on in this proceeding to determine judicially whether they are so. Whether the Act makes them conclusive, and if not, whether the evidence would establish the facts on which the Act predicates liability, are judicial questions. But if the facts be ascertained by proof or by stipulation, it is still a part of the judicial function to determine whether there is a legally binding obligation and, if so, to give judgment for the amount due even though the amount depends upon mere computation.

We conclude that the effect of the Special Act was to authorize petitioner to invoke the judicial power of the Court of Claims, and that he has done so. It is true that Congress has imposed on that court, as it has on the courts of the District of Columbia, nonjudicial duties of an administrative or legislative character. See Re Sanborn, 148 U. S. 222; Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortg. Co., 289 U. S. 266, 275. Those imposed on the Court of Claims are such as it has traditionally exercised ever since its original organization as a mere agency of Congress to aid it in the performance of its constitutional duty to provide for payment of the debts of the Government. Such administrative duties coexist with its judicial functions. See Ex parte Bakelite Corp., supra. Its decisions rendered in its administrative capacity are not judicial acts, and their review, even though sanctioned by Congress, is not within the appellate jurisdiction of this Court. Gordon v. United States, 2 Wall. 561; and see the views expressed by Taney, Ch. J., in 117 U. S. 697. But notwithstanding the retention of such administrative duties by the Court of Claims, as in the case of the courts of the District of Columbia, Congress has provided for appellate review of the judgments of both courts rendered in their judicial capacity. And this Court has held by an unbroken line of decisions, that its appellate jurisdiction, conferred by Art. 3, § 2, cl. 2 of the Constitution, extends to the review of such judgments of the Court of Claims; De Groot v. United States, 5 Wall. 419; United States v. Jones, 119 U. S. 477; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wallace, 288 U. S. 249, 263; and of the courts of the District of Columbia; Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Bond and Mortg. Co., 289 U. S. 266, supra, and cases cited. * * *

The Court of Claims' determination that the Special Act conferred upon it only nonjudicial functions and hence that it had no judicial duty to perform was itself an exercise of judicial power reviewable here. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447. The case is not one where the court below has made merely an administrative decision not subject to judicial review, without purporting to act judicially or to rule as to the extent of its judicial authority as the ground of its action or refusal to act. Postum Cereal Co. v. California Fig Nut Co., 272 U. S. 693. Jurisdiction to decide is jurisdiction to make a wrong as well as a right decision. Fauntleroy v. Lum, 210 U. S. 230, 234, 235; Burnet v. Desmornes y Alvarez, 226 U. S. 145, 147.

NOTES

1. The determination of whether an applicant for admission to the bar possesses the necessary learning and character qualifications is generally deemed to be a judicial function, inherent in the courts. While a state legislature may enact valid laws in aid of this judicial function and may, if in furtherance thereof, fix minimum requirements for admission, it may not fix maximum requirements. In Application of Kaufman, 69 Idaho 297, 206 Pac. (2d) 528 (1949) it was held, in accordance with these views, that a statute which provided that graduates of the law school of the University of Idaho of good moral character should be admitted to the bar without examination was an invasion of the judicial power and violative of provisions of the State Constitution establishing the separate branches of government and prohibiting the legislature from invading the judiciary. The case authorities are collected and discussed in the opinion, where it is also noted that some ten states have so-called diploma privilege statutes similar to the one invalidated. For a thorough discussion of judicial control over admission to the bar and disbarment proceedings, see In re Cannon, 206 Wis. 374, 240 N. W. 441 (1932), where it was held that the legislature could not reinstate a disbarred attorney.

2. In Merrill v. Sherburne, 1 N. H. 199, 8 Am. Dec. 52 (1818), it was held that a legislative act granting a new trial in a judicial proceeding was an invalid encroachment on judicial power and a violation of the doctrine of separation of powers, the court saying that "the judiciary would in every respect cease to be a check on the legislative, if the legislature could at pleasure revise or alter any of the judgments of the judiciary." At an earlier period the granting of divorces was considered to be a legitimate legislative function. Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. ed. 654, 8 Sup. Ct. 723 (1888). Provisions of many state constitutions, however, as well as more recent judicial decisions, now recognize that the function is exclusively judicial.

MICHAELSON v. UNITED STATES. SANDEFUR v. CANOE CREEK COAL CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1924.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court:

These cases were argued together and will be disposed of in one opinion. The principal question presented in the Michaelson Case, and the sole question in the Sandefur Case, is whether the provision of the Clayton Act of October 15, 1914, c. 323, 38 Stat. at L. 738, 739, §§ 21, 22, Comp. Stat. §§ 1245a, 1245b, requiring a jury trial in certain specified kinds of contempt, is constitutional. * * *

The petitioners in the Michaelson Case were striking employees of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Omaha Railway Company, and, with others, were proceeded against by bill in equity for combining and conspiring to interfere with interstate commerce by picketing and the use of force and violence, etc. After a hearing, a preliminary injunction was granted. Subsequently, proceedings in contempt were instituted in the district court, charging petitioners with sundry violations of the injunction; and a rule to show cause was issued. Upon the answer and return to the rule, petitioners applied for a jury trial under § 22 of the Clayton Act; but the district court denied the application and proceeded without a jury. At the conclusion of the hearing, the petitioners were adjudged guilty and sentenced to pay fines in various sums, and, in default of payment, to stand committed to jail until such fines were paid. Thereupon the case was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals by writ of error; and by that court the judgments were affirmed. 291 Fed. 940.

First. Is the provision of the Clayton Act, granting a right of trial by jury, constitutional? The court below held in the negative, on the ground that the power of a court to vindicate or enforce its decree in equity is inherent; is derived from the Constitution as a part of its judicial power; and that Congress is without constitutional authority to deprive the parties in an equity court of the right of trial by the chancellor.

If the statute now under review encroaches upon the equity jurisdiction intended by the Constitution, a grave constitutional question in respect of its validity would be presented; and it, therefore, becomes our duty, as this Court has frequently said, to construe it, "if fairly possible, so as to avoid not only the conclusion that it is unconstitutional, but also grave doubts upon that score." Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375.

Shortly stated, the statute provides that wilful disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any District Court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing forbidden, if such act or thing be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or law of any state in which the act is committed, shall be proceeded against as in the statute provided. In all such cases the "trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury," and "such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information." Upon conviction the accused is to be punished "by fine or imprisonment, or both," the fine to be "paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them as the court may direct."

The provision for trial by jury upon demand, as we shall presently show, is mandatory; and the question to be answered is whether it infringes any power of the courts vested by the Constitution and unalterable by congressional legislation. We first inquire whether the proceeding contemplated by the statute is for a civil or a criminal contempt. If it be the latter,—since the proceeding for criminal contempt, unlike that for civil contempt, is between the public and the defendant, is an independent proceeding at law, and no part of the original cause, Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418, 444-446, 451,—we are at once relieved of the doubt which might otherwise arise in respect of the authority of Congress to set aside the settled rule that a suit in equity is to be tried by the chancellor without a jury unless he chooses to call one as purely advisory. We think the statute, reasonably construed, relates exclusively to criminal contempts. The act or thing charged must be of such character as also to constitute a crime. Prosecution must be in conformity with the practice in criminal cases. Upon conviction the accused is to be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both. True, the fine may be paid to the United States or to the complainant, or divided among the parties injured by the act, as the court may direct; but that does not alter the essential nature of the proceeding contemplated by the statute. The discretion given the court in this respect is incidental and subordinate to the dominating purpose of the proceeding, which is punitive, to vindicate the authority of the court and punish the act of disobedience as a public wrong. * * *

But it is contended that the statute materially interferes with the inherent power of the courts, and is therefore invalid. That the power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts has been many times decided and may be regarded as settled law. It is essential to the administration of justice. The courts of the United States, when called into existence and vested with jurisdiction over any subject, at once become possessed of the power. So far as the inferior Federal courts are concerned, however, it is not beyond the authority of Congress (Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. 505, 510, 511; Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., 194 U. S. 324, 326); but the attributes which inhere in that power and are inseparable from it can neither be abrogated nor rendered practically inoperative. That it may be regulated within limits not precisely defined may not be doubted. The statute now under review is of the latter character. It is of narrow scope, dealing with the single class where the act or thing constituting the contempt is also a crime in the ordinary sense. It does not interfere with the power to deal summarily with contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and is, in express terms, carefully limited to the cases of contempt specifically defined. Neither do we think it purports to reach cases of failure or refusal to comply affirmatively with a decree—that is, to do something which a decree commands—which may be enforced by coercive means or remedied by purely compensatory relief. If the reach of the statute had extended to the cases which are excluded, a different and more serious question would arise. But the simple question presented is whether Congress may require a trial by jury upon the demand of the accused in an independent proceeding at law for a criminal contempt which is also a crime. In criminal contempts, as in criminal cases, the presumption of innocence obtains. Proof of guilt must be beyond reasonable doubt, and the defendant may not be compelled to be a witness against himself. Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co., supra, p. 444. The fundamental characteristics of both are the same. Contempts of the kind within the terms of the statute partake of the nature of crimes in all essential particulars. "So truly are they crimes that it seems to be proved that, in the early law, they were punished only by the usual criminal procedure (3 Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, N. S., 1885, p. 147), and that, at least in England, it seems that they still may be, and preferably are, tried in that way." Gompers v. United States, 233 U. S. 604, 610, 611. This is also pointed out by counsel in the case of O'Shea v. O'Shea, L. R. 15 Prob. Div. 59, 61; and, in the course of one of the opinions in that case, it is said (p. 64): "The offense of the appellant [criminal contempt] is certainly a criminal offense. I do not say that it is an indictable offense, but, whether indictable or not, it is a criminal offense, and it is an offense, and the only offense that I know of, which is punishable at common law by summary process." The proceeding is not between the parties to the original suit, but between the public and the defendant. The only substantial difference between such a proceeding as we have here, and a criminal prosecution by indictment or information, is that in the latter the act complained of is the violation of a law, and, in the former, the violation of a decree. In the case of the latter, the accused has a constitutional right of trial by jury; while in the former he has not. The statutory extension of this constitutional right to a class of contempts which are properly described as "criminal offenses" does not, in our opinion, invade the powers of the courts as intended by the Constitution, or violate that instrument in any other way. * * *

We take no time to discuss the contention that the acts alleged as constituting contempt do not also constitute criminal offenses. According to the petition for the rule and affidavits in support of it, these consisted of abusive language, assembling in numbers, picketing, and other acts for the purpose of intimidating and preventing men desirous of securing employment with the railway company from entering such employment. Prima facie, at least, this violated the statute of Wisconsin, where the acts were committed (Rev. Stat., 1921, § 4466c), and this is enough. * * *

The Sandefur Case is here on certificate requesting the instruction of this Court upon the following question of law:

"Do those provisions of § 22 of the Clayton Act which require a conviction upon a jury trial as a condition precedent to punishment for contempt, upon demand for a jury trial in the case specified, impose a valid restriction upon the inherent judicial power of the United States district courts?"

The facts stated in the certificate bring the case within the principle of what has already been said, and the question must be answered in the affirmative.

No. 246 reversed and remanded to the District Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

No. 232, answer: Yes.

NOTES

1. The Norris-La Guardia Act, enacted by Congress in 1932, withdrew from inferior federal courts the power to issue injunctions in a wide range of cases involving "labor disputes." It also gave the right of jury trial in virtually all contempt cases arising out of such disputes. Opponents of the measure argued that Congress could not constitutionally curtail the equity jurisdiction of the federal courts. The Supreme Court avoided passing upon the constitutionality of the statute during the earlier years of its operation, but the constitutionality of the limitation on the powers of the courts to issue injunctions was upheld by lower federal courts on the ground that it was a valid exercise by Congress of its power under the Constitution to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts which it had created, and that the power to grant an injunction is not such an inherent attribute of jurisdiction over a subject as to render void a statute withholding such power. Cinderella Theater Co. v. Sign Writers' Local Union, 6 F. Supp. 164 (E. D. Mich. 1934); Levering & Garrigues Co. v. Morrin, 71 F. (2d) 284 (C. C. A. 2d 1934), certiorari denied, 293 U. S. 595, 79 L. ed. 688, 55 Sup. Ct. 110 (1934); United Electric Coal Companies v. Rice, 80 F. (2d) 1 (C. C. A. 7th 1935), certiorari denied, 297 U. S. 714, 80 L. ed. 1000, 56 Sup. Ct. 590 (1936). The constitutionality of the statute was no longer open to question following the decisions of the Supreme Court in Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, 301 U. S. 468, 81 L. ed. 1229, 57 Sup. Ct. 857 (1937); Lauf v. E. G. Shimmer & Co., 303 U. S. 323, 82 L. ed. 872, 58 Sup. Ct. 578 (1938); and New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Co., 303 U. S. 552, 82 L. ed. 1012, 58 Sup. Ct. 703 (1938).

2. Some state decisions have taken the view that the legislature may not validly provide for jury trial in indirect contempts. The earlier cases are discussed in 36 L. R. A. 254 (1897). See also Carter v. Commonwealth, 96 Va. 791, 32 S. E. 780, 45 L. R. A. 310 (1899). In Ex parte Creasy, 243 Mo. 679, 148 S. W. 914, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 478 (1912) legislation fixing maximum punishments in cases of constructive contempts of court was upheld. #### Section 2.—The Executive Department.

MISSISSIPPI v. JOHNSON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1867.

4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 437.

This was a motion made by Messrs. Sharkey and R. J. Walker, on behalf of the State of Mississippi, for leave to file a bill in the name of the State praying this Court perpetually to enjoin and restrain Andrew Johnson, a citizen of the State of Tennessee and President of the United States, and his officers and agents appointed for that purpose, and especially E. O. C. Ord, assigned as military commander of the district where the State of Mississippi is, from executing or in any manner carrying out two Acts of Congress named in the bill, one "An Act for the more Efficient Government of the Rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, notwithstanding the President's veto of it as unconstitutional, and the other an Act supplementary to it, passed in the same way March 23, 1867; Acts commonly called the Reconstruction Acts. [Putting the then recently rebellious states under military government.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The Attorney General objected to the leave asked for, upon the ground that no bill which makes a President a defendant, and seeks an injunction against him to restrain the performance of his duties as President, should be allowed to be filed in this Court. * * *

The single point which requires consideration is this: Can the President be restrained by injunction from carrying into effect an Act of Congress alleged to be unconstitutional?

It is assumed by the counsel for the State of Mississippi, that the President, in the execution of the Reconstruction Acts, is required to perform a mere ministerial duty. In this assumption there is, we think, a confounding of the terms ministerial and executive, which are by no means equivalent in import.

A ministerial duty, the performance of which may, in proper cases, be required of the head of a department, by judicial process, is one in respect to which nothing is left to discretion. It is a simple, definite duty, arising under conditions admitted or proved to exist, and imposed by law. * * *

Very different is the duty of the President in the exercise of the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and among these laws the Acts named in the bill. By the first of these Acts he is required to assign generals to command in the several military districts, and to detail sufficient military force to enable such officers to discharge their duties under the law. By the supplementary Act, other duties are imposed on the several commanding generals, and these duties must necessarily be performed under the supervision of the President as Commander-in-Chief. The duty thus imposed on the President is in no just sense ministerial. It is purely executive and political.

An attempt on the part of the judicial department of the government to enforce the performance of such duties by the President might be justly characterized, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, as "an absurd and excessive extravagance."

It is true that in the instance before us the interposition of the court is not sought to enforce action by the executive under constitutional legislation, but to restrain such action under legislation alleged to be unconstitutional. But we are unable to perceive that this circumstance takes the case out of the general principles which forbid judicial interference with the exercise of executive discretion. * * *

The fact that no such application was ever before made in any case indicates the general judgment of the profession that no such application should be entertained. * * *

The Congress is the legislative department of the government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance.

The impropriety of such interference will be clearly seen upon consideration of its possible consequences.

Suppose the bill filed and the injunction prayed for allowed. If the President refuse obedience, it is needless to observe that the Court is without power to enforce its process. If, on the other hand, the President complies with the order of the Court and refuses to execute the Acts of Congress, is it not clear that a collision may occur between the executive and legislative departments of the government? May not the House of Representatives impeach the President for such refusal? And in that case could this Court interfere, in behalf of the President, thus endangered by compliance with its mandate, and restrain by injunction the Senate of the United States from sitting as a court of impeachment? Would the strange spectacle be offered to the public world of an attempt by this Court to arrest proceedings in that court?

These questions answer themselves. * * *

It has been suggested that the bill contains a prayer that, if the relief sought cannot be had against Andrew Johnson, as President, it may be granted against Andrew Johnson as a citizen of Tennessee. But it is plain that relief as against the execution of an Act of Congress by Andrew Johnson, is relief against its execution by the President. A bill praying an injunction against the execution of an Act of Congress by the incumbent of the Presidential office cannot be received, whether it describes him as President or as a citizen of a State.

The motion for leave to file the bill is, therefore,

Denied.

2. After the failure to get a decision on the validity of the Reconstruction Acts in Mississippi v. Johnson, another attempt was made when the State of Georgia filed a bill in the Supreme Court to enjoin Secretary of War Stanton and Generals Grant and Pope from carrying into effect these laws, alleging their unconstitutionality in that their aim was to overthrow the lawful state government and establish a different one. The Supreme Court, however, terming the issues involved "political" in character and applying the rule of Mississippi v. Johnson, granted the Attorney-General's motion to dismiss. Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721 (1867).

3. Where a discretion is conferred upon an administrative officer, courts will not interfere to control the manner of exercising it, unless fraud or abuse of power is shown. Many courts have also adopted the rule that mandamus will not issue to compel even the performance of a ministerial function by the head of an executive department of a state government. ### RATHBUN v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1935.

[The Federal Trade Commission Act, c. 311, 38 Stat. 717, 718, §§ 1, 2, 15 U. S. C. §§ 41, 42, creates a commission of five members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and Section 1 provides that not more than three of the commissioners shall be members of the same political party, that they shall be appointed for terms of seven years, and "any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty or malfeasance in office."

William S. Humphrey had been appointed a commissioner by President Hoover and confirmed by the Senate. On July 25, 1933 and again on August 31, 1933, President Roosevelt asked him to resign, saying, "I do not feel that your mind and my mind go along together on either the policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission. * * * Humphrey declined to resign and on October 7, 1933, the President wrote him, "You are hereby removed from the office of Commissioner." Humphrey died February 14, 1934, and his executor sued in the Court of Claims for salary for the period between his "removal" and his death. That court certified two questions to the Supreme Court, (1) whether the statute, above quoted, was intended to limit the President's power of removal to the causes named in it; and (2) if so, was it constitutional.]

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *
Section 5 of the [Federal Trade Commission] Act (15 U. S. C. § 45) in part provides that:

"Unfair methods of competition in commerce are declared unlawful.

"The commission is empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations, except banks, and common carriers subject to the Acts to regulate commerce, from using unfair methods of competition in commerce."

In exercising this power, the commission must issue a complaint stating its charges and giving notice of hearing upon a day to be fixed. A person, partnership, or corporation proceeded against is given the right to appear at the time and place fixed and show cause why an order to cease and desist should not be issued. There is provision for intervention by others interested. If the commission finds the method of competition is one prohibited by the act, it is directed to make a report in writing stating its findings as to the facts, and to issue and cause to be served a cease and desist order. If the order is disobeyed, the commission may apply to the appropriate Circuit Court of Appeals for its enforcement. The party subject to the order may seek and obtain a review in the Circuit Court of Appeals in a manner provided by the act.

Section 6 (15 U. S. C. § 46), among other things, gives the commission wide powers of investigation in respect of certain corporations subject to the act, and in respect of other matters, upon which it must report to Congress with recommendations. Many such investigations have been made, and some have served as the basis of congressional legislation.

Section 7 (15 U. S. C. § 47), provides that: "In any suit in equity brought by or under the direction of the Attorney General as provided in the antitrust Acts, the court may, upon the conclusion of the testimony therein, if it shall be then of opinion that the complainant is entitled to relief, refer said suit to the commission, as master in chancery, to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree therein. The commission shall proceed upon such notice to the parties and under such rules of procedure as the court may prescribe, and upon the coming in of such report such exceptions may be filed and such proceedings had in relation thereto as upon the report of a master in other equity causes, but the court may adopt or reject such report, in whole or in part, and enter such decree as the nature of the case may in its judgment require."

First. [The reasoning on this point is omitted here.] We conclude that the intent of the Act is to limit the executive power of removal to the causes enumerated, the existence of none of which is claimed here; and we pass to the second question.

Second. To support its contention that the removal provision of section 1, as we have just construed it, is an unconstitutional interference with the executive power of the President, the government's chief reliance is Myers v. United States, 272 U. S. 52. That case has been so recently decided, and the prevailing and dissenting opinions so fully review the general subject of the power of executive removal, that further discussion would add little of value to the wealth of material there collected. These opinions examine at length the historical, legislative, and judicial data bearing upon the question, beginning with what is called "the decision of 1789" in the first Congress and coming down almost to the day when the opinions were delivered. They occupy 243 pages of the volume in which they are printed. Nevertheless, the narrow point actually decided was only that the President had power to remove a postmaster of the first class, without the advice and consent of the Senate as required by act of Congress. In the course of the opinion of the court, expressions occur which tend to sustain the government's contention, but these are beyond the point involved, and, therefore, do not come within the rule of stare decisis. In so far as they are out of harmony with the views here set forth, these expressions are disapproved.

The office of a postmaster is so essentially unlike the office now involved that the decision in the Myers Case cannot be accepted as controlling our decision here. A postmaster is an executive officer restricted to the performance of executive functions. He is charged with no duty at all related to either the legislative or judicial power. The actual decision in the Myers Case finds support in the theory that such an officer is merely one of the units in the executive department and, hence, inherently subject to the exclusive and illimitable power of removal by the Chief Executive, whose subordinate and aid he is. Putting aside dicta, which may be followed if sufficiently persuasive but which are not controlling, the necessary reach of the decision goes far enough to include all purely executive officers. It goes no further; much less does it include an officer who occupies no place in the executive department and who exercises no part of the executive power vested by the Constitution in the President.

The Federal Trade Commission is an administrative body created by Congress to carry into effect legislative policies embodied in the statute in accordance with the legislative standard therein prescribed, and to perform other specified duties as a legislative or as a judicial aid. Such a body cannot in any proper sense be characterized as an arm or an eye of the executive. Its duties are performed without executive leave and, in the contemplation of the statute, must be free from executive control. In administering the provisions of the statute in respect of "unfair methods of competition," that is to say, in filling in and administering the details embodied by that general standard, the commission acts in part quasi legislatively and in part quasi judicially. In making investigations and reports thereon for the information of Congress under section 6, in aid of the legislative power, it acts as a legislative agency. Under section 7, which authorizes the commission to act as a master in chancery under rules prescribed by the court, it acts as an agency of the judiciary. To the extent that it exercises any executive function, as distinguished from executive power in the constitutional sense, it does so in the discharge and effectuation of its quasi legislative or quasi judicial powers, or as an agency of the legislative or judicial departments of the government.

If Congress is without authority to prescribe causes for removal of members of the trade commission and limit executive power of removal accordingly, that power at once becomes practically all-inclusive in respect of civil officers with the exception of the judiciary provided for by the Constitution. The Solicitor General, at the bar, apparently recognizing this to be true, with commendable candor, agreed that his view in respect of the removability of members of the Federal Trade Commission necessitated a like view in respect of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Court of Claims. We are thus confronted with the serious question whether not only the members of these quasi legislative and quasi judicial bodies, but the judges of the legislative Court of Claims, exercising judicial power (Williams v. United States, 289 U. S. 553, 565-567), continue in office only at the pleasure of the President.

We think it plain under the Constitution that illimitable power of removal is not possessed by the President in respect of officers of the character of those just named. The authority of Congress, in creating quasi legislative or quasi judicial agencies, to require them to act in discharge of their duties independently of executive control cannot well be doubted; and that authority includes, as an appropriate incident, power to fix the period during which they shall continue, and to forbid their removal except for cause in the meantime. For it is quite evident that one who holds his office only during the pleasure of another cannot be depended upon to maintain an attitude of independence against the latter's will.

The fundamental necessity of maintaining each of the three general departments of government entirely free from the control or coercive influence, direct or indirect, of either of the others, has often been stressed and is hardly open to serious question. So much is implied in the very fact of the separation of the powers of these departments by the Constitution; and in the rule which recognizes their essential co-equality. The sound application of a principle that makes one master in his own house precludes him from imposing his control in the house of another who is master there. * * * The power of removal here claimed for the President falls within this principle, since its coercive influence threatens the independence of a commission, which is not only wholly disconnected from the executive department, but which, as already fully appears, was created by Congress as a means of carrying into operation legislative and judicial powers, and as an agency of the legislative and judicial departments.

In the light of the question now under consideration, we have re-examined the precedents referred to in the Myers Case, and find nothing in them to justify a conclusion contrary to that which we have reached. The so-called "decision of 1789" had relation to a bill proposed by Mr. Madison to establish an executive Department of Foreign Affairs. The bill provided that the principal officer was "to be removable from office by the President of the United States." This clause was changed to read "whenever the principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States," certain things should follow, thereby, in connection with the debates, recognizing and confirming, as the court thought in the Myers Case, the sole power of the President in the matter. We shall not discuss the subject further, since it is so fully covered by the opinions in the Myers Case, except to say that the office under consideration by Congress was not only purely executive, but the officer one who was responsible to the President, and to him alone, in a very definite sense. A reading of the debates shows that the President's illimitable power of removal was not considered in respect of other than executive officers. And it is pertinent to observe that when, at a later time, the tenure of office for the Comptroller of the Treasury was under consideration, Mr. Madison quite evidently thought that, since the duties of that office were not purely of an executive nature but partook of the judiciary quality as well, a different rule in respect of executive removal might well apply. 1 Annals of Congress, cols. 611-612. * * *

The result of what we now have said is this: Whether the power of the President to remove an officer shall prevail over the authority of Congress to condition the power by fixing a definite term and precluding a removal except for cause will depend upon the character of the office; the Myers decision, affirming the power of the President alone to make the removal, is confined to purely executive officers; and as to officers of the kind here under consideration, we hold that no removal can be made during the prescribed term for which the officer is appointed, except for one or more of the causes named in the applicable statute.

To the extent that, between the decision in the Myers Case, which sustains the unrestrictable power of the President to remove purely executive officers, and our present decision that such power does not extend to an office such as that here involved, there shall remain a field of doubt, we leave such cases as may fall within it for future consideration and determination as they may arise.

In accordance with the foregoing, the questions submitted are answered:

Question No. 1, Yes. Question No. 2, Yes.

[MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS concurred in the result, referring to his separate opinion in Myers v. United States.]

NOTES

1. In Myers v. United States, 272 U. S. 52, 71 L. ed. 160, 47 Sup. Ct. 21 (1926), discussed in the principal case, a postmaster of the first class was removed by President Wilson prior to the expiration of his four-year term of office notwithstanding that the statute provided that postmasters of this class should be appointed and removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and should hold their office for the full period unless sooner removed or suspended according to law. The Senate had not consented to the removal. The court held, through Mr. Chief Justice Taft, that the President had a power under the Constitution to remove executive officers appointed by him with the advice and consent of the Senate. The opinion relied upon the grant of executive power under Art. II, on the grant to the President of the power of appointment which was deemed to carry with it an implied power of removal, and on the "decision of 1789"—the historical recognition of the presidential power of removal in the first session of Congress following adoption of the Constitution. Justices Holmes, McReynolds and Brandeis dissented. For discussions of the case see McBain, Consequences of the President's Unlimited Power of Removal, 41 Pol. Sci. Q. 596 (1926); Galloway, The Consequences of the Myers Decision, 61 Am. L. Rev. 481 (1927).

2. The docket title of the principal case was Rathbun, Executor v. United States. In the official reports it is entitled Humphrey's Executor v. United States.

3. In Morgan v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 115 F. (2d) 990 (1940), certiorari denied, 312 U. S. 701, 85 L. ed. 1135, 61 Sup. Ct. 806 (1941), the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit held that the members of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority fall within the rule of the Myers case. The statute creating the T. V. A. provided that the directors should be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and should hold office for nine years. It was contended that certain provisions of the statute restricted the President's power to remove the directors. It was held that to so construe these provisions would make them unconstitutional. The statutory functions of the directors were miscellaneous in character, but the court concluded that it was sufficient to bring the directors within the rule of the Myers case that their duties were predominantly "executive or administrative." The court said:

"The final contention of the appellant is that even though section 4(f) does not reserve to the Congress exclusive right of removal, save only as qualified by section 6, the Authority exercises quasi-legislative powers, and the President is, therefore, without power to remove its members during the terms for which they were appointed, by reason of the decision in the Humphrey case. It requires little to demonstrate that the Tennessee Valley Authority exercises predominantly an executive or administrative function. To it has been entrusted the carrying out of the dictates of the statute to construct dams, generate electricity, manage and develop government property. Many of these activities, prior to the setting up of the T. V. A., have rested with the several divisions of the executive branch of the government. True, it is, that in executing these administrative functions, the Board of Directors is obliged to enact by-laws, which is a legislative function, and to make decisions, which is an exercise of function judicial in character. In this respect its duties are, in no wise, different, except perhaps in degree, from the duties of any other administrative officers or agencies, or the duties of any other Board of Directors, either private or public. Whatever their character, they are but incidental to the carrying out of a great administrative project. The Board does not sit in judgment upon private controversies, or controversies between private citizens and the government, and there is no judicial review of its decisions, except as it may sue or be sued as may other corporations. It is not to be aligned with the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or other administrative bodies mainly exercising clearly quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial functions—it is predominantly an administrative arm of the executive department. The rule of the Humphrey case does not apply."

EX PARTE GROSSMAN.

This is an original petition in this Court for a writ of habeas corpus by Philip Grossman against Ritchie V. Graham, Superintendent of the Chicago House of Correction, Cook County, Illinois. The respondent has answered the rule to show cause. The facts are not in dispute.

On November 24, 1920, the United States filed a bill in equity against Philip Grossman in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, under Section 22 of the National Prohibition Act (Ch. 85, 41 Stat. 305, 314), averring that Grossman was maintaining a nuisance at his place of business in Chicago by sales of liquor in violation of the Act and asking an injunction to abate the same. Two days later the District Judge granted a temporary order. January 11, 1921, an information was filed against Grossman, charging that, after the restraining order had been served on him, he had sold to several persons liquor to be drunk on his premises. He was arrested, tried, found guilty of contempt and sentenced to imprisonment in the Chicago House of Correction for one year and to pay a fine of $1,000 to the United States and costs. The decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 280 Fed. 683. In December, 1923, the President issued a pardon in which he commuted the sentence of Grossman to the fine of $1,000 on condition that the fine be paid. The pardon was accepted, the fine was paid and the defendant was released. In May, 1924, however, the District Court committed Grossman to the Chicago House of Correction to serve the sentence notwithstanding the pardon. 1 Fed. (2d) 941. The only question raised by the pleadings herein is that of the power of the President to grant the pardon. * * *

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1, of the Constitution, dealing with the powers and duties of the President, closes with these words: "* * * and he shall have the power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment."

The argument for the respondent is that the President's power extends only to offenses against the United States and a contempt of court is not such an offense, that offenses against the United States are not common law offenses but can only be created by legislative act, that the President's pardoning power is more limited than that of the King of England at common law, which was a broad prerogative and included contempts against his courts chiefly because the judges thereof were his agents and acted in his name; that the context of the Constitution shows that the word "offenses" is used in that instrument only to include crimes and misdemeanors triable by jury and not contempts of the dignity and authority of the federal courts, and that to construe the pardon clause to include contempts of court would be to violate the fundamental principle of the Constitution in the division of powers between the Legislative, Executive and Judicial branches, and to take from the federal courts their independence and the essential means of protecting their dignity and authority.

The language of the Constitution cannot be interpreted safely except by reference to the common law and to British institutions as they were when the instrument was framed and adopted. The statesmen and lawyers of the Convention who submitted it to the ratification of the Conventions of the thirteen States, were born and brought up in the atmosphere of the common law, and thought and spoke in its vocabulary. They were familiar with other forms of government, recent and ancient, and indicated in their discussions earnest study and consideration of many of them, but when they came to put their conclusions into the form of fundamental law in a compact draft, they expressed them in terms of the common law, confident that they could be shortly and easily understood.

In a case presenting the question whether a pardon should be pleaded in bar to be effective, Chief Justice Marshall said of the power of pardon (United States v. Wilson, 7 Peters, 150, 160) :

"As this power had been exercised, from time immemorial, by the executive of that nation whose language is our language, and to whose judicial institutions ours bear a close resemblance; we adopt their principles respecting the operation and effect of a pardon, and look into their books for the rules prescribing the manner in which it is to be used by the person who would avail himself of it." * * *

The King of England before our Revolution, in the exercise of his prerogative, had always exercised the power to pardon contempts of court, just as he did ordinary crimes and misdemeanors and as he has done to the present day. In the mind of a common-law lawyer of the eighteenth century the word pardon included within its scope the ending by the King's grace of the punishment of such derelictions, whether it was imposed by the court without a jury or upon indictment, for both forms of trial for contempts were had. * * *

These cases also show that, long before our Constitution, a distinction had been recognized at common law between the effect of the King's pardon to wipe out the effect of a sentence for contempt in so far as it had been imposed to punish the contemnor for violating the dignity of the court and the King, in the public interest, and its efficacy to halt or interfere with the remedial part of the court's order necessary to secure the rights of the injured suitor. Blackstone I, 285, 397, 398; Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown, 6th Ed. (1787), Vol. 2, 553. * * *

In our own law the same distinction clearly appears. Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Company, 221 U. S. 418; Doyle v. London Guarantee Company, 204 U. S. 599, 607; Bessette v. Conkey Co., 194 U. S. 324; Alexander v. United States, 201 U. S. 117; Union Tool Co. v.

Wilson, 259 U. S. 107, 109. In the Gompers case this Court points out that it is not the fact of punishment but rather its character and purpose that makes the difference between the two kinds of contempts. For civil contempts, the punishment is remedial and for the benefit of the complainant, and a pardon cannot stop it. For criminal contempts the sentence is punitive in the public interest to vindicate the authority of the court and to deter other like derelictions. * * *

We have given the history of the clause to show that the words "for offenses against the United States" were inserted by a Committee on Style, presumably to make clear that the pardon of the President was to operate upon offenses against the United States as distinguished from offenses against the States. It cannot be supposed that the Committee on Revision by adding these words, or the Convention by accepting them, intended sub silentio to narrow the scope of a pardon from one at common law or to confer any different power in this regard on our Executive from that which the members of the Convention had seen exercised before the Revolution. * * *

Moreover, criminal contempts of a federal court have been pardoned for eighty-five years. * * *

Finally, it is urged that criminal contempts should not be held within the pardoning power because it will tend to destroy the independence of the judiciary and violate the primary constitutional principle of a separation of the legislative, executive and judicial powers. This argument influenced the two district judges below. (1 Fed. (2d) 941.) The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit sustained it in a discussion, though not necessary to the case, in In re Nevitt, 117 Fed. 448. * * *

The Federal Constitution nowhere expressly declares that the three branches of the Government shall be kept separate and independent. All legislative powers are vested in a Congress. The executive power is vested in a President. The judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish. The Judges are given life tenure and a compensation that may not be diminished during their continuance in office, with the evident purpose of securing them and their courts an independence of Congress and the Executive. Complete independence and separation between the three branches, however, are not attained, or intended, as other provisions of the Constitution and the normal operation of government under it easily demonstrate. By affirmative action through the veto power, the Executive and one more than one-third of either House may defeat all legislation. One-half of the House and two-thirds of the Senate may impeach and remove the members of the Judiciary. The Executive can reprieve or pardon all offenses after their commission, either before trial, during trial or after trial, by individuals, or by classes, conditionally or absolutely, and this without modification or regulation by Congress. Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 380. Negatively, one House of Congress can withhold all appropriations and stop the operations of Government. The Senate can hold up all appointments, confirmation of which either the Constitution or a statute requires, and thus deprive the President of the necessary agents with which he is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

These are some instances of positive and negative restraints possibly available under the Constitution to each branch of the government in defeat of the action of the other. They show that the independence of each of the others is qualified and is so subject to exception as not to constitute a broadly positive injunction or a necessarily controlling rule of construction. The fact is that the Judiciary, quite as much as Congress and the Executive, is dependent on the cooperation of the other two, that government may go on. Indeed, while the Constitution has made the Judiciary as independent of the other branches as is practicable, it is, as often remarked, the weakest of the three. It must look for a continuity of necessary cooperation, in the possible reluctance of either of the other branches, to the force of public opinion.

Executive clemency exists to afford relief from undue harshness or evident mistake in the operation or enforcement of the criminal law. The administration of justice by the courts is not necessarily always wise or certainly considerate of circumstances which may properly mitigate guilt. To afford a remedy, it has always been thought essential in popular governments, as well as in monarchies, to vest in some other authority than the courts power to ameliorate or avoid particular criminal judgments. It is a check entrusted to the executive for special cases. To exercise it to the extent of destroying the deterrent effect of judicial punishment would be to pervert it; but whoever is to make it useful must have full discretion to exercise it. Our Constitution confers this discretion on the highest officer in the nation in confidence that he will not abuse it. An abuse in pardoning contempts would certainly embarrass courts, but it is questionable how much more it would lessen their effectiveness than a wholesale pardon of other offenses. If we could conjure up in our minds a President willing to paralyze courts by pardoning all criminal contempts, why not a President ordering a general jail delivery? A pardon can only be granted for a contempt fully completed. Neither in this country nor in England can it interfere with the use of coercive measures to enforce a suitor's right. The detrimental effect of excessive pardons of completed contempts would be in the loss of the deterrent influence upon future contempts. It is of the same character as that of the excessive pardons of other offenses. The difference does not justify our reading criminal contempts out of the pardon clause by departing from its ordinary meaning confirmed by its common law origin and long years of practice and acquiescence. * * *

The power of a court to protect itself and its usefulness by punishing contemnors is of course necessary, but it is one exercised without the restraining influence of a jury and without many of the guaranties which the bill of rights offers to protect the individual against unjust conviction. Is it unreasonable to provide for the possibility that the personal element may sometimes enter into a summary judgment pronounced by a judge who thinks his authority is flouted or denied? May it not be fairly said that in order to avoid possible mistake, undue prejudice or needless severity, the chance of pardon should exist at least as much in favor of a person convicted by a judge without a jury as in favor of one convicted in a jury trial? The pardoning by the President of criminal contempts has been practiced more than three-quarters of a century, and no abuses during all that time developed sufficiently to invoke a test in the federal courts of its validity. * * *

The rule is made absolute and the petitioner is discharged.

NOTES

1. "The Constitution provides that the President 'shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.' Art. II, § 2.

"The power thus conferred is unlimited, with the exception stated. It extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. This power of the President is not subject to legislative control. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders. The benign prerogative of mercy reposed in him cannot be fettered by any legislative restrictions.

"Such being the case, the inquiry arises as to the effect and operation of a pardon, and on this point all the authorities concur. A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and when the pardon is full, it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching; if granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights; it makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity.

"There is only this limitation to its operation: it does not restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others in consequence of the conviction and judgment." Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court in Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 380, 18 L. ed. 366, 370 (1867).

2. A good discussion of the distinction between criminal and civil contempts is contained in the opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking for the court, in Penfield Co. of California v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 330 U. S. 585, 91 L. ed. 1117, 67 Sup. Ct. 918 (1947), where it was pointed out that it is the nature of the relief asked that is determinative of the nature of the proceeding. Here a proceeding to enforce a subpoena duces tecum issued in an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, in which the only sanction asked was a penalty designed to compel obedience on the part of the witness, was held to be civil in character. "Where a fine or imprisonment imposed on the contemnor is 'intended to be remedial by coercing the defendant to do what he had refused to do' * * * the remedy is one for civil contempt."

3. Questions which have arisen from time to time relating to the President's veto power and the effect of his failure to act upon bills passed by the Congress within the period prescribed by the Constitution (Art. I, § 7, cl. 2) are omitted from consideration. Leading Supreme Court decisions on this topic are: La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 423, 44 L. ed. 223, 20 Sup. Ct. 168 (1899); Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 248 U. S. 276, 63 L. ed. 239, 39 Sup. Ct. 93, 2 A. L. R. 1589 (1919); Okanogan Indians v. United States (Pocket Veto Case), 279 U. S. 655, 73 L. ed. 894, 49 Sup. Ct. 463, 64 A. L. R. 1434 (1929); Edwards v. United States, 286 U. S. 482, 76 L. ed. 1239, 52 Sup. Ct. 627 (1932); and Wright v. United States, 302 U. S. 583, 82 L. ed. 439, 58 Sup. Ct. 395 (1938).

YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. v. SAWYER.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1952.

We are asked to decide whether the President was acting within his constitutional power when he issued an order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and operate most of the Nation's steel mills. The mill owners argue that the President's order amounts to law-making, a legislative function which the Constitution has expressly confided to the Congress and not to the President. The Government's position is that the order was made on findings of the President that his action was necessary to avert a national catastrophe which would inevitably result from a stoppage of steel production, and that in meeting this grave emergency the President was acting within the aggregate of his constitutional powers as the Nation's Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States. The issue emerges here from the following series of events:

In the latter part of 1951, a dispute arose between the steel companies and their employees over terms and conditions that should be included in new collective bargaining agreements. Long-continued conferences failed to resolve the dispute. On December 18, 1951, the employees' representative, United Steelworkers of America, C. I. O., gave notice of an intention to strike when the existing bargaining agreements expired on December 31. Thereupon the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service intervened in an effort to get labor and management to agree. This failing, the President on December 22, 1951, referred the dispute to the Federal Wage Stabilization Board to investigate and make recommendations for fair and equitable terms of settlement. This Board's report resulted in no settlement. On April 4, 1952, the Union gave notice of a nation-wide strike called to begin at 12:01 a. m. April 9. The indispensability of steel as a component of substantially all weapons and other war materials led the President to believe that the proposed work stoppage would immediately jeopardize our national defense and that governmental seizure of the steel mills was necessary in order to assure the continued availability of steel. Reciting these considerations for his action, the President, a few hours before the strike was to begin, issued Executive Order 10340, a copy of which is attached at the end of this opinion as an appendix. The order directed the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and operate most of the steel mills throughout the country. The Secretary immediately issued his own possessory orders, calling upon the presidents of the various seized companies to serve as operating managers for the United States. They were directed to carry on their activities in accordance with regulations and directions of the Secretary. The next morning the President sent a message to Congress reporting his action. Cong. Rec., April 9, 1952, p. 3962. Twelve days later he sent a second message. Cong. Rec., April 21, 1952, p. 4192. Congress has taken no action.

Obedying the Secretary's orders under protest, the companies brought proceedings against him in the District Court. Their complaints charged that the seizure was not authorized by an act of Congress or by any constitutional provisions. The District Court was asked to declare the orders of the President and the Secretary invalid and to issue preliminary and permanent injunctions restraining their enforcement. Opposing the motion for preliminary injunction, the United States asserted that a strike disrupting steel production for even a brief period would so endanger the well-being and safety of the Nation that the President had "inherent power" to do what he had done—power "supported by the Constitution, by historical precedent, and by court decisions." The Government also contended that in any event no preliminary injunction should be issued because the companies had made no showing that their available legal remedies were inadequate or that their injuries from seizure would be irreparable. Holding against the Government on all points, the District Court on April 30 issued a preliminary injunction restraining the Secretary from "continuing the seizure and possession of the plants * * * and from acting under the purported authority of Executive Order No. 10340." 103 F. Supp. 569. On the same day the Court of Appeals stayed the District Court's injunction. Deeming it best that the issues raised be promptly decided by this Court, we granted certiorari on May 3 and set the cause for argument on May 12. 343 U. S. 937.

Two crucial issues have developed: First. Should final determination of the constitutional validity of the President's order be made in this case which has proceeded no further than the preliminary injunction stage? Second. If so, is the seizure order within the constitutional power of the President?

It is urged that there were nonconstitutional grounds upon which the District Court could have denied the preliminary injunction and thus have followed the customary judicial practice of declining to reach and decide constitutional questions until compelled to do so. On this basis it is argued that equity's extraordinary injunctive relief should have been denied because (a) seizure of the companies' properties did not inflict irreparable damages, and (b) there were available legal remedies adequate to afford compensation for any possible damages which they might suffer. While separately argued by the Government, these two contentions are here closely related, if not identical. Arguments as to both rest in large part on the Government's claim that should the seizure ultimately be held unlawful, the companies could recover full compensation in the Court of Claims for the unlawful taking. Prior cases in this Court have cast doubt on the right to recover in the Court of Claims on account of properties unlawfully taken by government officials for public use as these properties were alleged to have been. See e. g., Hooe v. United States, 218 U. S. 322, 335-336; United States v. North American Transportation & Trading Co., 253 U. S. 330, 333. But see Larson v. Domestic & Foreign Commerce Corp., 337 U. S. 682, 701-702. Moreover, seizure and governmental operation of these going businesses were bound to result in many present and future damages of such nature as to be difficult, if not incapable, of measurement. Viewing the case this way, and in the light of the facts presented, the District Court saw no reason for delaying decision of the constitutional validity of the orders. We agree with the District Court and can see no reason why that question was not ripe for determination on the record presented. We shall therefore consider and determine that question now.

The President's power to issue the order must stem either from an act of Congress or from the Constitution itself. There is no statute that expressly authorizes the President to take possession of property as he did here. Nor is there any act of Congress to which our attention has been directed from which such a power can fairly be implied. Indeed, we do not understand the Government to rely on statutory authorization for this seizure. There are two statutes which do authorize the President to take both personal and real property under certain conditions. However, the Government admits that these conditions were not met and that the President's order was not rooted in either of them. The Government refers to the seizure provisions of one of these statutes (§ 201 (b) of the Defense Production Act) as "much too cumbersome, involved, and time-consuming for the crisis which was at hand."

Moreover, the use of the seizure technique to solve labor disputes in order to prevent work stoppages was not only unauthorized by any congressional enactment; prior to this controversy, Congress had refused to adopt that method of settling labor disputes. When the Taft-

Hartley Act was under consideration in 1947, Congress rejected an amendment which would have authorized such governmental seizures in cases of emergency. Apparently it was thought that the technique of seizure, like that of compulsory arbitration, would interfere with the process of collective bargaining. Consequently, the plan Congress adopted in that Act did not provide for seizure under any circumstances. Instead, the plan sought to bring about settlements by use of the customary devices of mediation, conciliation, investigation by boards of inquiry, and public reports. In some instances temporary injunctions were authorized to provide cooling-off periods. All this failing, the unions were left free to strike if the majority of the employees, by secret ballot, expressed a desire to do so.

It is clear that if the President had authority to issue the order he did, it must be found in some provisions of the Constitution. And it is not claimed that express constitutional language grants this power to the President. The contention is that presidential power should be implied from the aggregate of his powers under Article II of the Constitution. Particular reliance is placed on the provisions which say that "the executive Power shall be vested in a President * * *"; that "he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed"; and that he "shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States."

The order cannot properly be sustained as an exercise of the President's military power as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. The Government attempts to do so by citing a number of cases upholding broad powers in military commanders engaged in day-to-day fighting in a theater of war. Such cases need not concern us here. Even though "theater of war" be an expanding concept, we cannot with faithfulness to our constitutional system hold that the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces has the ultimate power as such to take possession of private property in order to keep labor disputes from stopping production. This is a job for the Nation's lawmakers, not for its military authorities.

Nor can the seizure order be sustained because of the several constitutional provisions that grant executive power to the President. In the framework of our Constitution, the President's power to see that the laws are faithfully executed refutes the idea that he is to be a lawmaker. The Constitution limits his functions in the law-making process to the recommending of laws he thinks wise and the vetoing of laws he thinks bad. And the Constitution is neither silent nor equivocal about who shall make laws which the President is to execute. The first section of the first article says that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States. * * *" After granting many powers to the Congress, Article I goes on to provide that Congress may "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."

The President's order does not direct that a congressional policy be executed in a manner prescribed by Congress—it directs that a presidential policy be executed in a manner prescribed by the President. The preamble of the order itself, like that of many statutes, sets out reasons why the President believes certain policies should be adopted, proclaims these policies as rules of conduct to be followed, and again, like a statute, authorizes a government official to promulgate additional rules and regulations consistent with the policy proclaimed and needed to carry that policy into execution. The power of Congress to adopt such public policies as those proclaimed by the order is beyond question. It can authorize the taking of private property for public use. It can make laws regulating the relationships between employers and employees, prescribing rules designed to settle labor disputes, and fixing wages and working conditions in certain fields of our economy. The Constitution did not subject this law-making power of Congress to presidential or military supervision or control.

It is said that other Presidents without congressional authority have taken possession of private business enterprises in order to settle labor disputes. But even if this be true, Congress has not thereby lost its exclusive constitutional authority to make laws necessary and proper to carry out the powers vested by the Constitution "in the Government of the United States, or any Department or Officer thereof."

The Founders of this Nation entrusted the law-making power to the Congress alone in both good and bad times. It would do no good to recall the historical events, the fears of power and the hopes for freedom that lay behind their choice. Such a review would but confirm our holding that this seizure order cannot stand.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed. Affirmed.

[Four Justices (FRANKFURTER, DOUGLAS, JACKSON and BURTON) joined in the opinion of the Court by MR. JUSTICE BLACK. Each of these Justices also filed separate concurring opinions, as did MR. JUSTICE CLARK, who concurred in the judgment but not the opinion of the Court. JUSTICES REED and MINTON joined in the dissenting opinion written by MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON. Appendix I is a synoptic analysis of legislation authorizing seizure of industrial property in the United States since 1862. Appendix II is a summary of seizures of industrial plants and facilities by the President, beginning with that of railroads and telegraph lines between Washington and Annapolis in 1861. Because of space limitations, only portions of the separate concurring opinions are included here.]

[The concurring opinion of MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took the view that the President had taken action which was incompatible with the will of Congress, thus leaving his seizure of the mills to be justified only by any remainder of executive power after subtraction of such power as Congress has over the subject. He said, in part:]

The appeal, however, that we declare the existence of inherent powers ex necessitate to meet an emergency asks us to do what many think would be wise, although it is something the forefathers omitted. They knew what emergencies were, knew the pressures they engender for authoritative action, knew, too, how they afford a ready pretext for usurpation. We may also suspect that they suspected that emergency powers would tend to kindle emergencies. Aside from suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in time of rebellion or invasion, when the public safety may require it, they made no express provision for exercise of extraordinary authority because of a crisis. I do not think we rightfully may so amend their work, and, if we could, I am not convinced it would be wise to do so, although many modern nations have forthrightly recognized that war and economic crises may upset the normal balance between liberty and authority. Their experience with emergency powers may not be irrelevant to the argument here that we should say that the Executive, of his own volition, can invest himself with undefined emergency powers. * * *

In the practical working of our Government we already have evolved a technique within the framework of the Constitution by which normal executive powers may be considerably expanded to meet an emergency. Congress may and has granted extraordinary authorities which lie dormant in normal times but may be called into play by the Executive in war or upon proclamation of a national emergency. In 1939, upon congressional request, the Attorney General listed ninety-nine such separate statutory grants by Congress of emergency or war-time executive powers. They were invoked from time to time as need appeared. Under this procedure we retain Government by law—special, temporary law, perhaps, but law nonetheless. The public may know the extent and limitations of the powers that can be asserted, and persons affected may be informed from the statute of their rights and duties.

In view of the ease, expedition and safety with which Congress can grant and has granted large emergency powers, certainly ample to embrace this crisis, I am quite unimpressed with the argument that we should affirm possession of them without statute. Such power either has no beginning or it has no end. If it exists, it need submit to no legal restraint. I am not alarmed that it would plunge us straightway into dictatorship, but it is at least a step in that wrong direction.

As to whether there is imperative necessity for such powers, it is relevant to note the gap that exists between the President's paper powers and his real powers. The Constitution does not disclose the measure of the actual controls wielded by the modern presidential office. That instrument must be understood as an Eighteenth-Century sketch of a government hoped for, not as a blueprint of the Government that is. Vast accretions of federal power, eroded from that reserved by the States, have magnified the scope of presidential activity. Subtle shifts take place in the centers of real power that do not show on the face of the Constitution.

Executive power has the advantage of concentration in a single head in whose choice the whole Nation has a part, making him the focus of public hopes and expectations. In drama, magnitude and finality his decisions so far overshadow any others that almost alone he fills the public eye and ear. No other personality in public life can begin to compete with him in access to the public mind through modern methods of communications. By his prestige as head of state and his influence upon public opinion he exerts a leverage upon those who are supposed to check and balance his power which often cancels their effectiveness.

Moreover, rise of the party system has made a significant extra-constitutional supplement to real executive power. No appraisal of his necessities is realistic which overlooks that he heads a political system as well as a legal system. Party loyalties and interests, sometimes more binding than law, extend his effective control into branches of government other than his own and he often may win, as a political leader, what he cannot command under the Constitution. Indeed, Woodrow Wilson, commenting on the President as leader both of his party and of the Nation, observed, "If he rightly interpret the national thought and boldly insist upon it, he is irresistible. * * * His office is anything he has the sagacity and force to make it." I cannot be brought to believe that this country will suffer if the Court refuses further to aggrandize the presidential office, already so potent and so relatively immune from judicial review, at the expense of Congress.

[MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER'S concurring opinion was based on the view that the Taft-Hartley Act was designed to prevent seizure by the President. He also discussed and distinguished other nonstatutory seizures. He concluded:]

In adopting the provisions which it did, by the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, for dealing with a "national emergency" arising out of a breakdown in peaceful industrial relations, Congress was very familiar with Government seizure as a protective measure. On a balance of considerations Congress chose not to lodge this power in the President. It chose not to make available in advance a remedy to which both industry and labor were fiercely hostile. In deciding that authority to seize should be given to the President only after full consideration of the particular situation should show such legislation to be necessary, Congress presumably acted on experience with similar industrial conflicts in the past. It evidently assumed that industrial shutdowns in basic industries are not instances of spontaneous generation, and that danger warnings are sufficiently plain before the event to give ample opportunity to start the legislative process into action. * * *

A scheme of government like ours no doubt at times feels the lack of power to act with complete, all-embracing, swiftly moving authority. No doubt a government with distributed authority, subject to be challenged in the courts of law, at least long enough to consider and adjudicate the challenge, labors under restrictions from which other governments are free. It has not been our tradition to envy such governments. In any event our government was designed to have such restrictions. The price was deemed not too high in view of the safeguards which these restrictions afford. * * *

If we sanctioned the present exercise of power by the President, we would be expanding Article II of the Constitution and rewriting it to suit the political conveniences of the present emergency. Article II which vests the "executive Power" in the President defines that power with particularity. Article II, Section 2 makes the Chief Executive the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. But our history and tradition rebel at the thought that the grant of military power carries with it authority over civilian affairs. Article II, Section 3 provides that the President shall "from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." The power to recommend legislation, granted to the President, serves only to emphasize that it is his function to recommend and that it is the function of the Congress to legislate. Article II, Section 3, also provides that the President "shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." But as Mr. JUSTICE BLACK and Mr. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER point out the power to execute the laws starts and ends with the laws Congress has enacted.

The great office of President is not a weak and powerless one. The President represents the people and is their spokesman in domestic and foreign affairs. The office is respected more than any other in the land. It gives a position of leadership that is unique. The power to formulate policies and mould opinion inheres in the Presidency and conditions our national life. The impact of the man and the philosophy he represents may at times be thwarted by the Congress. Stalemates may occur when emergencies mount and the Nation suffers for lack of harmonious, reciprocal action between the White House and Capitol Hill. That is a risk inherent in our system of separation of powers. The tragedy of such stalemates might be avoided by allowing the President the use of some legislative authority. The Framers with memories of the tyrannies produced by a blending of executive and legislative power rejected that political arrangement. Some future generation may, however, deem it so urgent that the President have legislative authority that the Constitution will be amended. We could not sanction the seizures and condemnations of the steel plants in this case without reading Article II as giving the President not only the power to execute the laws but to make some. Such a step would most assuredly alter the pattern of the Constitution.

We pay a price for our system of checks and balances, for the distribution of power among the three branches of government. It is a price that today may seem exorbitant to many. Today a kindly President uses the seizure power to effect a wage increase and to keep the steel furnaces in production. Yet tomorrow another President might use the same power to prevent a wage increase, to curb trade unionists, to regiment labor as oppressively as industry thinks it has been regimented by this seizure.

[MR. JUSTICE BURTON emphasized that neither the procedure authorized by the Taft-Hartley Act nor the substituted procedure used by the President carries any statutory authority for the seizure, which action he viewed as contravening the reserved right of Congress to adopt or reject such a course as a matter of legislative policy. He continued:]

This brings us to a further crucial question. Does the President, in such a situation, have inherent constitutional power to seize private property which makes congressional action in relation thereto unnecessary? We find no such power available to him under the present circumstances. The present situation is not comparable to that of an imminent invasion or threatened attack. We do not face the issue of what might be the President's constitutional power to meet such catastrophic situations. Nor is it claimed that the current seizure is in the nature of a military command addressed by the President, as Commander-in-Chief, to a mobilized nation waging, or imminently threatened with, total war.

The controlling fact here is that Congress, within its constitutionally delegated power, has prescribed for the President specific procedures, exclusive of seizure, for his use in meeting the present type of emergency. Congress has reserved to itself the right to determine where and when to authorize the seizure of property in meeting such an emergency. Under these circumstances, the President's order of April 8 invaded the jurisdiction of Congress. It violated the essence of the principle of the separation of governmental powers. Accordingly, the injunction against its effectiveness should be sustained.

[MR. JUSTICE CLARK's concurrence also pointed out that neither the Defense Production Act of 1950 nor the Taft-Hartley Act gives the President authority to seize plants and that no effort had been made by the government to comply with the procedures established by the Selective Service Act of 1948, which expressly authorizes seizures when producers fail to supply necessary defense matériel. The gist of his position is contained in the following paragraph:]

I conclude that where Congress has laid down specific procedures to deal with the type of crisis confronting the President, he must follow those procedures in meeting the crisis; but that in the absence of such action by Congress, the President's independent power to act depends upon the gravity of the situation confronting the nation. I cannot sustain the seizure in question because here, as in Little v. Barreme, 2 Cranch 170, Congress had prescribed methods to be followed by the President in meeting the emergency at hand.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON, with whom MR. JUSTICE REED and MR. JUSTICE MINTON join, dissenting. * * *

[The dissenting opinion first reviews the grave international and military situation which developed as the aftermath of World War II and the responsibilities assumed by the United States in the world community as the result of the aggression in Korea. It sets forth in full the executive order and the President's message to Congress referred to in the majority opinion. It summarizes evidence supporting the view of Secretary of Defense Lovett that "a work stoppage in the steel industry will result immediately in serious curtailment of production of essential weapons and munitions of all kinds." This portion of the opinion concludes with the assertion that "at the time of seizure there was not, and there is not now, the slightest evidence to justify the belief that any strike will be of short duration" and further expresses the view that "if the President has any power under the Constitution to meet a critical situation in the absence of express statutory authorization, there is no basis whatever for criticizing the exercise of such power in this case."]

The steel mills were seized for a public use. The power of eminent domain, invoked in this case, is an essential attribute of sovereignty and has long been recognized as a power of the Federal Government. Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367. Plaintiffs cannot complain that any provision in the Constitution prohibits the exercise of the power of eminent domain in this case. The Fifth Amendment provides: "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." It is no bar to this seizure for, if the taking is not otherwise unlawful, plaintiffs are assured of receiving the required just compensation. United States v. Pewee Coal Co., 341 U. S. 114.

Admitting that the Government could seize the mills, plaintiffs claim that the implied power of eminent domain can be exercised only under an Act of Congress; under no circumstances, they say, can that power be exercised by the President unless he can point to an express provision in enabling legislation. This was the view adopted by the District Judge when he granted the preliminary injunction. Without an answer, without hearing evidence, he determined the issue on the basis of his "fixed conclusion * * * that defendant's acts are illegal" because the President's only course in the face of an emergency is to present the matter to Congress and await the final passage of legislation which will enable the Government to cope with threatened disaster.

Under this view, the President is left powerless at the very moment when the need for action may be most pressing and when no one, other than he, is immediately capable of action. Under this view, he is left powerless because a power not expressly given to Congress is nevertheless found to rest exclusively with Congress. * * *

A review of executive action demonstrates that our Presidents have on many occasions exhibited the leadership contemplated by the Framers when they made the President Commander in Chief, and imposed upon him the trust to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." With or without explicit statutory authorization, Presidents have at such times dealt with national emergencies by acting promptly and resolutely to enforce legislative programs, at least to save those programs until Congress could act. Congress and the courts have responded to such executive initiative with consistent approval. * * *

Without declaration of war, President Lincoln took energetic action with the outbreak of the Civil War. He summoned troops and paid them out of the Treasury without appropriation therefor. He proclaimed a naval blockade of the Confederacy and seized ships violating that blockade. Congress, far from denying the validity of these acts, gave them express approval. The most striking action of President Lincoln was the Emancipation Proclamation, issued in aid of the successful prosecution of the Civil War, but wholly without statutory authority.

In an action furnishing a most apt precedent for this case, President Lincoln directed the seizure of rail and telegraph lines leading to Washington without statutory authority. Many months later, Congress recognized and confirmed the power of the President to seize railroads and telegraph lines and provided criminal penalties for interference with Government operation. This Act did not confer on the President any additional powers of seizure. Congress plainly rejected the view that the President's acts had been without legal sanction until ratified by the legislature. Sponsors of the bill declared that its purpose was only to confirm the power which the President already possessed. Opponents insisted a statute authorizing seizure was unnecessary and might even be construed as limiting existing Presidential powers.

Other seizures of private property occurred during the Civil War, just as they had occurred during previous wars. In United States v. Russell, 13 Wall. 623, three river steamers were seized by Army Quartermasters on the ground of "imperative military necessity." This Court affirmed an award of compensation. * * * the troops in the Pullman Strike of 1895 and his action is of special significance. No statute authorized this action. No call for help had issued from the Governor of Illinois; indeed Governor Altgeld disclaimed the need for supplemental forces. But the President's concern was that federal laws relating to the free flow of interstate commerce and the mails be continuously and faithfully executed without interruption. To further this aim his agents sought and obtained the injunction upheld by this Court in In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564. The Court scrutinized each of the steps taken by the President to insure execution of the "mass of legislation" dealing with commerce and the mails and gave his conduct full approval. Congress likewise took note of this use of Presidential power to forestall apparent obstacles to the faithful execution of the laws. By separate resolutions, both the Senate and the House commended the Executive's action.

President Theodore Roosevelt seriously contemplated seizure of Pennsylvania coal mines if a coal shortage necessitated such action. In his autobiography, President Roosevelt expounded the "Stewardship Theory" of Presidential power stating that "the executive is subject only to the people, and, under the Constitution, bound to serve the people affirmatively in cases where the Constitution does not explicitly forbid him to render the service. Because the contemplated seizure of the coal mines was based on this theory, then ex-President Taft criticized President Roosevelt in a passage in his book relied upon by the District Court in this case. Taft, Our Chief Magistrate and His Powers (1915), 139-147. In the same book, however, President Taft agreed that such powers of the President as the duty "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed" could not be confined to "express Congressional statutes." * * *

In 1909, President Taft was informed that government owned oil lands were being patented by private parties at such a rate that public oil lands would be depleted in a matter of months. Although Congress had explicitly provided that these lands were open to purchase by United States citizens, 29 Stat. 526 (1897), the President nevertheless ordered the lands withdrawn from sale "[i]n aid of proposed legislation." In United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U. S. 459, the President's action was sustained as consistent with executive practice throughout our history. * * *

Beginning with the Bank Holiday Proclamation and continuing through World War II, executive leadership and initiative were characteristic of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration. In 1939, upon the outbreak of war in Europe, the President proclaimed a limited national emergency for the purpose of strengthening our national defense. By May of 1941, the danger from the Axis belligerents having become clear, the President proclaimed "an unlimited national emergency" calling for mobilization of the Nation's defenses to repel aggression. The President took the initiative in strengthening our defenses by acquiring rights from the British Government to establish air bases in exchange for over-age destroyers.

In 1941, President Roosevelt acted to protect Iceland from attack by Axis powers when British forces were withdrawn by sending our forces to occupy Iceland. Congress was informed of this action on the same day that our forces reached Iceland. The occupation of Iceland was but one of "at least 125 incidents" in our history in which Presidents, "without Congressional authorization, and in the absence of a declaration of war, [have] ordered the Armed Forces to take action or maintain positions abroad."

Some six months before Pearl Harbor, a dispute at a single aviation plant at Inglewood, California, interrupted a segment of the production of military aircraft. In spite of the comparative insignificance of this work stoppage to total defense production as contrasted with the complete paralysis now threatened by a shutdown of the entire basic steel industry, and even though our armed forces were not then engaged in combat, President Roosevelt ordered the seizure of the plant "pursuant to the powers vested in [him] by the Constitution and laws of the United States, as President of the United States of America and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." The Attorney General (Jackson) vigorously proclaimed that the President had the moral duty to keep this Nation's defense effort a "going concern." * * *

At this time, Senator Connally proposed amending the Selective Service and Training Act to authorize the President to seize any plant where an interruption of production would unduly impede the defense effort. Proponents of the measure in no way implied that the legislation would add to the powers already possessed by the President and the amendment was opposed as unnecessary since the President already had the power. The amendment relating to plant seizures was not approved at that session of Congress.

Meanwhile, and also prior to Pearl Harbor, the President ordered the seizure of a shipbuilding company and an aircraft parts plant. Following the declaration of war, but prior to the Smith-Connally Act of 1943, five additional industrial concerns were seized to avert interruption of needed production. During the same period, the President directed seizure of the Nation's coal mines to remove an obstruction to the effective prosecution of the war.

The procedures adopted by President Roosevelt closely resembled the methods employed by President Wilson. A National War Labor Board, like its predecessor of World War I, was created by Executive Order to deal effectively and fairly with disputes affecting defense production. Seizures were considered necessary, upon disobedience of War Labor Board orders, to assure that the mobilization effort remained a "going concern," and to enforce the economic stabilization program.

At the time of the seizure of the coal mines, Senator Connally's bill to provide a statutory basis for seizures and for the War Labor Board was again before Congress. As stated by its sponsor, the purpose of the bill was not to augment Presidential power, but to "let the country know that the Congress is squarely behind the President." As in the case of the legislative recognition of President Lincoln's power to seize, Congress again recognized that the President already had the necessary power, for there was no intention to "ratify" past actions of doubtful validity. Indeed, when Senator Tydings offered an amendment to the Connally bill expressly to confirm and validate the seizure of the coal mines, sponsors of the bill opposed the amendment as casting doubt on the legality of the seizure and the amendment was defeated. When the Connally bill, S. 796, came before the House, all parts after the enacting clause were stricken and a bill introduced by Representative Smith of Virginia was substituted and passed. This action in the House is significant because the Smith bill did not contain the provisions authorizing seizure by the President but did contain provisions controlling and regulating activities in respect to properties seized by the Government under statute "or otherwise." After a conference, the seizure provisions of the Connally bill, enacted as the Smith-Connally or War Labor Disputes Act of 1943, 57 Stat. 163, were agreed to by the House.

Following passage of the Smith-Connally Act, seizures to assure continued production on the basis of terms recommended by the War Labor Board were based upon that Act as well as upon the President's power under the Constitution and the laws generally. A question did arise as to whether the statutory language relating to "any plant, mine, or facility equipped for the manufacture, production, or mining of any articles or materials" authorized the seizure of properties of Montgomery Ward & Co., a retail department store and mail order concern. The Attorney General (Biddle) issued an opinion that the President possessed the power to seize Montgomery Ward properties to prevent a work stoppage whether or not the terms of the Smith-Connally Act authorized such a seizure. This opinion was in line with the views on Presidential powers maintained by the Attorney General's predecessors (Murphy and Jackson) and his successor (Clark). Accordingly, the President ordered seizure of the Chicago properties of Montgomery Ward in April, 1944, when that company refused to obey a War Labor Board order concerning the bargaining representative of its employees in Chicago. In Congress, a Select Committee to Investigate Seizure of the Property of Montgomery Ward & Co., assuming that the terms of the Smith-Connally Act did not cover this seizure, concluded that the seizure "was not only within the Constitutional power but was the plain duty of the President." Thereafter, an election determined the bargaining representative for the Chicago employees and the properties were returned to Montgomery

Ward & Co. In December, 1944, after continued defiance of a series of War Labor Board orders, President Roosevelt ordered the seizure of Montgomery Ward properties throughout the country. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit upheld this seizure on statutory grounds and also indicated its disapproval of a lower court's denial of seizure power apart from express statute.

More recently, President Truman acted to repel aggression by employing our armed forces in Korea. Upon the intervention of the Chinese Communists, the President proclaimed the existence of an unlimited national emergency requiring the speedy build-up of our defense establishment. Congress responded by providing for increased manpower and weapons for our own armed forces, by increasing military aid under the Mutual Security Program and by enacting economic stabilization measures, as previously described.

This is but a cursory summary of executive leadership. But it amply demonstrates that Presidents have taken prompt action to enforce the laws and protect the country whether or not Congress happened to provide in advance for the particular method of execution. At the minimum, the executive actions reviewed herein sustain the action of the President in this case. * * *

History bears out the genius of the Founding Fathers, who created a Government subject to law but not left subject to inertia when vigor and initiative are required. * * *

Plaintiffs place their primary emphasis on the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, hereinafter referred to as the Taft-Hartley Act, but do not contend that that Act contains any provision prohibiting seizure. * * *

Plaintiffs admit that the emergency procedures of Taft-Hartley are not mandatory. Nevertheless, plaintiffs apparently argue that, since Congress did provide the 80-day injunction method for dealing with emergency strikes, the President cannot claim that an emergency exists until the procedures of Taft-Hartley have been exhausted. This argument was not the basis of the District Court's opinion and, whatever merit the argument might have had following the enactment of Taft-Hartley, it loses all force when viewed in light of the statutory pattern confronting the President in this case.

In Title V of the Defense Production Act of 1950, Congress stated: "It is the intent of Congress, in order to provide for effective price and wage stabilization pursuant to title IV of this Act and to maintain uninterrupted production, that there be effective procedures for the settlement of labor disputes affecting national defense." § 501.

Title V authorized the President to initiate labor-management conferences and to take action appropriate to carrying out the recommendations of such conferences and the provisions of Title V. § 502. Due regard is to be given to collective bargaining practice and stabilization policies and no action taken is to be inconsistent with Taft-Hartley and other laws. § 503. The purpose of these provisions was to authorize the President "to establish a board, commission or other agency, similar to the War Labor Board of World War II, to carry out the title."

The President authorized the Wage Stabilization Board (WSB), which administers the wage stabilization functions of Title IV of the Defense Production Act, also to deal with labor disputes affecting the defense program. When extension of the Defense Production Act was before Congress in 1951, the Chairman of the Wage Stabilization Board described in detail the relationship between the Taft-Hartley procedures applicable to labor disputes imperiling the national health and safety and the new WSB dispute procedures especially devised for settlement of labor disputes growing out of the needs of the defense program. Aware that a technique separate from Taft-Hartley had been devised, members of Congress attempted to divest the WSB of its disputes powers. These attempts were defeated in the House, were not brought to a vote in the Senate and the Defense Production Act was extended through June 30, 1952, without change in the disputes powers of the WSB. Certainly this legislative creation of a new procedure for dealing with defense disputes negatives any notion that Congress intended the earlier and discretionary Taft-Hartley procedure to be an exclusive procedure.

Accordingly, as of December 22, 1951, the President had a choice between alternate procedures for settling the threatened strike in the steel mills: one route created to deal with peacetime disputes; the other route specially created to deal with disputes growing out of the defense and stabilization program. There is no question of bypassing a statutory procedure because both of the routes available to the President in December were based upon statutory authorization. Both routes were available in the steel dispute. The Union, by refusing to abide by the defense and stabilization program, could have forced the President to invoke Taft-Hartley at that time to delay the strike a maximum of 80 days. Instead the Union agreed to cooperate with the defense program and submit the dispute to the Wage Stabilization Board.

Plaintiffs had no objection whatever at that time to the President's choice of the WSB route. As a result, the strike was postponed, a WSB panel held hearings and reported the position of the parties and the WSB recommended the terms of a settlement which it found were fair and equitable. Moreover, the WSB performed a function which the board of inquiry contemplated by Taft-Hartley could not have accomplished when it checked the recommended wage settlement against its own wage stabilization regulations issued pursuant to its stabilization functions under Title IV of the Defense Production Act. Thereafter, the parties bargained on the basis of the WSB recommendation.

When the President acted on April 8, he had exhausted the procedures for settlement available to him. Taft-Hartley was a route parallel to, not connected with, the WSB procedure. The strike had been delayed 99 days as contrasted with the maximum delay of 80 days under Taft-Hartley. There had been a hearing on the issues in dispute and bargaining which promised settlement up to the very hour before seizure had broken down. Faced with immediate national peril through stoppage of steel production on the one hand and faced with destruction of the wage and price legislative programs on the other, the President took temporary possession of the steel mills as the only course open to him consistent with his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

Plaintiffs' property was taken and placed in the possession of the Secretary of Commerce to prevent any interruption in steel production. It made no difference whether the stoppage was caused by a union-management dispute over terms and conditions of employment, a union-Government dispute over wage stabilization or a management-Government dispute over price stabilization. The President's action has thus far been effective, not in settling the dispute, but in saving the various legislative programs at stake from destruction until Congress could act in the matter.

The diversity of views expressed in the six opinions of the majority, the lack of reference to authoritative precedent, the repeated reliance upon prior dissenting opinions, the complete disregard of the uncontroverted facts showing the gravity of the emergency and the temporary nature of the taking all serve to demonstrate how far afield one must go to affirm the order of the District Court.

The broad executive power granted by Article II to an officer on duty 365 days a year cannot, it is said, be invoked to avert disaster. Instead, the President must confine himself to sending a message to Congress recommending action. Under this messenger-boy concept of the Office, the President cannot even act to preserve legislative programs from destruction so that Congress will have something left to act upon. There is no judicial finding that the executive action was unwarranted because there was in fact no basis for the President's finding of the existence of an emergency for, under this view, the gravity of the emergency and the immediacy of the threatened disaster are considered irrelevant as a matter of law.

Seizure of plaintiffs' property is not a pleasant undertaking. Similarly unpleasant to a free country are the draft which disrupts the home and military procurement which causes economic dislocation and compels adoption of price controls, wage stabilization and allocation of materials. The President informed Congress that even a temporary Government operation of plaintiffs' properties was "thoroughly distasteful" to him, but was necessary to prevent immediate paralysis of the mobilization program. Presidents have been in the past, and any man worthy of the Office should be in the future, free to take at least interim action necessary to execute legislative programs essential to survival of the Nation. A sturdy judiciary should not be swayed by the unpleasantness or unpopularity of necessary executive action, but must independently determine for itself whether the President was acting, as required by the Constitution, "to take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." * * *

1. Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. 115, 14 L. ed. 75 (1852), involving seizure of a wagon train by an officer of the United States Army during the Mexican War, noted that such executive seizure was proper in case of emergency, but affirmed a personal judgment against the officer of $90,000 on the ground that no emergency had been found to exist. The judgment was paid by the United States pursuant to Act of Congress passed before the court's decision. The court said that executive takings, free from personal liability, were permissible only where "the danger is immediate and impending; or the necessity urgent for the public service, such as will not admit of delay, and where the action of the civil authority would be too late in providing the means which the occasion calls for." It is to be noted that this case was decided before the establishment of the Court of Claims.

3. In Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U. S. 378, 77 L. ed. 375, 53 Sup. Ct. 190 (1932) the Supreme Court, in a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice Hughes, upheld the decree of a three-judge district court enjoining the Governor of Texas and the military authorities from enforcing their military or executive orders regulating or restricting the production of oil from complainants' wells, pursuant to a previously declared state of martial law. The decision is important in that it imposed for the first time a definite restriction upon the powers of state governors exercised under declarations of martial law. UNITED STATES v. CURTISS-WRIGHT
EXPORT CORPORATION.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1936.
299 U. S. 304, 81 L. ed. 255, 57 Sup. Ct. 216.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

On January 27, 1936, an indictment was returned in the court below, the first count of which charges that appellees, beginning with the 29th day of May, 1934, conspired to sell in the United States certain arms of war, namely fifteen machine guns, to Bolivia, a country then engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco, in violation of the Joint Resolution of Congress approved May 28, 1934, and the provisions of a proclamation issued on the same day by the President of the United States pursuant to authority conferred by § 1 of the resolution. In pursuance of the conspiracy, the commission of certain overt acts was alleged, details of which need not be stated. The Joint Resolution (chap. 365, 48 Stat. at L. 811) follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if the President finds that the prohibition of the sale of arms and munitions of war in the United States to those countries now engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco may contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, and if after consultation with the governments of other American Republics and with their cooperation, as well as that of such other governments as he may deem necessary, he makes proclamation to that effect, it shall be unlawful to sell, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war in any place in the United States to the countries now engaged in that armed conflict, or to any person, company or association acting in the interest of either country, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

"Sec. 2. Whoever sells any arms or munitions of war in violation of section 1 shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both."

Appellees severally demurred to the first count of the indictment on the grounds (1) that it did not charge facts sufficient to show the commission by appellees of any offense against any law of the United States; (2) that this count of the indictment charges a conspiracy to violate the joint resolution and the Presidential proclamation, both of which had expired according to the terms of the joint resolution by reason of the revocation contained in the Presidential proclamation of November 14, 1935, and were not in force at the time when the indictment was found. The points urged in support of the demurrers were, first, that the joint resolution effects an invalid delegation of legislative power to the Executive; second, that the joint resolution never became effective because of the failure of the President to find essential jurisdictional facts; and third, that the second proclamation operated to put an end to the alleged liability under the joint resolution.

The court below sustained the demurrers upon the first point, but overruled them on the second and third points. 14 F. Supp. 230. The government appealed to this Court under the provisions of the Criminal Appeals Act of March 2, 1907, 34 Stat. at L. 1246, chap. 2564, as amended, 18 U. S. C. § 682. That act authorizes the United States to appeal from a district court direct to this Court in criminal cases where, among other things, the decision sustaining a demurrer to the indictment or any count thereof is based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment is founded.

First. It is contended that by the Joint Resolution, the going into effect and continued operation of the resolution was conditioned (a) upon the President's judgment as to its beneficial effect upon the re-establishment of peace between the countries engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco; (b) upon the making of a proclamation, which was left to his unfettered discretion, thus constituting an attempted substitution of the President's will for that of Congress; (c) upon the making of a proclamation putting an end to the operation of the resolution, which again was left to the President's unfettered discretion; and (d) further, that the extent of its operation in particular cases was subject to limitation and exception by the President, controlled by no standard. In each of these particulars, appellees urge that Congress abdicated its essential functions and delegated them to the Executive.

Whether, if the Joint Resolution had related solely to internal affairs it would be open to the challenge that it constituted an unlawful delegation of legislative power to the Executive, we find it unnecessary to determine. The whole aim of the resolution is to affect a situation entirely external to the United States, and falling within the category of foreign affairs. The determination which we are called to make, therefore, is whether the Joint Resolution, as applied to that situation, is vulnerable to attack under the rule that forbids a delegation of the lawmaking power. In other words, assuming (but not deciding) that the challenged delegation, if it were confined to internal affairs, would be invalid, may it nevertheless be sustained on the ground that its exclusive aim is to afford a remedy for a hurtful condition within foreign territory?

It will contribute to the elucidation of the question if we first consider the differences between the powers of the Federal government in respect of foreign or external affairs and those in respect of domestic or internal affairs. That there are differences between them, and that these differences are fundamental, may not be doubted.

The two classes of powers are different, both in respect of their origin and their nature. The broad statement that the Federal government can exercise no powers except those specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers, is categorically true only in respect to our internal affairs. In that field, the primary purpose of the Constitution was to carve from the general mass of legislative powers then possessed by the states such portions as it was thought desirable to vest in the Federal government, leaving those not included in the enumeration still in the states. Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 294. That this doctrine applies only to powers which the states had, is self-evident. And since the states severally never possessed international powers, such powers could not have been carved from the mass of state powers but obviously were transmitted to the United States from some other source. During the colonial period, those powers were possessed exclusively by and were entirely under the control of the Crown. By the Declaration of Independence, "the Representatives of the United States of America" declared the United [not the several] Colonies to be free and independent states, and as such to have "full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do."

As a result of the separation from Great Britain by the colonies, acting as a unit, the powers of external sovereignty passed from the Crown not to the colonies severally, but to the colonies in their collective and corporate capacity as the United States of America. Even before the Declaration, the colonies were a unit in foreign affairs, acting through a common agency—namely the Continental Congress, composed of delegates from the thirteen colonies. That agency exercised the powers of war and peace, raised an army, created a navy, and finally adopted the Declaration of Independence. Rulers come and go; governments end and forms of government change; but sovereignty survives. A political society cannot endure without a supreme will somewhere. Sovereignty is never held in suspense. When, therefore, the external sovereignty of Great Britain in respect of the colonies ceased, it immediately passed to the Union. See Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall. 54, 80, 81. That fact was given practical application almost at once. The treaty of peace, made on September 3, 1783, was concluded between his Britannic Majesty and the "United States of America." 8 Stat. at L. — European Treaties — 80.

The Union existed before the Constitution, which was ordained and established among other things to form "a more perfect Union." Prior to that event, it is clear that the Union, declared by the Articles of Confederation to be "perpetual," was the sole possessor of external sovereignty, and in the Union it remained without change save in so far as the Constitution in express terms qualified its exercise. * * *

It results that the investment of the federal government with the powers of external sovereignty did not depend upon the affirmative grants of the Constitution. The powers to declare and wage war, to conclude peace, to make treaties, to maintain diplomatic relations with other sovereignties, if they had never been mentioned in the Constitution, would have vested in the Federal government as necessary concomitants of nationality. Neither the Constitution nor the laws passed in pursuance of it have any force in foreign territory unless in respect of our own citizens (see American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 347, 356;) and operations of the nation in such territory must be governed by treaties, international understandings and compacts, and the principles of international law. As a member of the family of nations, the right and power of the United States in that field are equal to the right and power of the other members of the international family. Otherwise, the United States is not completely sovereign. The power to acquire territory by discovery and occupation (Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 202, 212), the power to expel undesirable aliens (Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 705 et seq.), the power to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense (S. Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U. S. 583, 600, 601; Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement, 2d ed. p. 102 and note 1), none of which is expressly affirmed by the Constitution, nevertheless exist as inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality. This the Court recognized, and in each of the cases cited found the warrant for its conclusions not in the provisions of the Constitution, but in the law of nations. * * *

Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, "The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations." Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613. * * *

It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress, but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution. It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries, and especially is this true in time of war. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results. Indeed, so clearly is this true that the first President refused to accede to a request to lay before the House of Representatives the instructions, correspondence and documents relating to the negotiation of the Jay Treaty—a refusal the wisdom of which was recognized by the House itself and has never since been doubted. In his reply to the request, President Washington said:

“The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent.” 1 Messages and Papers of the Presidents, p. 194. * * *

In the light of the foregoing observations, it is evident that this court should not be in haste to apply a general rule which will have the effect of condemning legislation like that under review as constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power. The principles which justify such legislation find overwhelming support in the unbroken legislative practice which has prevailed almost from the inception of the national government to the present day. * * *

The uniform, long-continued and undisputed legislative practice just disclosed rests upon an admissible view of the Constitution which, even if the practice found far less support in principle than we think it does, we should not feel at liberty at this late day to disturb.

We deem it unnecessary to consider, seriatim, the several clauses which are said to evidence the unconstitutionality of the Joint Resolution as involving an unlawful delegation of legislative power. It is enough to summarize by saying that, both upon principle and in accordance with precedent, we conclude there is sufficient warrant for the broad discretion vested in the President to determine whether the enforcement of the statute will have a beneficial effect upon the reestablishment of peace in the affected countries; whether he shall make proclamation to bring the resolution into operation; whether and when the resolution shall cease to operate and to make proclamation accordingly; and to prescribe limitations and exceptions to which the enforcement of the resolution shall be subject. * * * [The Court next held that the Executive proclamation satisfied the requirements of the Joint Resolution.]

The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the foregoing opinion. Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS does not agree. He is of opinion that the court below reached the right conclusion and its judgment ought to be affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE STONE took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTES

1. The role of Mr. Justice Sutherland in winning the approval of the court for the view, first advanced in 1792, that the national government does not get its powers to wage war and conduct its foreign relations from the Constitution but possesses them as an inherent attribute of national sovereignty is interestingly discussed in Paschal, Mr. Justice Sutherland: A Man Against the State (1951), 221-232. The significance of the opinion lies not alone in the fact that it advances a theory of the foreign relations power which seems to render it independent of constitutional restraints but that it confirms the vast authority of the President in the international sphere. #### MISSOURI v. HOLLAND.

Supreme Court of United States, 1920.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the State of Missouri to prevent a game warden of the United States from attempting to enforce the Migratory Bird Treaty Act of July 3, 1918, c. 128, 40 Stat. 755, and the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance of the same. The ground of the bill is that the statute is an unconstitutional interference with the rights reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment, and that the acts of the defendant done and threatened under that authority invade the sovereign right of the state and contravene its will manifested in statutes. The state also alleges a pecuniary interest, as owner of the wild birds within its borders and otherwise, admitted by the government to be sufficient, but it is enough that the bill is a reasonable and proper means to assert the alleged quasi sovereign rights of a state. Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U. S. 125, 142. Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237. Marshall Dental Manufacturing Co. v. Iowa, 226 U. S. 460, 462. A motion to dismiss was sustained by the District Court on the ground that the act of Congress is constitutional. 258 Fed. Rep. 479. Accord, United States v. Thompson, 258 Fed. Rep. 257; United States v. Rockefeller, 260 Fed. Rep. 346. The state appeals.

On December 8, 1916, a treaty between the United States and Great Britain was proclaimed by the President. It recited that many species of birds in their annual migrations traversed certain parts of the United States and of Canada, that they were of great value as a source of food and in destroying insects injurious to vegetation, but were in danger of extermination through lack of adequate protection. It therefore provided for specified closed seasons and protection in other forms, and agreed that the two powers would take or propose to their law-making bodies the necessary measures for carrying the treaty out. 39 Stat. 1702. The above mentioned Act of July 3, 1918, entitled an act to give effect to the convention, prohibited the killing, capturing or selling any of the migratory birds included in the terms of the treaty except as permitted by regulations compatible with those terms, to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture. Regulations were proclaimed on July 31, and October 25, 1918. 40 Stat. 1812; 1863. It is unnecessary to go into any details, because, as we have said, the question raised is the general one whether the treaty and statute are void as an interference with the rights reserved to the states.

To answer this question it is not enough to refer to the Tenth Amendment, reserving the powers not delegated to the United States, because by Article II, § 2, the power to make treaties is delegated expressly, and by Article VI treaties made under the authority of the United States, along with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, are declared the supreme law of the land. If the treaty is valid there can be no dispute about the validity of the statute under Article I, § 8, as a necessary and proper means to execute the powers of the Government. The language of the Constitution as to the supremacy of treaties being general, the question before us is narrowed to an inquiry into the ground upon which the present supposed exception is placed.

It is said that a treaty cannot be valid if it infringes the Constitution, that there are limits, therefore, to the treaty-making power, and that one such limit is that what an act of Congress could not do unaided, in derogation of the powers reserved to the states, a treaty cannot do. An earlier act of Congress that attempted by itself and not in pursuance of a treaty to regulate the killing of migratory birds within the states had been held bad in the District Court. United States v. Shauver, 214 Fed.

Rep. 154. United States v. McCullagh, 221 Fed. Rep. 288. Those decisions were supported by arguments that migratory birds were owned by the states in their sovereign capacity for the benefit of their people, and that under cases like Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, this control was one that Congress had no power to displace. The same argument is supposed to apply now with equal force.

Whether the two cases cited were decided rightly or not they cannot be accepted as a test of the treaty power. Acts of Congress are the supreme law of the land only when made in pursuance of the Constitution, while treaties are declared to be so when made under the authority of the United States. It is open to question whether the authority of the United States means more than the formal acts prescribed to make the convention. We do not mean to imply that there are no qualifications to the treaty-making power; but they must be ascertained in a different way. It is obvious that there may be matters of the sharpest exigency for the national well being that an act of Congress could not deal with but that a treaty followed by such an act could, and it is not lightly to be assumed that, in matters requiring national action, "a power which must belong to and somewhere reside in every civilized government" is not to be found. Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 33. What was said in that case with regard to the powers of the states applies with equal force to the powers of the nation in cases where the states individually are incompetent to act. We are not yet discussing the particular case before us but only are considering the validity of the test proposed. With regard to that we may add that when we are dealing with words that also are a constituent act, like the Constitution of the United States, we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. It was enough for them to realize or to hope that they had created an organism; it has taken a century and has cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation. The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago. The treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution. The only question is whether it is forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment. We must consider what this country has become in deciding what that Amendment has reserved.

The state as we have intimated founds its claim of exclusive authority upon an assertion of title to migratory birds, an assertion that is embodied in statute. No doubt it is true that as between a state and its inhabitants the state may regulate the killing and sale of such birds, but it does not follow that its authority is exclusive of paramount powers. To put the claim of the state upon title is to lean upon a slender reed. Wild birds are not in the possession of anyone; and possession is the beginning of ownership. The whole foundation of the state's rights is the presence within their jurisdiction of birds that yesterday had not arrived, tomorrow may be in another state and in a week a thousand miles away. If we are to be accurate we cannot put the case of the state upon higher ground than that the treaty deals with creatures that for the moment are within the state borders, that it must be carried out by officers of the United States within the same territory, and that but for the treaty the state would be free to regulate this subject itself.

As most of the laws of the United States are carried out within the states and as many of them deal with matters which in the silence of such laws the state might regulate, such general grounds are not enough to support Missouri's claim. Valid treaties of course "are as binding within the territorial limits of the states as they are elsewhere throughout the dominion of the United States." Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 683. No doubt the great body of private relations usually fall within the control of the state, but a treaty may override its power. We do not have to invoke the later developments of constitutional law for this proposition; it was recognized as early as Hopkirk v. Bell, 3 Cranch, 454, with regard to statutes of limitations, and even earlier, as to confiscation, in Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199. It was assumed by Chief Justice Marshall with regard to the escheat of land to the state in Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. 259, 275; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483; De-Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258; Blythe v. Hinckley, 180 U. S. 333, 340. So as to limited jurisdiction of foreign consuls within a state. Wildenhus's Case, 120 U. S. 1. See Ross v. McIntyre, 140 U. S. 453. Further illustration seems unnecessary, and it only remains to consider the application of established rules to the present case.

Here a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude is involved. It can be protected only by national action in concert with that of another power. The subject-matter is only transitory within the state and has no permanent habitat therein. But for the treaty and the statute there soon might be no birds for any powers to deal with. We see nothing in the Constitution that compels the Government to sit by while a food supply is cut off and the protectors of our forests and our crops are destroyed. It is not sufficient to rely upon the states. The reliance is vain, and were it otherwise, the question is whether the United States is forbidden to act. We are of opinion that the treaty and statute must be upheld. Carey v. South Dakota, 250 U. S. 118.

ASAKURA v. SEATTLE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1924.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER delivered the opinion of the Court.

Plaintiff in error is a subject of the emperor of Japan, and since 1904 has resided in Seattle, Washington. Since July, 1915, he has been engaged in business there as a pawnbroker. The city passed an ordinance, which took effect July 2, 1921, regulating the business of pawnbroker, and repealing former ordinances on the same subject. It makes it unlawful for any person to engage in the business unless he shall have a license, and the ordinance provides "that no such license shall be granted unless the applicant be a citizen of the United States." Violations of the ordinance are punishable by fine or imprisonment or both. Plaintiff in error brought this suit in the superior court of King county, Washington, against the city, its comptroller, and chief of police, to restrain them from enforcing the ordinance against him. He attacked the ordinance on the ground that it violates the treaty between the United States and the Empire of Japan, proclaimed April 5, 1911, 37 Stat. 1504; violates the constitution of the State of Washington, and also the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. He declared his willingness to comply with any valid ordinance relating to the business of pawnbroker. It was shown that he had about $5,000 invested in his business, which would be broken up and destroyed by the enforcement of the ordinance. The superior court granted the relief prayed. On appeal, the supreme court of the state held the ordinance valid and reversed the decree. The case is here on writ of error under § 237 of the Judicial Code.

Does the ordinance violate the treaty? Plaintiff in error invokes and relies upon the following provisions: "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established. * * * The citizens or subjects of each * * * shall receive, in the territories of the other, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, * * *."

A treaty made under the authority of the United States "shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Const., Art. VI, § 2.

The treaty-making power of the United States is not limited by any express provision of the Constitution, and, though it does not extend

"so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids," it does extend to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and other nations. DeGeofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 266, 267; In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453, 463; Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416. The treaty was made to strengthen friendly relations between the two nations. As to the things covered by it, the provision quoted establishes the rule of equality between Japanese subjects while in this country and native citizens. Treaties for the protection of citizens of one country residing in the territory of another are numerous, and make for good understanding between nations. The treaty is binding within the State of Washington. Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 682, 683. The rule of equality established by it cannot be rendered nugatory in any part of the United States by municipal ordinances or state laws. It stands on the same footing of supremacy as do the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States. It operates of itself, without the aid of any legislation, state or national; and it will be applied and given authoritative effect by the courts. Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314; Head, Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 598; Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U. S. 536, 540; Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S. 190, 194; Maiorano v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 213 U. S. 268, 272.

The purpose of the ordinance complained of is to regulate, not to prohibit, the business of pawnbroker. But it makes it impossible for aliens to carry on the business. It need not be considered whether the state, if it sees fit, may forbid and destroy the business generally. Such a law would apply equally to aliens and citizens, and no question of conflict with the treaty would arise. The grievance here alleged is that plaintiff in error, in violation of the treaty, is denied equal opportunity.

By definition contained in the ordinance, pawnbrokers are regarded as carrying on a "business." * * * In this country, the practice of pledging personal property for loans dates back to early colonial times, and pawnshops have been regulated by state laws for more than a century. We have found no state legislation abolishing or forbidding the business. Most, if not all, of the states provide for licensing pawnbrokers and authorize regulation by municipalities. While regulation has been found necessary in the public interest, the business is not, on that account, to be excluded from the trade and commerce referred to in the treaty. Many worthy occupations and lines of legitimate business are regulated by state and federal laws for the protection of the public against fraudulent and dishonest practices. There is nothing in the character of the business of pawnbroker which requires it to be excluded from the field covered by the above-quoted provision, and it must be held that such business is "trade" within the meaning of the treaty. The ordinance violates the treaty. * * * We need not consider other grounds upon which it is attacked.

Decree reversed.

NOTES

1. The treaty-making power belongs exclusively to the federal government, since the Constitution expressly delegates the power to the President and the Senate (Art. II, § 2, cl. 2) and prohibits its exercise by the states (Art. I, § 10, cl. 1). Treaties made "under the authority of the United States" are "the supreme law of the land" and hence stand on a parity in this respect with acts of Congress (Art. VI, cl. 2). In the event of a conflict between a treaty and an act of Congress, the last in point of time is controlling. In Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 28 L. ed. 798, 5 Sup. Ct. 247 (1884), Mr. Justice Miller, discussing the validity of an act of Congress imposing upon vessel owners a tax of fifty cents for each alien passenger brought into the United States from foreign ports, which act was assumed to violate provisions of treaties with foreign countries, said: "A treaty, then, is a law of the land as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined. And when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute. But even in this aspect of the case there is nothing in this law which makes it irrevocable or unchangeable. The Constitution gives it no superiority over an act of Congress in this respect, which may be repealed or modified by an act of a later date. Nor is there anything in its essential character, or in the branches of the government by which the treaty is made, which gives it this superior sanctity."

2. A valid treaty supersedes state law in conflict therewith, whether such state law arises from the state's Constitution, statutes or common law. See, in addition to the principal case, Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 25 L. ed. 628 (1880), where the rights of Swiss citizens to inherit Virginia real estate, which had been guaranteed under a treaty of the United States, were held not defeasible by a state statute under which lands of aliens dying intestate escheated to the state.

In Sei Fujii v. California, 97 A. C. A. 154, 718, 217 Pac. (2d) 481, 218 Pac. (2d) 595 (1950) a California district court of appeal held the California Alien Land Law, which denied to alien Japanese the right to own any legal or beneficial interest in agricultural land, to be no longer enforceable because it was in conflict with the Charter of the United Nations. Two years later, in the same litigation, the Supreme Court of California reached the same result as had the lower court but based its decision on the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution rather than on the Charter of the United Nations. Sei Fujii v. California, 38 Cal. (2d) 718, 242 Pac. (2d) 617 (1952). The court held that the provisions of Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter, pledging member nations to promote observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, are not self-executing, since they lack the mandatory quality and definiteness which would indicate an intent to create justiciable rights in private persons immediately on ratification, and instead are framed as a promise of future action by the member nations. Consequently, the court concluded that the charter provisions relied on were not intended to supersede existing domestic legislation and did not operate to invalidate the challenged statute.

3. In De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 266-267, 33 L. ed. 642, 10 Sup. Ct. 295 (1890), Mr. Justice Field said: "That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations is clear. It is also clear that the protection which should be afforded to the citizens of one country owning property in another, and the manner in which that property may be transferred, devised or inherited, are fitting subjects for such negotiation, and of regulation by mutual stipulations between the two countries. * * * The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government, or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government itself, and of that of the states. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the government, or in that of one of the states, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. * * * But, with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."

4. For general discussions of the scope of the treaty-making power, see Corwin, National Supremacy: Treaty-Power v. State Power (1913); Kuhn, The Treaty-Making Power and the Reserved Sovereignty of the States, 7 Col. L. ### Section 3.—The Legislative Department.

MCGRAIN v. DAUGHERTY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1927.

[Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio which had on habeas corpus discharged the witness referred to in the opinion below. The facts are sufficiently stated in the portions of the opinion printed below, except that the investigation which the committee of the Senate was conducting into charges of neglect of duty raised against Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, was ordered by a Senate resolution, authorizing the committee to subpoena witnesses.]

In the course of the investigation the committee issued and caused to be duly served on Mally S. Daugherty—who was a brother of Harry M. Daugherty and president of the Midland National Bank of Washington Court House, Ohio,—a subpoena commanding him to appear before the committee for the purpose of giving testimony bearing on the subject under investigation, * * *.

The committee then made a report to the Senate stating that the subpoena had been issued, that according to the officer's return—copies of which accompanied the report—the witness was personally served; and that he had failed and refused to appear. After a reading of the report, the Senate adopted a resolution reciting these facts and proceeding as follows:

"Whereas the appearance and testimony of the said M. S. Daugherty is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions imposed upon it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of the said M. S. Daugherty wherever found, and to bring the said M. S. Daugherty before the bar of the Senate, then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate may order the President of the Senate pro tempore to propound; and to keep the said M. S. Daugherty in custody to await the further order of the Senate." * * *

The warrant was issued agreeably to the resolution and was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms. That officer on receiving the warrant endorsed thereon a direction that it be executed by John J. McGrain, already his deputy, and delivered it to him for execution.

The deputy, proceeding under the warrant, took the witness into custody at Cincinnati, Ohio, with the purpose of bringing him before the bar of the Senate as commanded; whereupon the witness petitioned the federal district court in Cincinnati for a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was granted and the deputy made due return setting forth the warrant and the cause of the detention. After a hearing the court held the attachment and detention unlawful and discharged the witness, the decision being put on the ground that the Senate in directing the investigation and in ordering the attachment exceeded its powers under the Constitution, 299 Fed. 620. The deputy prayed and was allowed a direct appeal to this Court under § 238 of the Judicial Code as then existing.

The committee was acting for the Senate and under its authorization; and therefore the subpoenas which the committee issued and the witness refused to obey are to be treated as if issued by the Senate. The warrant was issued as an auxiliary process to compel him to give the testimony sought by the subpoenas; and its nature in this respect is not affected by the direction that his testimony be given at the bar of the Senate instead of before the committee. If the Senate deemed it proper, in view of his contumacy, to give that direction it was at liberty to do so. * * *

The first of the principal questions—the one which the witness particularly presses on our attention—is, as before shown, whether the Senate—or the House of Representatives, both being on the same plane in this regard—has power, through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution.

The Constitution provides for a Congress consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives and invests it with “all legislative powers” granted to the United States, and with power “to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper” for carrying into execution these powers and “all other powers” vested by the Constitution in the United States or in any department or officer thereof. Art. I, secs. 1, 8. Other provisions show that, while bills can become laws only after being considered and passed by both houses of Congress, each house is to be distinct from the other, to have its own officers and rules, and to exercise its legislative function independently. Art. I, secs. 2, 3, 5, 7. But there is no provision expressly investing either house with power to make investigations and exact testimony to the end that it may exercise its legislative function advisedly and effectively. So the question arises whether this power is so far incidental to the legislative function as to be implied.

In actual legislative practice power to secure needed information by such means has long been treated as an attribute of the power to legislate. It was so regarded in the British Parliament and in the Colonial legislatures before the American Revolution; and a like view has prevailed and been carried into effect in both houses of Congress and in most of the state legislatures. * * *

The state courts quite generally have held that the power to legislate carries with it by necessary implication ample authority to obtain information needed in the rightful exercise of that power, and to employ compulsory process for the purpose. * * *

The latest case is Marshall v. Gordon, 243 U. S. 521. The question there was whether the House of Representatives exceeded its power in punishing, as for a contempt of its authority, a person—not a member—who had written, published and sent to the chairman of one of its committees an ill-tempered and irritating letter respecting the action and purposes of the committee. Power to make inquiries and obtain evidence by compulsory process was not involved. The Court recognized distinctly that the House of Representatives has implied power to punish a person not a member for contempt, as was ruled in Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, but held that its action in this instance was without constitutional justification. The decision was put on the ground that the letter, while offensive and vexatious, was not calculated or likely to affect the House in any of its proceedings or in the exercise of any of its functions—in short, that the act which was punished as a contempt was not of such a character as to bring it within the rule that an express power draws after it others which are necessary and appropriate to give effect to it. * * *

With this review of the legislative practice, congressional enactments and court decisions, we proceed to a statement of our conclusions on the question.

We are of the opinion that the power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function. * * * A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself possess the requisite information—which not infrequently is true—recourse must be had to others who do possess it. Experience has taught that mere requests for such information often are unavailing, and also that information which is volunteered is not always accurate or complete; so some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed. All this was true before and when the Constitution was framed and adopted. In that period the power of inquiry—with enforcing process—was regarded and employed as a necessary and appropriate attribute of the power to legislate—indeed, was treated as inhering in it. Thus there is ample warrant for thinking, as we do, that the constitutional provisions which commit the legislative function to the two houses are intended to include this attribute to the end that the function may be effectively exercised.

The contention is earnestly made on behalf of the witness that the power of inquiry, if sustained, may be abusively and oppressively exerted. If this be so, it affords no ground for denying the power. The same contention might be directed against the power to legislate, and of course would be unavailing. We must assume, for present purposes, that neither house will be disposed to exert the power beyond its proper bounds, or without due regard to the rights of witnesses. But if, contrary to this assumption, controlling limitations or restrictions are disregarded, the decisions in Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, and Marshall v. Gordon point to admissible measures of relief. And it is a necessary deduction from the decisions in Kilbourn v. Thompson and In re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661, that a witness rightfully may refuse to answer where the bounds of the power are exceeded or the questions are not pertinent to the matter under inquiry.

We come now to the question whether it sufficiently appears that the purpose for which the witness's testimony was sought was to obtain information in aid of the legislative function. The court below answered the question in the negative. * * *

We are of opinion that the court's ruling on this question was wrong, and that it sufficiently appears, when the proceedings are rightly interpreted, that the object of the investigation and of the effort to secure the witness's testimony was to obtain information for legislative purposes. * * *

We conclude that the investigation was ordered for a legitimate object; that the witness wrongfully refused to appear and testify before the committee and was lawfully attached; that the Senate is entitled to have him give testimony pertinent to the inquiry, either at its bar or before the committee; and that the district court erred in discharging him from custody under the attachment. * * *

What has been said requires that the final order in the district court discharging the witness from custody be reversed.

Final order reversed.

JURNEY v. MACCRACKEN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1935.
294 U. S. 125, 79 L. ed. 802, 55 Sup. Ct. 375.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This petition for a writ of habeas corpus was brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia by William P. MacCracken, Jr., against Chesley W. Journey, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States. The writ issued; the body of the petitioner was produced before that court; and the case was then heard on demurrer to the petition. The trial court discharged the writ and dismissed the petition. The Court of Appeals, two justices dissenting, reversed that judgment and remanded the case to the Supreme Court of the District, with directions to discharge the prisoner from custody. 63 App. D. C. 342, 72 F. 2d 560. This Court granted certiorari because of the importance of the question presented. 293 U. S. 543.

The petition alleges that MacCracken was, on February 12, 1934, arrested, and is held, under a warrant issued on February 9, 1934, after MacCracken had respectfully declined to appear before the bar of the Senate in response to a citation served upon him pursuant to Resolution 172, adopted by the Senate on February 5, 1934. The resolution provides:

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue a citation directing William P. MacCracken, Jr., L. H. Brittin, Gilbert Givven, and Harris M. Hanshue to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of the Senate, on account of the destruction and removal of certain papers, files, and memorandums from the files of William P. MacCracken, Jr., after a subpoena had been served upon William P. MacCracken, Jr., as shown by the report of the Special Senate Committee Investigating Ocean and Air Mail Contracts."

It is conceded that the Senate was engaged in an inquiry which it had the constitutional power to make; that the committee had authority to require the production of papers as a necessary incident of the power of legislation; and that the Senate had the power to coerce their production by means of arrest. McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135. No question is raised as to the propriety of the scope of the subpoena duces tecum, or as to the regularity of any of the proceedings which preceded the arrest. The claim of privilege hereinafter referred to is no longer an issue. MacCracken's sole contention is that the Senate was without power to arrest him with a view to punishing him, because the act complained of—the alleged destruction and removal of the papers after service of the subpoena—was "the past commission of a completed act which prior to the arrest and the proceedings to punish had reached such a stage of finality that it could not longer affect the proceedings of the Senate or any Committee thereof, and which, and the effects of which, had been undone long before the arrest."

The petition occupies, with exhibits, 100 pages of the printed record in this Court; but the only additional averments essential to the decision of the question presented are, in substance, these: The Senate had appointed the special committee to make "a full, complete and detailed inquiry into all existing contracts entered into by the Postmaster General for the carriage of air mail and ocean mail." MacCracken had been served, on January 31, 1934, with a subpoena duces tecum to appear "instantly" before the committee and to bring all books of account and papers "relating to air mail and ocean mail contracts." The witness appeared on that day; stated that he is a lawyer, member of the firm of MacCracken & Lee, with offices in the District; that he was ready to produce all papers which he lawfully could; but that many of those in his possession were privileged communications between himself and corporations or individuals for whom he had acted as attorney; that he could not lawfully produce such papers without the client first having waived the privilege; and that, unless he secured such a waiver, he must exercise his own judgment as to what papers were within the privilege. He gave, however, to the committee the names of these clients; stated the character of services rendered for each; and, at the suggestion of the committee, telegraphed to each asking whether consent to disclose confidential communications would be given. From some of the clients he secured immediately unconditional consent; and on February 1, produced all the papers relating to the business of the clients who had so consented.

On February 2, before the committee had decided whether the production of all the papers should be compelled despite the claims of privilege, MacCracken again appeared and testified as follows: On February 1 he personally permitted Given, a representative of Western Air Express, to examine, without supervision, the files containing papers concerning that company; and authorized him to take therefrom papers which did not relate to air mail contracts. Given, in fact, took some papers which did relate to air mail contracts. On the same day, Brittin, vice president of Northwest Airways, Inc., without MacCracken's knowledge, requested and received from his partner Lee permission to examine the files relating to that company's business and to remove therefrom some papers stated by Brittin to have been dictated by him in Lee's office and to be wholly personal and unrelated to matters under investigation by the committee. Brittin removed from the files some papers; took them to his office; and, with a view to destroying them, tore them into pieces and threw the pieces into a waste paper basket.

Upon the conclusion of MacCracken's testimony on February 2, the committee decided that none of the papers in his possession could be withheld under the claim of privilege. Later that day MacCracken received from the rest of his clients waivers of their privilege; and thereupon promptly made available to the committee all the papers then remaining in the files. On February 3 (after a request therefor by MacCracken), Given restored to the files what he stated were all the papers taken by him. The petition does not allege that any of the papers taken by Brittin were later produced. It avers that, prior to the adoption of the citation for contempt under Resolution 172, MacCracken had produced and delivered to the Senate of the United States, "to the best of his ability, knowledge and belief, every paper of every kind and description in his possession or under his control, relating in any way to air mail and ocean mail contracts; [and that] on February 5, 1934 * * * all of said papers were turned over and delivered to said Senate Committee and since that date they have been, and they now are, in the possession of said Committee."

First. The main contention of MacCracken is that the so-called power to punish for contempt may never be exerted, in the case of a private citizen, solely qua punishment. The argument is that the power may be used by the legislative body merely as a means of removing an existing obstruction to the performance of its duties; that the power to punish ceases as soon as the obstruction has been removed, or its removal has become impossible; and hence that there is no power to punish a witness who, having been requested to produce papers, destroys them after service of the subpoena. The contention rests upon a misconception of the limitations upon the power of the Houses of Congress to punish for contempt. It is true that the scope of the power is narrow. No act is so punishable unless it is of a nature to obstruct the performance of the duties of the Legislature. There may be lack of power, because, as in Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, there was no legislative duty to be performed, or because, as in Marshall v. Gordon, 243 U. S. 521, the act complained of is deemed not to be of a character to obstruct the legislative process. But, where the offending act was of a nature to obstruct the legislative process, the fact that the obstruction has since been removed, or that its removal has become impossible, is without legal significance.

The power to punish a private citizen for a past and completed act was exerted by Congress as early as 1795; and since then it has been exercised on several occasions. It was asserted, before the Revolution, by the colonial assemblies, in imitation of the British House of Commons; and afterwards by the Continental Congress and by state legislative bodies. In Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, decided in 1821, it was held that the House had power to punish a private citizen for an attempt to bribe a member. No case has been found in which an exertion of the power to punish for contempt has been successfully challenged on the ground that, before punishment, the offending act had been consummated or that the obstruction suffered was irremediable. The statements in the opinion in Marshall v. Gordon, supra, upon which MacCracken relies, must be read in the light of the particular facts. It was there recognized that the only jurisdictional test to be applied by the court is the character of the offense; and that the continuance of the obstruction, or the likelihood of its repetition, are considerations for the discretion of the legislators in meting out the punishment.

Here, we are concerned, not with an extension of congressional privilege, but with vindication of the established and essential privilege of requiring the production of evidence. For this purpose, the power to punish for a past contempt is an appropriate means. Compare Ex parte Nugent, Fed. Cas. No. 10,375; Stewart v. Blaine, 1 MacArth. 453. The apprehensions expressed from time to time in congressional debates, in opposition to particular exercises of the contempt power, concerned, not the power to punish, as such, but the broad, undefined privileges which it was believed might find sanction in that power. The ground for such fears has since been effectively removed by the decisions of this Court which hold that assertions of congressional privilege are subject to judicial review, Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra; and that the power to punish for contempt may not be extended to slanderous attacks which present no immediate obstruction to legislative processes, Marshall v. Gordon, supra.

Second. The power of either House of Congress to punish for contempt was not impaired by the enactment in 1857 of the statute, Rev. St. § 102, 2 U. S. C. § 192, making refusal to answer or to produce papers before either House, or one of its committees, a misdemeanor. Compare Sinclair v. United States, 279 U. S. 263. The statute was enacted, not because the power of the Houses to punish for a past contempt was doubted, but because imprisonment limited to the duration of the session was not considered sufficiently drastic a punishment for contumacious witnesses. That the purpose of the statute was merely to supplement the power of contempt by providing for additional punishment was recognized in In re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661, 671, 672: "We grant that Congress could not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the essential and inherent power to punish for contempt, in cases to which the power of either House properly extended; but because Congress, by the act of 1857, sought to aid each of the Houses in the discharge of its constitutional functions, it does not follow that any delegation of the power in each to punish for contempt was involved, and that the statute is not open to objection on that account." Punishment, purely as such, through contempt proceedings, legislative or judicial, is not precluded because punishment may also be inflicted for the same act as a statutory offense. Compare Ex parte Hudgings, 249 U. S. 378, 382. As was said in In re Chapman, supra, "the same act may be an offense against one jurisdiction and also an offense against another; and indictable statutory offenses may be punished as such, while the offenders may likewise be subjected to punishment for the same acts as contempts, the two being diverso intuitu, and capable of standing together."

Third. MacCracken contends that he is not punishable for contempt, because the obstruction, if any, which he caused to legislative processes, had been entirely removed and its evil effects undone before the contempt proceedings were instituted. He points to the allegations in the petition for habeas corpus that he had surrendered all papers in his possession; that he was ready and willing to give any additional testimony which the committee might require; that he had secured the return of the papers taken from the files by Givven, with his permission; and that he was in no way responsible for the removal and destruction of the papers by Brittin. This contention goes to the question of guilt, not to that of the jurisdiction of the Senate. The contempt with which MacCracken is charged is "the destruction and removal of certain papers." Whether he is guilty, and whether he has so far purged himself of contempt that he does not now deserve punishment, are the questions which the Senate proposes to try. The respondent to the petition did not, by demurring, transfer to the court the decision of those questions. The sole function of the writ of habeas corpus is to have the court decide whether the Senate has jurisdiction to make the determination which it proposes. Compare Barry v. United States ex rel. Cunningham, 279 U. S. 597; Henry v. Henkel, 235 U. S. 219; Re Gregory, 219 U. S. 210.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals should be reversed; and that of the Supreme Court of the District should be affirmed.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTES

1. The legitimate functions of Congressional investigating committees have been set forth traditionally as follows: (1) to seek information that will enable Congress to legislate more effectively and wisely; (2) to restrain the activities of administrative officers and agencies, particularly with respect to the enforcement of law and the expenditure of public funds; and (3) to inform the public on matters of governmental interest and thereby attempt to influence public opinion.

2. The statute discussed in Journey v. MacCracken (2 U. S. C. § 192 et seq.; F. C. A. § 192 et seq.) sets up procedure for the punishment of contempts of Congress through the instrumentality of the federal courts. As the opinion makes clear, this statutory procedure merely supplements the power which Congress itself possesses to punish contempts by direct proceedings. In a legislative contempt proceeding either house of Congress involved convenes as a court to try the contempt and, upon conviction, directs imprisonment by its sergeant-at-arms. Although such power is judicial in character, its exercise by Congress is not considered to violate the principle of separation of powers. It is justified as an appropriate means of vindicating the privilege of requiring the production of evidence. The power is limited in its duration to the time of the adjournment of Congress and the punishment is limited to imprisonment. For an annotation on this power see 79 L. ed. 809 (1935). See also, 50 A. L. R. 21 (1927); 65 A. L. R. 1518 (1930).

3. The statutory procedure noted above has been used in aid of many recent Congressional investigations. Its constitutionality was upheld in In re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661, 41 L. ed. 1154, 17 Sup. Ct. 677 (1897). Section 192 makes it a misdemeanor for any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either house of Congress to refuse to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter before either house or any committee thereof. If the person defaults, or having appeared, refuses to answer any question "pertinent to the question under inquiry" he is liable upon conviction to a fine and jail sentence. Section 194 provides that upon failure of the person to testify, Congress shall certify the facts to the appropriate United States attorney, "whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for its action." Section 193 provides that "no witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either house of Congress * * * or by any committee of either house, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous." No testimony given at such hearings "shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony." (18 U. S. C. § 3486; F. C. A. 18 § 3486.) However, this section expressly excepts official papers or records produced by the witness from the privilege. In Adams v. Maryland, 347 U. S. 179, 98 L. ed. 608, 74 Sup. Ct. 442 (1954) it was held that this section bars use of committee testimony in the state courts as well as in federal courts.

4. Does the Constitution impose any limitation upon the scope of Congressional investigations? The only restrictive decision of the Supreme Court (save those involving the right of the witness safeguarded by the Fifth Amendment to refuse to testify on the ground of compulsory self-incrimination, which are dealt with elsewhere in this volume) is Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 L. ed. 377 (1880). Here the court held invalid an investigation into the possible losses of the United States on the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., also upholding an action for false imprisonment brought by a recalcitrant witness against the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives. Speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Miller said that "we are sure that no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House, unless his testimony is required in a matter into which that House has jurisdiction to inquire, and we feel equally sure that neither of these bodies possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen." The opinion also states that the inquiry related to "a matter wherein relief or redress could be had only by a judicial proceeding" and hence did not come within the range of Congressional power. Although the opinion in McGrain v. Daugherty attempts to distinguish the problem involved there from the issues in the Kilbourn case, the reasoning of the two opinions does not seem to be consistent. It has indeed been suggested that the Kilbourn decision was in effect overruled by McGrain v. Daugherty [Hurst, The Growth of American Law (1950), 35], but it has recently been cited with approval by the court in Tenney v. Brandhove, infra, as applicable to situations where Congress acts "outside its legislative role." For a recent analysis and criticism of the Kilbourn case, see Morgan, Congressional Investigations and Judicial Review: Kilbourn v. Thompson Revisited, 37 Cal. L. Rev. 556 (1949). For an earlier study, see Landis, Constitutional Limitations on the Congressional Power of Investigation, 40 Harv. L. Rev. 153 (1926).

5. Attempts in recent years by committees of the House and Senate to inquire into the activities of subversive groups have provoked much controversy and raised important constitutional questions. The most controversial of these investigating committees has been the House Committee on Un-American Activities, formerly known as the "Dies Committee," from the name of its first chairman. Established as a select committee in 1938 to investigate "the extent, character, and objects of un-American propaganda activities in the United States" and "the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin," it was continued by each Congress until 1946, when it achieved permanent status under the Legislative Reorganization Act. The Committee has conducted investigations and issued reports on such matters as the alleged infiltration of Communists into the government service, labor unions, the motion picture industry, peace organizations and the like; the extent of Communist espionage in the atomic energy field, the Department of State and other "sensitive" areas of the federal government; and the spread of Communist propaganda by other groups and individuals claimed to be subversive. The Committee has also submitted lists of allegedly subversive organizations and individuals, based upon the reports of its own investigators and testimony given at its hearings.

May a committee of the House or Senate investigating such activities and propaganda, consistently with the guaranties of the First Amendment, inquire into the private political beliefs and associations of a witness? May it inquire whether the witness was or is a believer in the Communist ideology or a member of the Communist Party? May a witness under subpoena refuse to take the oath on the ground that the committee proposes to inquire into his "private affairs" and to interfere with his freedom of political association? Is the witness free to refuse on the ground that the committee has recommended but little legislation and consequently is not functioning in aid of the legislative process? May a committee require a witness who is an official of an organization under investigation for alleged subversive activities to produce the books and papers of the organization? The case which follows, Barsky v. United States, and the notes which follow that opinion, shed light on these and similar questions.

BARSKY v. UNITED STATES.

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, 1948.
167 F. (2d) 241, 83 App. D. C. 127.

PRETTYMAN, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE. * * *

These appellants were indicted, tried before a jury, convicted, and sentenced for willful failure to produce records before a committee of the Congress pursuant to subpoenas, in violation of Section 192 of Title 2 of the United States Code; F. C. A. 2 § 192. The indictment alleged that appellants were members of the governing body of an unincorporated association known as the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee and that, having been subpoenaed by the Congressional Committee known as the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives, to produce the records of their association relating to the receipt and disbursement of certain money and certain correspondence with persons in foreign countries, they willfully failed to produce these documents.

Upon the trial it was shown that the Congressional Committee existed by virtue of House Resolution No. 5 of the 79th Congress, and that the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee was a private voluntary association engaged in the collection of funds from the public in this country upon representations that such funds were to be used for relief purposes abroad, and in the disbursement of those funds in foreign countries. It was further shown that the Congressional Committee had received "a large number" of complaints that the funds collected by appellants' organization were being used for political propaganda and not for relief.

It made inquiry of the President's War Relief Control Board and, consistently with suggestions there obtained, requested that one of its investigators be permitted to examine the records of the collection and disbursement of the funds. This request was denied. Testimony, including that of an official of the State Department and a person who said that she had observed the operation of appellants' association abroad, was taken. In effect, this testimony sustained the burden of the complaints. Thereupon the Committee issued the subpoenas above described. Appellants appeared before the Committee but declined to produce, or to cause the production of, the described books and documents. They were thereupon indicted, as above described, and appealed from the judgments upon conviction.

Appellant's first point is that the Resolution creating the Congressional Committee was unconstitutional because it authorized inquiry into political opinion and expression, in violation of the First Amendment.

The Resolution which created this Congressional Committee authorized it by one of three subclauses to investigate "the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution."

These appellants were not asked to state their political opinions. They were asked to account for funds. We are unable to visualize the particular in which civil rights are violated by a requirement that persons who collect funds from the public in this country for relief purposes abroad account for the collection and distribution of such funds. Moreover, the fact of the existence of such official bodies as U. N. R. R. A. and the President's War Relief Control Board, and the then-pending proposals for loans to foreign governments, clearly justified Congressional inquiry into the disbursement abroad of private funds collected in this country avowedly for relief but reasonably represented as being spent for political purposes in Europe.

Appellants' point is not premised upon the specific question asked them but upon the scope of possible inquiry under the Resolution. So we examine the contention in the light of the possibility, indicated by the preliminary data before the Committee, that answers to the inquiry might reveal that appellants were believers in Communism or members of the Communist Party.

The problem thus presented is difficult and delicate. In it we have not only the frequent "real problem of balancing the public interest against private security," but in this instance we must do so in the midst of swirling currents of public emotion in both directions. We are presented with extreme declarations in respect to Communists and equally extreme declarations in respect to the Congressional Committee. The duty of the courts is no less than to render judgment with utter detachment. * * *

We think that even if the inquiry here had been such as to elicit the answer that the witness was a believer in Communism or a member of the Communist Party, Congress had power to make the inquiry.

The first phase of the question thus posed concerns the power of the Congress to inquire into the subject described in the above quotation from the Resolution.

Preliminary inquiry has from the earliest times been considered an essential of the legislative process. By it are to be determined both the advisability for and the content of legislation. So that even as to ordinary subjects, the power of inquiry by the legislature is coextensive with the power of legislation and is not limited to the scope or the content of contemplated legislation. Constitutional legislation might ensue from information derived by an inquiry upon the subject described in the quotation from H. F. Res. No. 5. That potentiality is the measure of the power of inquiry. The fact is that at least eight legislative proposals have been submitted to the Congress by this Committee as the result of its investigations. Obviously, the possibility that invalid as well as valid legislation might ensue from an inquiry does not limit the power of inquiry; invalid legislation might ensue from any inquiry. * * *

The existing machinery of government has power to inquire into potential threats to itself, not alone for the selfish reason of self-protection, but for the basic reason that having been established by the people as an instrumentality for the protection of the rights of people, it has an obligation to its creators to preserve itself. Moreover, the process whereby a change in the form of government can be accomplished has been prescribed by the people in the same document which records the establishment of the presently existing machinery, and that process requires the Congress to initiate proposed amendments. We think that inquiry into threats to the existing form of government by extra-constitutional processes of change is a power of Congress under its prime obligation to protect for the people that machinery of which it is a part, and inquiry into the desirability vel non of other forms of government is a power of Congress under its mandate to initiate amendments if such become advisable.

Moreover, Congress is charged with part of the responsibility imposed upon the federal government by that clause of the Constitution which provides that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government." Art. 4, § 4. This clause alone would supply the authority for Congressional inquiry, into potential threats to the republican forms of the governments of the States.

If Congress has power to inquire into the subjects of Communism and the Communist Party, it has power to identify the individuals who believe in Communism and those who belong to the party. The nature and scope of the program and activities depend in large measure upon the character and number of their adherents. Personnel is part of the subject. Moreover, the accuracy of the information obtained depends in large part upon the knowledge and the attitude of the witness, whether present before the Committee or represented by the testimony of another. We note at this point that the arguments directed to the invalidity of this inquiry under the First Amendment would apply to an inquiry directed to another person as well as to one directed to the individual himself. The right to refuse self-incrimination is not involved. The problem relates to the power of inquiry into a matter which is not a violation of law.

The Congressional power of inquiry is not unrestricted. One obvious limitation upon this particular sort of inquiry is that some reasonable cause for concern must appear. We are referred to the "clear and present danger" rule expressed by Mr. Justice Holmes in Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 52, and extending through the line of cases cited and discussed in Bridges v. California, 314 U. S. 252. But all those cases dealt with statutes which actually imposed a restriction upon speech or publication. In our view, it would be sheer folly as a matter of government policy for an existing government to refrain from inquiry into potential threats to its existence or security until danger was clear and present. And for the judicial branch of government to hold the legislative branch to be without power to make such inquiry until the danger is clear and present, would be absurd. How, except upon inquiry, would the Congress know whether the danger is clear and present? There is a vast difference between the necessities for inquiry and the necessities for action. The latter may be only when danger is clear and present, but the former is when danger is reasonably represented as potential.

There was justification here, within the bounds of the foregoing restriction, for the exercise of the power of inquiry. The President, pursuant to the constitutional requirement that "He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union" (Art. II, § 3), has announced to the Congress the conclusion that aggressive tendencies of totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples threaten the security of the United States, and he mentioned the activities of Communists in that connection. That proposition underlies much of the current foreign policy of the Government. It is also the premise upon which much important legislation is now pending. * * *

Moreover, that the governmental ideology described as Communism and held by the Communist Party is antithetical to the principles which underlie the form of government incorporated in the federal Constitution and guaranteed by it to the States, is explicit in the basic documents of the two systems; and the view that the former is a potential menace to the latter is held by sufficiently respectable authorities, both judicial and lay, to justify Congressional inquiry into the subject. * * *

Appellants argue that since an answer that the witness is a Communist would subject him to embarrassment and damage, the asking of the question is an unconstitutional burden upon free speech. It is no doubt true that public revelation at the present time of Communist belief and activity on the part of an individual would result in embarrassment and damage. This result would not occur because of the Congressional act itself; that is, the Congress is not imposing a liability, or attaching by direct enactment a stigma. The result would flow from the current unpopularity of the revealed belief and activity. Contra, it is suggested that since the pressure of unpopularity affects only sensitive or timid people, there need be less concern, on the theory that democratic processes must necessarily contemplate rugged courage on the part of those who hold convictions, or even beliefs, on government. But it is true, realistically, that even one fully equipped to formulate a personal preference for a system of government at odds in basic respects with that presently existing, may be deterred from his conclusion by fear of, or distaste for, the unpopularity attached to it. We proceed upon the theory that even the most timid and sensitive cannot be unconstitutionally restrained in the freedom of his thought. But this consideration does not solve the problem, because the problem is the relative necessity of the public interest as against the private rights. Even assuming private rights of the timid to be of the fullest weight, the problem remains whether they outweigh the public necessities in this matter. That the protection of private rights upon occasion involves an invasion of those rights is in theory a paradox but, in the world as it happens to be, is a realistic problem requiring a practical answer. That invasion should never occur except upon necessity, but unless democratic government (by which we mean government premised upon individual human rights) can protect itself by means commensurate with danger, it is doomed. That it cannot do so is the hope of its opponents, the query of its skeptics, the fear of its supporters. While we will not give less consideration to the private rights involved because they may be those of the more sensitive or less courageous, on the other hand we cannot say that merely because those affected are of less courage or greater sensitivity than the average, therefore the public interest must be waived or given less consideration. * * *

Appellants press upon us representations as to the conduct of the Congressional Committee, critical of its behavior in various respects. Eminent persons have stated similar views. But such matters are not for the courts. * * *

We hold that in view of the representations to the Congress as to the nature, purposes and program of Communism and the Communist Party, and in view of the legislation proposed, pending and possible in respect to or premised upon that subject, and in view of the involvement of that subject in the foreign policy of the Government, Congress has power to make an inquiry of an individual which may elicit the answer that the witness is a believer in Communism or a member of the Communist Party. And we further hold that the provision we have quoted from House Resolution No. 5 is sufficiently clear, definite and authoritative to permit this particular Committee to make that particular inquiry. We hold no more than that. * * *

It follows that the judgments of the District Court must be, and they are

Affirmed.

EDGERTON, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE (dissenting).

In my opinion the House Committee's investigation abridges freedom of speech and inflicts punishment without trial; and the statute the appellants are convicted of violating provides no ascertainable standard of guilt. It follows that the convictions should be reversed on constitutional grounds.

The First Amendment forbids Congress to make any law "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." If this "is to mean anything, it must restrict powers which are * * * granted by the Constitution to Congress." Legislation abridging the freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment is not made valid by the fact that it would be valid if it did not abridge them. * * *

The investigation restricts the freedom of speech by uncovering and stigmatizing expressions of unpopular views. The Committee gives wide publicity to its proceedings. This exposes the men and women whose views are advertised to risks of insult, ostracism, and lasting loss of employment. Persons disposed to express unpopular views privately or to a selected group are often not disposed to risk the consequences to themselves and their families that publication may entail. The Committee's practice of advertising and stigmatizing unpopular views is therefore a strong deterrent to any expression, however private, of such views.

The investigation also restricts freedom of speech by forcing people to express views. Freedom of speech is freedom in respect to speech and includes freedom not to speak. * * * Witnesses before the House Committee are under pressure to profess approved beliefs. They cannot express others without exposing themselves to disastrous consequences. Yet if they have previously expressed others they cannot creditably or credibly profess those that are approved. If they decline "publicly to profess any statement of belief" they invite punishment for contempt. The privilege of choosing between speech that means ostracism and speech that means perjury is not freedom of speech. * * *

It is said that Congress may punish propaganda that advocates overthrow of the government by force or violence; that it may therefore investigate to determine whether such legislation is necessary; and that it may do this even if the investigation burdens such propaganda and is intended to do so. In short, it is said that the House Committee's investigation is a necessary means to a constitutional end and is therefore constitutional. To this there are at least three answers.

(1) Investigation of possible need for legislation making it unlawful to advocate overthrow of the government by force or violence has not been necessary and has not been among the purposes of Congress or of the House Committee at any time since 1940. On the contrary, the broadest possible legislation of that sort was passed in that year and is still on the books.

(2) The Committee's enabling Act says nothing about force or violence or overthrow of the government. It is broad enough to include investigation of propaganda advocating such things, but it is not by any means limited to such propaganda, and neither is the Committee's actual investigation. Though the Committee has concerned itself largely with Communism, and formerly with fascism, it has also concerned itself with propaganda unrelated to any possible overthrow of the government by force and plainly beyond any power of Congress to burden or restrain. * * *

(3) The problem is not, as the court suggests, that of balancing public or social interests against private interests. "The principle on which speech is classified as lawful or unlawful involves the balancing against each other of two very important social interests, in public safety and in the search for truth. * * * Imprisonment of 'half-baked' agitators for 'foolish talk' may often discourage wise men from publishing valuable criticism of governmental policies. * * * The great interest in free speech should be sacrificed only when the interest in public safety is really imperiled. * * * The American policy is to meet force by force, and talk by talk." [Citing Chafee, Free Speech in the United States, 35, IX, 180.] * * *

There is no evidence in the record that propaganda has created danger, clear and present or obscure and remote, that the government of the United States or any government in the United States will be overthrown by force or violence. * * *

The court asks "How, except upon inquiry, would the Congress know whether the danger is clear and present?" The context shows that this means "How, except upon Congressional inquiry * * *?"

The answer is: through the Department of Justice, whose duty it is, if clear and present danger can be discovered, to enforce the law of 1940 which makes it a crime to advocate overthrow of the government by force; through the intelligence services; and through any new agency that Congress may think it useful to create. As the House Committee's history shows, no dangerous propaganda that eludes other agencies is likely to be discovered by a congressional inquiry. But a congressional inquiry, however superfluous, to discover whether there is clear and present danger, could be authorized and could be conducted without violating the First Amendment. The premise that the government must have power to protect itself by discovering whether it is in clear and present danger of overthrow by violence is sound. But it does not support the conclusion that Congress may compel men to disclose their personal opinions, to a committee and also to the world, on topics ranging from Communism, however remotely and peaceably achieved, to the "American system of checks and balances," the British Empire, and the Franco government of Spain. Since the premise does not support this conclusion it has nothing to do with this case. It justifies no punitive exposure. It justifies a very different investigation from the one the House Committee conducts. The investigation the Committee conducts is unsupported by any color of necessity. * * *

The Committee's specific inquiry abridged appellants' freedom of speech and attempted to inflict punishment without trial. The Committee's entire investigation was unconstitutional both as abridging freedom of speech and as attempting to punish without trial; and there is no duty to respond to inquiries in an unconstitutional proceeding. The statute the appellants are convicted of violating provides no ascertainable standard of guilt. * * *

1. The Supreme Court denied certiorari in the Barsky case. 334 U. S. 843, 92 L. ed. 1767, 68 Sup. Ct. 1511 (1948), Justice Black and Douglas dissenting. Petition for rehearing was denied, the same justices dissenting, 339 U. S. 971, 94 L. ed. 1379, 70 Sup. Ct. 1001 (1950).

2. In United States v. Josephson, 165 F. (2d) 82 (1947), defendant, summoned by the same Committee, refused to take the oath and testify until he had had an opportunity in the courts to determine the legality of the Committee. Convicted of violating the statute, he appealed on the grounds (1) that if he had taken the oath and testified the Committee would have inquired into his "private affairs"; (2) that the investigation interfered with his freedom of speech; and (3) that since the Committee had recommended the enactment of but little legislation, the investigation was not in aid of the legislative function. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit repudiated all of these contentions and affirmed the conviction, Judge Clark dissenting. The Supreme Court denied certiorari, Justices Douglas, Murphy and Rutledge dissenting, 333 U. S. 838, 92 L. ed. 1122, 68 Sup. Ct. 609 (1948). Rehearing denied, 335 U. S. 899, 93 L. ed. 434, 69 Sup. Ct. 294 (1948).

3. In 1947 the investigation by the same Committee of alleged Communist infiltration of the motion picture industry led to the citation of ten witnesses for contempt in refusing to answer, among others, a question as to past and present membership of the witnesses in the Communist Party. Convictions of these witnesses were upheld by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and all served prison sentences. Lawson v. United States, Trumbo v. United States, 176 F. (2d) 49, 85 App. D. C. 167 (1949). Certiorari denied, 339 U. S. 934, 972, 94 L. ed. 1352, 1379, 70 Sup. Ct. 663, 994 (1950), Justices Black and Douglas dissenting. Rehearing denied, 339 U. S. 972, 94 L. ed. 1379, 70 Sup. Ct. 994 (1950). For refusal to produce the books and records of the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties defendant Marshall was convicted of contempt and his conviction was upheld. Marshall v. United States, 176 F. (2d) 473, 85 App. D. C. 184 (1949). Certiorari denied, 339 U. S. 933, 94 L. ed. 1352, 70 Sup. Ct. 663 (1950), Justice Black dissenting. Rehearing denied, 339 U. S. 959, 94 L. ed. 1369, 70 Sup. Ct. 976 (1950). See also Kamp v. United States, 176 F. (2d) 618, 84 App. D. C. 187 (1948), cert. den., 339 U. S. 957, 94 L. ed. 1369, 70 Sup. Ct. 977 (1950).

4. Rumely, secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government, was convicted of contempt of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities for refusal to reveal the names of those who made bulk purchases of books for further distribution. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed (Judge Bazelon dissenting) on the ground that the authority given the House Committee by the enabling resolution to investigate "all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation" and "all activities of agencies of the federal government intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation" did not justify the demand made upon appellant, since the public sale of books and documents is not "lobbying." It was further held that the term "lobbying activities" must be interpreted in its commonly accepted sense and did not purport to confer power to investigate efforts to influence public opinion. Rumely v. United States, 197 F. (2d) 166, 90 App. D. C. 382 (1952). Granting certiorari, the Supreme Court affirmed on the ground that the resolution defining the Committee's powers had not conferred upon it authority to inquire into all efforts of private individuals to influence public opinion through books and periodicals. United States v. Rumely, 345 U. S. 41, 97 L. ed. 494, 73 Sup. Ct. 543 (1953). By thus limiting the scope of the Committee's powers the court avoided determination of the constitutional issue raised under the First Amendment. Speaking for the court Mr. Justice Frankfurter said: "Whenever constitutional limits upon the investigative power of Congress have to be drawn by this court, it ought only to be done after Congress has demonstrated its full awareness of what is at stake by unequivocally authorizing an inquiry of dubious limits. Experience admonishes us to tread warily in this domain. The loose language of Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, the weighty criticism to which it has been subjected, * * * the inroads that have been made upon that case by later cases, McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135, 170-171, and Sinclair v. United States, 279 U. S. 263, strongly counsel abstention from adjudication unless no choice is left."

5. Blau v. United States, 340 U. S. 159, 95 L. ed. 170, 71 Sup. Ct. 223 (1950), although concerned specifically with the rights of a witness before a federal grand jury, indicates that a witness before a Congressional committee may rightfully refuse on the ground of compulsory self-incrimination to answer questions relative to past or present membership in the Communist Party. This constitutional right has been frequently claimed by witnesses summoned before such committees since the first indictment in 1948 of Communist Party leaders under the Smith Act. Prosecutions of a number of these witnesses ordered by the House were generally unsuccessful, the courts sustaining the privilege except in cases where it was held to have been waived or improperly invoked.

6. United States v. Bryan, 339 U. S. 323, 94 L. ed. 884, 70 Sup. Ct. 724 (1950) involved the refusal of the witness Bryan, executive secretary of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, to produce books, papers and records called for by subpoenas from the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The Supreme Court held, inter alia, that the statute (18 U. S. C. § 3486; F. C. A. 18 § 3486) which provides that no testimony given by a witness before a Congressional committee shall be used in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony, did not preclude the Government in the trial for contempt from reading to the jury testimony given by defendant before the Committee when called upon to produce the records. The court said, through Chief Justice Vinson: "Admittedly her testimony relative to production of the books comes within the literal language of the statute; but the trial court thought that to apply the statute to respondent's testimony would subvert the congressional purpose in its passage. We agree." Justices Black and Frankfurter, dissenting, thought that the court had read the statute as if Congress had forbidden the use of such testimony, "except in a prosecution for perjury or for failure to produce records." In their view, the effect of the statute was to render inadmissible defendant's testimony before the Committee.

7. The problem of balancing the power of Congress to investigate as an aid to the legislative process and the right of the individual witness to a fair hearing before a legislative committee has produced an enormous amount of discussion and a voluminous literature. Of especial value for its consideration of varying aspects of the problem is the Symposium on Congressional Investigations, 18 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 421 (1951). For an appraisal of the investigations conducted by the House Committee on Un-American Activities during its earlier years, see Ogden, The Dies Committee (2d ed., 1945). The most comprehensive and objective discussion of the work of this Committee during the period from 1945 to 1950 is to be found in Carr, The House Committee on Un-American Activities (1952). For an annotation on the privileges and immunities of witnesses testifying before Congressional committees, see 94 L. ed. 899 (1950). See also 19 A. L. R. (2d) 388 (1951).

TENNEY v. BRANDHOVE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1951.
341 U. S. 367, 95 L. ed. 1019, 71 Sup. Ct. 783.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

William Brandhove brought this action in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, alleging that he had been deprived of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. The defendants are Jack B. Tenney and other members of a committee of the California Legislature, the Senate Fact-Finding Committee on Un-American Activities, colloquially known as the Tenney Committee. Also named as defendants are the Committee and Elmer E. Robinson, Mayor of San Francisco.

The action is based on §§ 43 and 47 (3) of title 8 of the United States Code. [F. C. A. 8 §§ 43, 47 (3).] These sections derive from one of the statutes, passed in 1871, aimed at enforcing the Fourteenth Amendment. Act of April 20, 1871, ch. 22, §§ 1, 2, 17 Stat. 13. Section 43 provides:

"Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress." R. S. § 1979.

Section 47 (3) provides a civil remedy against "two or more persons" who may conspire to deprive another of constitutional rights, as therein defined.

Reduced to its legal essentials, the complaint shows these facts. The Tenney Committee was constituted by a resolution of the California Senate on June 20, 1947. On January 28, 1949, Brandhove circulated a petition among members of the State Legislature. He alleges that it was circulated in order to persuade the Legislature not to appropriate further funds for the Committee. The petition charged that the Committee had used Brandhove as a tool in order "to smear Congressman Franck R. Havenner as a 'Red' when he was a candidate for Mayor of San Francisco in 1947, and that the Republican machine in San Francisco and the campaign management of Elmer E. Robinson, Franck Havenner's opponent, conspired with the Tenney Committee to this end." In view of the conflict between this petition and evidence previously given by Brandhove, the Committee asked local prosecuting officials to institute criminal proceedings against him. The Committee also summoned Brandhove to appear before them at a hearing held on January 29. Testimony was there taken from the Mayor of San Francisco, allegedly a member of the conspiracy. The plaintiff appeared with counsel, but refused to give testimony. For this he was prosecuted for contempt in the State courts. Upon the jury's failure to return a verdict this prosecution was dropped. After Brandhove refused to testify, the Chairman quoted testimony given by Brandhove at prior hearings. The Chairman also read into the record a statement concerning an alleged criminal record of Brandhove, a newspaper article denying the truth of his charges, and a denial by the Committee's counsel—who was absent—that Brandhove's charges were true.

Brandhove alleges that the January 29 hearing "was not held for a legislative purpose," but was designed "to intimidate and silence plaintiff and deter and prevent him from effectively exercising his constitutional rights of free speech and to petition the Legislature for redress of grievances, and also to deprive him of the equal protection of the laws, due process of law, and of the enjoyment of equal privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States under the law, and so did intimidate, silence, deter, and prevent and deprive plaintiff." Damages of $10,000 were asked "for legal counsel, traveling, hotel accommodations, and other matters pertaining and necessary to his defense" in the contempt proceeding arising out of the Committee hearings. The plaintiff also asked for punitive damages.

The action was dismissed without opinion by the District Judge. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held, however, that the complaint stated a cause of action against the Committee and its members. 183 F. (2d) 121. We brought the case here because important issues are raised concerning the rights of individuals and the power of state legislatures. 340 U. S. 903.

We are again faced with the Reconstruction legislation which caused the Court such concern in Screws v. United States 325 U. S. 91, and in the Williams Cases decided this term. 341 U. S. 58, 341 U. S. 70. But this time we do not have to wrestle with far-reaching questions of constitutionality or even of construction. We think it is clear that the legislation on which this action is founded does not impose liability on the facts before us, once they are related to the presuppositions of our political history.

The privilege of legislators to be free from arrest or civil process for what they do or say in legislative proceedings has taproots in the Parliamentary struggles of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. As Parliament achieved increasing independence from the Crown, its statement of the privilege grew stronger. In 1523, Sir Thomas More could make only a tentative claim. Roper, Life of Sir Thomas More, in More's Utopia (Adams ed.) 10. In 1668, after a long and bitter struggle, Parliament finally laid the ghost of Charles I, who had prosecuted Sir John Elliot and others for "seditious" speeches in Parliament. Proceedings against Sir John Elliott (Eng) 3 How. St. Tr., 294, 332. In 1689, the Bill of Rights declared in unequivocal language: "That the Freedom of Speech, and Debates or Proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any Court or Place out of Parliament." 1 Wm. & Mary Sess. 2, cap. 2.

Freedom of speech and action in the legislature was taken as a matter of course by those who severed the Colonies from the Crown and founded our Nation. It was deemed so essential for representatives of the people that it was written into the Articles of Confederation and later into the Constitution. Article 5 of the Articles of Confederation is quite close to the English Bill of Rights: "Freedom of Speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress. . . ." Article 1 § 6, of the Constitution provides: ". . . for any Speech or Debate in either House, [the Senators and Representatives] shall not be questioned in any other Place."

The reason for the privilege is clear. It was well summarized by James Wilson, an influential member of the Committee of Detail which was responsible for the provision in the Federal Constitution. "In order to enable and encourage a representative of the public to discharge his public trust with firmness and success, it is indispensably necessary, that he should enjoy the fullest liberty of speech, and that he should be protected from the resentment of every one, however powerful, to whom the exercise of that liberty may occasion offence." II Works of James Wilson (Andrews ed. 1896) 38. See the statement of the reason for the privilege in the Report from the Select Committee on the Official Secrets Act (House of Commons, 1939) XIV.

The provision in the United States Constitution was a reflection of political principles already firmly established in the States. Three State Constitutions adopted before the Federal Constitution specifically protected the privilege. The Maryland Constitution of 1776 provided: "That freedom of speech and debates, or proceedings in the Legislature, ought not to be impeached in any other court or judicature." Part I, Art. 8. The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 provided: "The freedom of deliberation, speech, and debate, in either house of the legislature, is so essential to the rights of the people, that it cannot be the foundation of any accusation or prosecution, action or complaint, in any other court or place whatsoever." Part I, Art. 21. * * *

The New Hampshire Constitution of 1784 provided: "The freedom of deliberation, speech, and debate, in either house of the legislature, is so essential to the rights of the people, that it cannot be the foundation of any action, complaint, or prosecution, in any other court or place whatsoever." Part I, Art. 30.

It is significant that legislative freedom was so carefully protected by constitutional framers at a time when even Jefferson expressed fear of legislative excess. For the loyalist executive and judiciary had been deposed, and the legislature was supreme in most States during and after the Revolution. "The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex." Madison, The Federalist Papers, No. XLVIII.

As other States joined the Union or revised their Constitutions, they took great care to preserve the principle that the legislature must be free to speak and act without fear of criminal and civil liability. Forty-one of the forty-eight States now have specific provisions in their Constitutions protecting the privilege.

Did Congress by the general language of its 1871 statute mean to overturn the tradition of legislative freedom achieved in England by Civil War and carefully preserved in the formation of State and National Governments here? Did it mean to subject legislators to civil liability for acts done within the sphere of legislative activity? Let us assume, merely for the moment, that Congress has constitutional power to limit the freedom of State legislators acting within their traditional sphere. That would be a big assumption. But we would have to make an even rasher assumption to find that Congress thought it had exercised the power. These are difficulties we cannot hurdle. The limits of §§ 1 and 2 of the 1871 statute—now §§ 43 and 47 (3) of Title 8—were not spelled out in debate. We cannot believe that Congress—itself a staunch advocate of legislative freedom—would impinge on a tradition so well grounded in history and reason by covert inclusion in the general language before us.

We come then to the question whether from the pleadings it appears that the defendants were acting in the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. Legislatures may not of course acquire power by an unwarranted extension of privilege. The House of Commons' claim of power to establish the limits of its privilege has been little more than a pretense since Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 2 Eng. Reprint 126, 1 E. R. C. 521, 3 id. 320, 2 Eng. Reprint 710. This Court has not hesitated to sustain the rights of private individuals when it found Congress was acting outside its legislative role. Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168; Marshall v. Gordon, 243 U. S. 521; compare McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135, 176.

The claim of an unworthy purpose does not destroy the privilege. Legislators are immune from deterrents to the uninhibited discharge of their legislative duty, not for their private indulgence but for the public good. One must not expect uncommon courage even in legislators. The privilege would be of little value if they could be subjected to the cost and inconvenience and distractions of a trial upon a conclusion of the pleader, or to the hazard of a judgment against them based upon a jury's speculation as to motives. The holding of this Court in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 130, that it was not consonant with our scheme of government for a court to inquire into the motives of legislators, has remained unquestioned. See cases cited in Arizona v. California, 283 U. S. 423, 455.

Investigations, whether by standing or special committees, are an established part of representative government. Legislative committees have been charged with losing sight of their duty of disinterestedness. In times of political passion, dishonest or vindictive motives are readily attributed to legislative conduct and as readily believed. Courts are not the place for such controversies. Self-discipline and the voters must be the ultimate reliance for discouraging or correcting such abuses. The courts should not go beyond the narrow confines of determining that a committee's inquiry may fairly be deemed within its province. To find that a committee's investigation has exceeded the bounds of legislative power it must be obvious that there was a usurpation of functions exclusively vested in the Judiciary or the Executive. The present case does not present such a situation. Brandhove indicated that evidence previously given by him to the committee was false, and he raised serious charges concerning the work of a committee investigating a problem within legislative concern. The Committee was entitled to assert a right to call the plaintiff before it and examine him.

It should be noted that this is a case in which the defendants are members of a legislature. Legislative privilege in such a case deserves greater respect than where an official acting on behalf of the legislature is sued or the legislature seeks the affirmative aid of the courts to assert a privilege. In Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, supra, this Court allowed a judgment against the Sergeant-at-Arms, but found that one could not be entered against the defendant members of the House.

We have only considered the scope of the privilege as applied to the facts of the present case. As Mr. Justice Miller said in the Kilbourn Case: "It is not necessary to decide here that there may not be things done, in the one House or the other, of an extraordinary character, for which the members who take part in the act may be held legally responsible." We conclude only that here the individual defendants and the legislative committee were acting in a field where legislators traditionally have power to act, and that the statute of 1871 does not create civil liability for such conduct.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed and that of the District Court affirmed. Reversed.

[MR. JUSTICE BLACK, concurring, said that the holding had resulted from "reference to the long-standing and wise tradition that legislators are immune from legal responsibility for their legislative statements and activities." He pointed out, however, that the decision "indicates that there is a point at which a legislator's conduct so far exceeds the bounds of legislative power that he may be held personally liable in a suit brought under the Civil Rights Act." MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting, emphasized that the claim was that a legislative committee brought the weight of its authority down on plaintiff for exercising his right of free speech. He thought that it was the purpose of the statute to secure federal rights against invasion by officers and agents of the states. "I see no reason," he said, "why any officer of government should be higher than the Constitution from which all rights and privileges of an office obtain."]

NOTES

1. Is the Court right in concluding that courts are not the proper place for the settlement of controversies of this type and that "self-discipline and the voters must be the ultimate reliance for discouraging or correcting such abuses"? Legislative freedom has been so zealously guarded by constitutional provisions and by the courts that it will apparently take a strong case to break down the tradition of immunity.

2. Since constitutional problems relating to the delegation of legislative power and the limits of discretion in rule-making are dealt with in separate courses in Administrative Law, now offered in the curricula of most law schools, these topics are omitted from consideration in this case-book. On the general subject, see Duff and Whiteside, Delegata Potestas Non Potest Delegari: A Maxim of American Constitutional Law, 14 *Corn. L. ## CHAPTER III

INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Section 1.—The States and the United States.

COYLE v. SMITH.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1911.

[An Act of Congress of June 16, 1903, entitled, "An act to enable the people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory to form a constitution and state government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states" required that the capital of said State of Oklahoma should be temporarily located at Guthrie and should not be moved prior to 1913, and that in the interval the state should not appropriate any public money to erect buildings for capital purposes. The act also required that a constitutional convention held in the state should "by ordinance irrevocable, accept the terms and conditions of the act." A convention did so. In 1910 the legislature of the state passed a statute removing the capital from Guthrie to Oklahoma City and made appropriation for the erection of capital buildings. Another statute gave the Supreme Court of Oklahoma original jurisdiction of a taxpayer's bill to test the validity of the capital-removal statute. To review the judgment of that court sustaining the statute this writ of error was sued out.]

MR. JUSTICE LURTON delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The power to locate its own seat of government and to determine when and how it shall be changed from one place to another, and to appropriate its own public funds for that purpose, are essentially and peculiarly state powers. That one of the original thirteen states could now be shorn of such powers by an act of Congress would not be for a moment entertained. The question then comes to this: Can a state be placed upon a plane of inequality with its sister states in the union if the Congress chooses to impose conditions which so operate, at the time of its admission? The argument is, that while Congress may not deprive a state of any power which it possesses, it may, as a condition to the admission of a new state, constitutionally restrict its authority, to the extent at least, of suspending its powers for a definite time in respect to the location of its seat of government. This contention is predicated upon the constitutional power of admitting new states to this union, and the constitutional duty of guaranteeing to "every state in the union a republican form of government." The position of counsel for the appellants is substantially this: That the power of Congress to admit new states and to determine whether or not its fundamental law is republican in form, are political powers, and as such, uncontrollable by the courts. That Congress may in the exercise of such power impose terms and conditions upon the admission of the proposed new state, which, if accepted, will be obligatory, although they operate to deprive the state of powers which it would otherwise possess, and, therefore, not admitted upon "an equal footing with the original states."

The power of Congress in respect to the admission of new states is found in the third section of the fourth Article of the Constitution. That provision is that, "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." The only expressed restriction upon this power is that no new state shall be formed within the jurisdiction of any other state, nor by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of such states, as well as of the Congress.

But what is this power? It is not to admit political organizations which are less or greater, or different in dignity or power, from those political entities which constitute the Union. It is, as strongly put by counsel, a "power to admit states." * * *

The power is to admit "new States into this Union."

"This Union" was and is a union of states, equal in power, dignity and authority, each competent to exert that residuum of sovereignty not delegated to the United States by the Constitution itself. To maintain otherwise would be to say that the union, through the power of Congress to admit new states, might come to be a union of states unequal in power, as including states whose powers were restricted only by the Constitution, with others whose powers had been further restricted by an act of Congress accepted as a condition of admission. Thus it would result, first, that the powers of Congress would not be defined by the Constitution alone, but in respect to new states, enlarged or restricted by the conditions imposed upon new states by its own legislation admitting them into the union; and, second, that such new states might not exercise all of the powers which had not been delegated by the Constitution, but only such as had not been further bargained away as conditions of admission. * * *

We come now to the question as to whether there is anything in the decisions of this Court which sanctions the claims that Congress may by the imposition of conditions in an enabling act deprive a new state of any of those attributes essential to its equality in dignity and power with other states. In considering the decisions of this court bearing upon the question, we must distinguish first, between provisions which are fulfilled by the admission of the state; second, between compacts or affirmative legislation intended to operate in futuro, which are within the scope of the conceded powers of Congress over the subject; and third, compacts or affirmative legislation which operates to restrict the powers of such new states in respect of matters which would otherwise be exclusively within the sphere of state power.

As to requirements in such enabling acts as relate only to the contents of the constitution for the proposed new state, little need to be said. The constitutional provision concerning the admission of new states is not a mandate, but a power to be exercised with discretion. From this alone it would follow that Congress may require, under penalty of denying admission, that the organic laws of a new state at the time of admission shall be such as to meet its approval. A constitution thus supervised by Congress would, after all, be a constitution of a state, and as such subject to alteration and amendment by the state after admission. Its force would be that of a state constitution, and not that of an act of Congress. * * *

Has Oklahoma been admitted upon an equal footing with the original states? If she has, she by virtue of her jurisdictional sovereignty as such a state may determine for her own people the proper location of the local seat of government. She is not equal in power to them if she cannot. * * *

The constitutional equality of the states is essential to the harmonious operation of the scheme upon which the republic was organized. When that equality disappears we may remain a free people, but the Union will not be the Union of the Constitution.

Judgment affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA AND MR. JUSTICE HOLMES dissent.

NOTES

1. "The people of the United States constitute one nation, under one government, and this government, within the scope of the powers with which it is invested, is supreme. On the other hand, the people of each state compose a state, having its own government, and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence. The states disunited might continue to exist. Without the states in union there could be no such political body as the United States.

"Both the states and the United States existed before the Constitution. The people, through that instrument, established a more perfect union by substituting a national government, acting, with ample power, directly upon the citizens, instead of the Confederate government, which acted with powers, greatly restricted, only upon the states. But in many articles of the Constitution the necessary existence of the states, and, within their proper spheres, the independent authority of the states, is distinctly recognized. To them nearly the whole charge of interior regulation is committed or left; to them and to the people all powers not expressly delegated to the national government are reserved. The general condition was well stated by Mr. Madison in the Federalist, thus: 'The federal and state governments are in fact but different agents and trustees of the people, constituted with different powers and designated for different purposes.'" Mr. Chief Justice Chase in Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. 71, 76, 19 L. ed. 101, 104 (1868).

2. The Supreme Court had distinguished between conditions imposed upon incoming states which impinge upon their political or governmental authority and those which relate to contractual arrangements affecting property rights and relationships. In Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U. S. 223, 45 L. ed. 162, 21 Sup. Ct. 73 (1900), it was held that an agreement in the enabling act of Minnesota by which the state received from the United States certain public lands in return for which it agreed not to tax the land still owned in the state by the federal government and not to tax the property of nonresidents at a higher rate than that of residents, was enforceable against a subsequent effort of the state to violate it. The court said: "There may be agreements or compacts attempted to be entered into between two states, or between a state and the nation, in reference to political rights and obligations, and there may be those solely in reference to property belonging to one or the other. That different considerations may underlie the question as to the validity of these two kinds of compacts or agreements is obvious. It has often been said that a state admitted into the Union enters therein in full equality with all the others, and such equality may forbid any agreement or compact limiting or qualifying political rights and obligations; whereas, on the other hand, a mere agreement in reference to property involves no question of equality of status, but only of the power of a state to deal with the nation or with any other state in reference to such property. The case before us is one involving simply an agreement as to property between a state and the nation."

3. In Economy Light & Power Co. v. United States, 256 U. S. 113, 65 L. ed. 847, 41 Sup. Ct. 409 (1921), it was said that restrictions on the action of a state imposed by Congress prior to its admission on a subject within the jurisdiction of Congress are valid, for they may be imposed after, as well as before, the admission of the state into the Union. Here the court held that insofar as the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory (re-enacted by Congress in 1789) established rights of highway in navigable waters capable of bearing interstate commerce, it did not regulate internal affairs of states and was no more capable of repeal by one of the states than any other regulation of interstate commerce enacted by Congress. But the court said: "To the extent that it pertained to internal affairs, the Ordinance of 1787—notwithstanding its contractual form—was no more than a regulation of territory belonging to the United States, and was superseded by the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union 'on an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatever'."

4. In Ervin v. United States, 251 U. S. 41, 64 L. ed. 128, 40 Sup. Ct. 75 (1919) it was held that an injunction might issue against the expenditure by New Mexico of money drawn from the sale of public lands granted by Congress to the State upon its admission into the Union, when such expenditure was for a purpose other than that specified in the enabling act. This action by the State was held to constitute a breach of trust and the principle of the equality of states was not involved.

5. United States v. Texas, 339 U. S. 707, 94 L. ed. 1221, 70 Sup. Ct. 918 (1950) is a recent decision applying the principle of the equality of states. Here the "equal footing" clause of the resolution annexing Texas was held to dispose of the controversy between Texas and the United States as to dominion over oil and other mineral resources under the bed of the ocean below low-water mark off the shores of Texas. The court upheld the claims of the United States, notwithstanding statutes enacted by Texas extending its boundary to a line in the Gulf of Mexico 24 marine miles beyond the three-mile limit and thereafter to the outer edge of the continental shelf. Speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Douglas said: "Unless any claim or title which the Republic of Texas had to the marginal sea is subordinated to this full paramount power of the United States on admission, there is or may be in practical effect a subtraction in favor of Texas from the national sovereignty of the United States * * *. The 'equal footing' clause prevents extension of the sovereignty of a state into a domain of political and sovereign power of the United States from which the other states have been excluded, just as it prevents a contraction of sovereignty. * * * which would produce inequality among the states. For equality of states means that they are not 'less or greater, or different in dignity or power.'" Justices Jackson and Clark did not participate and Justices Reed and Minton dissented. Justice Frankfurter did not expressly dissent but indicated disapproval.

EL PASO & NORTHEASTERN R. CO. v. GUTIERREZ.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1909.

215 U. S. 87, 54 L. ed. 106, 30 Sup. Ct. 21.

[Action for damages for death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the wrongful act of the defendant railway company while the intestate was engaged in its service in the Territory of New Mexico. The issue below was whether the plaintiff's rights were governed by a statute of the Territory or by an Act of Congress, the so-called Employers' Liability Act of June 11, 1906, c. 3073, 34 Stat. 232. The defendant's chief contention was that the Employers' Liability Act was unconstitutional. It relied upon the Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463 (1908) where the Supreme Court had so held. The case was tried under the latter statute with verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. After intermediate appeals a writ of error was prosecuted to the Supreme Court.]

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

In view of the plenary power of Congress under the Constitution over the Territories of the United States, subject only to certain limitations and prohibitions not necessary to notice now, there can be no doubt that an act of Congress undertaking to regulate commerce in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States would necessarily supersede the territorial law regulating the same subject.

Is the Federal Employers' Liability Act of June 11, 1906, unconstitutional so far as it relates to common carriers engaged in trade or commerce in the Territories of the United States? It has been suggested that this question is foreclosed by a decision of this court in the Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463. In that case this court held that, conceding the power of Congress to regulate the relations of employer and employe engaged in interstate commerce, the act of June 11, 1906, c. 3073, 34 Stat. 232, was unconstitutional in this, that in its provisions regulating interstate commerce Congress exceeded its constitutional authority in undertaking to make employers responsible, not only to employes when engaged in interstate commerce, but to any of its employes, whether engaged in interstate commerce or in commerce wholly within a State. That the unconstitutionality of the act, so far as it relates to the District of Columbia and the Territories, was not determined is evident from a consideration of the opinion of the court in the case. In answering the suggestion that the words "any employe" in the statute should be so read as to mean only employes engaged in interstate commerce, Mr. Justice White, delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

"But this would require us to write into the statute words of limitation and restriction not found in it. But if we could bring ourselves to modify the statute by writing in the words suggested the result would be to restrict the operation of the act as to the District of Columbia and the Territories. We say this because immediately preceding the provision of the act concerning carriers engaged in commerce between the States and Territories is a clause making it applicable to 'every common carrier engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia or in any Territory of the United States.' It follows, therefore, that common carriers in such Territories, even although not engaged in interstate commerce, are by the act made liable to 'any' of their employes, as therein defined. The legislative power of Congress over the District of Columbia and the Territories being plenary and not depending upon the interstate commerce clause, it results that the provision as to the District of Columbia and the Territories, if standing alone, could not be questioned. Thus it would come to pass, if we could bring ourselves to modify the statute by writing in the words suggested; that is, by causing the act to read 'any employe when engaged in interstate commerce,' we would restrict the act as to the District of Columbia and the Territories, and thus destroy it in an important particular. To write into the act the qualifying words, therefore, would be but adding to its provisions in order to save it in one aspect, and thereby to destroy it in another; that is, to destroy in order to save and to save in order to destroy." 207 U. S. 500.

A perusal of this portion of the opinion makes it evident that it was not intended to hold the act unconstitutional in so far as it related to the District of Columbia and the Territories, for it is there suggested that to interpolate in the act the qualifying words contended for would destroy the act in respect to the District of Columbia and the Territories by limiting its operation in a field where Congress had plenary power, and did not depend for its authority upon the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. The act in question is set forth in full in a note to Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463, 490. We are concerned in the present case with its first section only. * * *

A perusal of this section makes it evident that Congress is here dealing, first, with trade or commerce in the District of Columbia and the Territories; and, second, with interstate commerce, commerce with foreign nations, and between the Territories and the States. As we have already indicated, its power to deal with trade or commerce in the District of Columbia and the Territories does not depend upon the authority of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Upon the other hand, the regulation sought to be enacted as to commerce between the States and with foreign nations depends upon the authority of Congress granted to it by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. As to the latter class, Congress was dealing with a liability ordinarily governed by state statutes, or controlled by the common law as administered in the several states. The federal power of regulation [of commerce] within the states is limited to the right of Congress to control transactions of interstate commerce; it has no authority to regulate commerce wholly of a domestic character. It was because Congress had exceeded its authority in attempting to regulate the second class of commerce named in the statute that this court was constrained to hold the act unconstitutional. The act undertook to fix the liability as to "any employe," whether engaged in interstate commerce or not, and, in the terms of the act, had so interwoven and blended the regulation of liability within the authority of Congress with that which was not that the whole act was held invalid in this respect. * * *

Coming to consider the statute in the light of the accepted rules of construction, we are of opinion that the provisions with reference to interstate commerce, which were declared unconstitutional for the reasons stated, are entirely separable from and in nowise dependent upon the provisions of the act regulating commerce within the District of Columbia and the Territories. * * *

[The judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.]

NOTES

1. The Constitution (Art. IV, § 3, cl. 2) vests in Congress the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." The power of Congress "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District of Columbia is also provided for in the Constitution (Art. I, § 8, cl. 17).

2. To meet the defect in the Employers' Liability Act of 1906 pointed out in the first Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. 141 (1908), Congress enacted a second Employers' Liability Act in 1908. In respect to employers engaged in interstate commerce the second statute was restricted to apply to the legal relations between such employers and such of their employees as were at the time of injury themselves engaged in interstate commerce. This statute was held valid in the Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. ed. 327, 32 Sup. Ct. 169 (1912).

3. In Metropolitan Railroad Co. v. District of Columbia, 132 U. S. 1, 33 L. ed. 231, 10 Sup. Ct. 19 (1889) it was held that the District of Columbia is a municipal corporation and as such is not exempt from the operation of statutes of limitation, which run in favor of and against such corporations.

4. The power of Congress to open federal courts in the several states to an action by a citizen of the District of Columbia against a citizen of one of the states was upheld in National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co., 337 U. S. 582, 93 L. ed. 1556, 69 Sup. Ct. 1173 (1949). The plaintiff, a corporation created by District of Columbia law, commenced in the United States District Court for Maryland an action against a corporation chartered by Virginia, and amenable to suit in Maryland by virtue of a license to do business there. Jurisdiction was predicated solely upon an allegation of diverse citizenship, the plaintiff relying upon a statute enacted by Congress in 1940 which extended the diversity jurisdiction of the district courts to citizens of the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit held the statute invalid because Congress had no power to enact it either under the clause of the Constitution (Art. I, § 8, cl. 17) which authorizes Congress to exercise exclusive legislation in the District of Columbia or under the provision (Art. III, § 2) which defines the judicial power of the United States as extending to controversies "between citizens of different states," which latter clause does not embrace citizens of the District of Columbia. Different majorities of the Supreme Court agreed with the lower court as regards both of these propositions—six of the members (all except Justices Jackson, Black and Burton) with the first, and seven (all except Justices Rutledge and Murphy) with the second. Nevertheless, a majority of the court sustained the statute. Justices Jackson, Black and Burton took the view that Congress may exert its power over the District of Columbia under Article I by imposing the judicial function of adjudicating justiciable controversies on the regular federal courts. Justices Rutledge and Murphy thought that the District was a state under Article III, and consequently that Congress had the power to enact the statute under this article. Justices Frankfurter and Reed joined in one dissenting opinion and Chief Justice Vinson and Justice Douglas joined in another dissenting opinion.

5. The power of the United States to acquire and govern territory and the extent to which the provisions of the Constitution apply to such territory have been dealt with in a series of decisions sometimes called "the insular cases." In De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U. S. 1, 45 L. ed. 1041, 21 Sup. Ct. 743 (1901) the court held that while Porto Rico did not become a part of the United States by virtue of its annexation it did cease to be foreign territory, and therefore tariff duties could not be collected upon goods imported therefrom. Congress thereupon altered the tariff laws so as to retain certain duties upon goods brought in from Porto Rico and the Philippines. In Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U. S. 244, 45 L. ed. 1088, 21 Sup. Ct. 770 (1901) the court assumed that the levy of these duties violated the limitation imposed by the Constitution on the power of Congress to tax, namely, that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," if this limitation was applicable, but held that it was not applicable to Congress in legislating with respect to Porto Rico. An anomalous concept called "unincorporated territory" was evolved. While Porto Rico was no longer foreign territory and was fully subject to legislative control by Congress, it was nevertheless not entitled to equality of treatment under the tariff laws until Congress chose to extend such treatment. In other words, territories may be annexed but not "incorporated." Before annexed territory, such as Porto Rico, is deemed a part of the United States within which the entire Constitution operates of its own force, it must first become "incorporated" into the United States by the express or implied consent of Congress. No such intent had been evidenced here.

The court has further taken the view that only those guaranties of civil liberty embraced in the Bill of Rights which are deemed to be fundamental or basic in character operate of their own force within an unincorporated territory. These restrictions must be observed by Congress in the governance of any territory, incorporated or unincorporated. Other guaranties, however, deemed to be more formal or procedural in nature, Congress need not make applicable to an unincorporated territory unless it sees fit to do so. The only guaranties which the court has held to fall within this latter category are the requirements of indictment by grand jury and trial by jury in criminal cases as provided for in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. See Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U. S. 197, 47 L. ed. 1016, 23 Sup. Ct. 787 (1903); Dorr v. United States, 195 U. S. 138, 49 L. ed. 128, 24 Sup. Ct. 808 (1904); Rasmussen v. United States, 197 U. S. 516, 49 L. ed. 862, 25 Sup. Ct. 514 (1905); Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U. S. 298, 66 L. ed. 627, 42 Sup. Ct. 343 (1922).

TARBLE'S CASE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1871.

13 Wall. 397, 20 L. ed. 597.

Error to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin.

This was a proceeding on habeas corpus for the discharge of one Edward Tarble, held in the custody of a recruiting officer of the United States as an enlisted soldier, on the alleged ground that he was a minor, under the age of eighteen years at the time of his enlistment, and that he enlisted without the consent of his father.

The writ was issued on the 10th of August, 1869, by a court commissioner of Dane County, Wisconsin, an officer authorized by the laws of that state to issue the writ of habeas corpus upon the petition of parties imprisoned or restrained of their liberty, or of persons on their behalf. * * *

The commissioner, after argument, held that the prisoner was illegally imprisoned and detained by Lieutenant Stone, and commanded that officer forthwith to discharge him from custody.

Afterwards, in September of the same year, that officer applied to the supreme court of the state for a certiorari, setting forth in his application the proceedings before the commissioner and his ruling thereon. * * *

Upon these proceedings the case was duly argued before the supreme court, and in April, 1870, that tribunal pronounced its judgment, affirming the order of the commissioner discharging the prisoner. This judgment was now before this court for examination on writ of error prosecuted by the United States. * * *

MR. JUSTICE FIELD, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

It is in the consideration of this distinct and independent character of the government of the United States, from that of the government of the several states, that the solution of the question presented in this case, and in similar cases, must be found. There are within the territorial limits of each state two governments, restricted in their spheres of action, but independent of each other, and supreme within their respective spheres. Each has its separate departments; each has its distinct laws, and each has its own tribunals for their enforcement.

Neither government can intrude within the jurisdiction, or authorize any interference therein by its judicial officers with the action of the other. The two governments in each state stand in their respective spheres of action in the same independent relation to each other, except in one particular, that they would if their authority embraced distinct territories. That particular consists in the supremacy of the authority of the United States when any conflict arises between the two governments. The Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance of it, are declared by the Constitution itself to be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every state are bound thereby, "anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Whenever, therefore, any conflict arises between the enactments of the two sovereignties, or in the enforcement of their asserted authorities, those of the national government must have supremacy until the validity of the different enactments and authorities can be finally determined by the tribunals of the United States. This temporary supremacy until judicial decision by the national tribunals, and the ultimate determination of the conflict by such decision, are essential to the preservation of order and peace, and the avoidance of forcible collision between the two governments. "The Constitution," as said by Mr. Chief Justice Taney, "was not framed merely to guard the states against danger from abroad, but chiefly to secure union and harmony at home; and to accomplish this end it was deemed necessary, when the Constitution was framed, that many of the rights of sovereignty which the states then possessed should be ceded to the general government; and that in the sphere of action assigned to it, it should be supreme and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a state, or from state authorities." And the judicial power conferred extends to all cases arising under the Constitution, and thus embraces every legislative act of Congress, whether passed in pursuance of it, or in disregard of its provisions. The Constitution is under the view of the tribunals of the United States when any act of Congress is brought before them for consideration.

Now, among the powers assigned to the national government, is the power "to raise and support armies," and the power "to provide for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." The execution of these powers falls within the line of its duties; and its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine, without question from any state authority, how the armies shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistment or forced draft, the age at which the soldier shall be received, and the period for which he shall be taken, the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which he shall be assigned. And it can provide the rules for the government and regulation of the forces after they are raised, define what shall constitute military offenses, and prescribe their punishment. No interference with the execution of this power of the national government in the formation, organization, and government of its armies by any state officials could be permitted without greatly impairing the efficiency, if it did not utterly destroy, this branch of the public service. * * * It is manifest that the powers of the national government could not be exercised with energy and efficiency at all times, if its acts could be interfered with and controlled for any period by officers or tribunals of another sovereignty.

It is true similar embarrassment might sometimes be occasioned, though in a less degree, by the exercise of the authority to issue the writ possessed by judicial officers of the United States, but the ability to provide a speedy remedy for any inconvenience following from this source would always exist with the national legislature.

State judges and state courts, authorized by laws of their states to issue writs of habeas corpus, have undoubtedly a right to issue the writ in any case where a party is alleged to be illegally confined within their limits, unless it appear upon his application that he is confined under the authority, or claim and color of the authority, of the United States, by an officer of that government. If such fact appear upon the application the writ should be refused. If it do not appear, the judge or court issuing the writ has a right to inquire into the cause of imprisonment, and ascertain by what authority the person is held within the limits of the state; and it is the duty of the marshal, or other officer having the custody of the prisoner, to give, by a proper return, information in this respect. His return should be sufficient, in its detail of facts, to show distinctly that the imprisonment is under the authority, or claim and color of the authority, of the United States, and to exclude the suspicion of imposition or oppression on his part. And the process or orders, under which the prisoner is held, should be produced with the return and submitted to inspection, in order that the court or judge issuing the writ may see that the prisoner is held by the officer, in good faith, under the authority, or claim and color of the authority, of the United States, and not under the mere pretence of having such authority.

This right to inquire by process of habeas corpus, and the duty of the officer to make a return, "grows necessarily," says Mr. Chief Justice Taney, "out of the complex character of our government and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its power, and each within its sphere of action, prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the other. But, after the return is made, and the state judge or court judicially apprised that the party is in custody under the authority of the United States, they can proceed no further. They then know that the prisoner is within the dominion and jurisdiction of another government, and that neither the writ of habeas corpus nor any other process issued under state authority can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties. He is then within the dominion and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If he has committed an offense against their laws, their tribunals alone can punish him. If he is wrongfully imprisoned, their judicial tribunals can release him and afford him redress." * * *

Judgment reversed.

NOTE

1. The quotations from Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the court's opinion in the reported case are from his opinion in Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506, 16 L. ed. 169 (1859), one of the famous cases in American constitutional history during the period preceding the Civil War. Booth, an abolitionist editor who had assisted a fugitive slave to escape, was held in custody by Ableman, United States marshal, pending trial for violation of the act of Congress known as the fugitive slave law. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, on a writ of habeas corpus, discharged him from custody. Later he was tried before the federal district court, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment and fine. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin again ordered his release, holding that the fugitive slave law was unconstitutional. The case was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error, where the judgment was reversed. The historical setting of the case is sketched in 2 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1923), 532-540. See also, Swisher, American Constitutional Development (1943), 251-254.

TESTA v. KATT.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 205(e) of the Emergency Price Control Act provides that a buyer of goods above the prescribed ceiling price may sue the seller "in any court of competent jurisdiction" for not more than three times the amount of the overcharge plus costs and a reasonable attorney's fee. Section 205(c) provides that federal district courts shall have jurisdiction of such suits "concurrently with State and Territorial courts." Such a suit under § 205(e) must be brought "in the district or county in which the defendant resides or has a place of business * * *."

The respondent was in the automobile business in Providence, Providence County, Rhode Island. In 1944 he sold an automobile to petitioner Testa, who also resides in Providence, for $1100, $210 above the ceiling price. The petitioner later filed this suit against respondent in the State District Court in Providence. Recovery was sought under § 205(e). The court awarded a judgment of treble damages and costs to petitioner. On appeal to the State Superior Court, where the trial was de novo, the petitioner was again awarded judgment, but only for the amount of the overcharge plus attorney's fees. Pending appeal from this judgment, the Price Administrator was allowed to intervene. On appeal, the State Supreme Court reversed, 71 R. I. 472, 47 A. 2d 312. It interpreted § 205(e) to be "a penal statute in the international sense." It held that an action for violation of § 205(e) could not be maintained in the courts of that State. The State Supreme Court rested its holding on its earlier decision in Robinson v. Norato, 1945, 71 R. I. 256, 43 A. 2d 467, 468, in which it had reasoned that: A state need not enforce the penal laws of a government which is "foreign in the international sense"; § 205(e) is treated by Rhode Island as penal in that sense; the United States is "foreign" to the State in the "private international" as distinguished from the "public international" sense; hence Rhode Island courts, though their jurisdiction is adequate to enforce similar Rhode Island "penal" statutes, need not enforce § 205(e). Whether state courts may decline to enforce federal laws on these grounds is a question of great importance. For this reason, and because the Rhode Island Supreme Court's holding was alleged to conflict with this Court's previous holding in Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 223 U. S. 1, we granted certiorari.

For the purposes of this case, we assume, without deciding, that § 205(e) is a penal statute in the "public international," "private international," or any other sense. So far as the question of whether the Rhode Island courts properly declined to try this action, it makes no difference into which of these categories the Rhode Island court chose to place the statute which Congress has passed. For we cannot accept the basic premise on which the Rhode Island Supreme Court held that it has no more obligation to enforce a valid penal law of the United States than it has to enforce a penal law of another state or a foreign country. Such a broad assumption flies in the face of the fact that the States of the Union constitute a nation. It disregards the purpose and effect of Article VI, § 2 of the Constitution which provides: "This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."

It cannot be assumed, the supremacy clause considered, that the responsibilities of a state to enforce the laws of a sister state are identical with its responsibilities to enforce federal laws. Such an assumption represents an erroneous evaluation of the statutes of Congress and the prior decisions of this Court in their historic setting. Those decisions establish that state courts do not bear the same relation to the United States that they do to foreign countries. The first Congress that convened after the Constitution was adopted conferred jurisdiction upon the state courts to enforce important federal civil laws, and succeeding Congresses conferred on the states jurisdiction over federal crimes and actions for penalties and forfeitures.

Enforcement of federal laws by state courts did not go unchallenged. Violent public controversies existed throughout the first part of the Nineteenth Century until the 1860's concerning the extent of the constitutional supremacy of the Federal Government. During that period there were instances in which this Court and state courts broadly questioned the power and duty of state courts to exercise their jurisdiction to enforce United States civil and penal statutes or the power of the Federal Government to require them to do so. But after the fundamental issues over the extent of federal supremacy had been resolved by war, this Court took occasion in 1876 to review the phase of the controversy concerning the relationship of state courts to the Federal Government. Claffin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130. The opinion of a unanimous court in that case was strongly buttressed by historic references and persuasive reasoning. It repudiated the assumption that federal laws can be considered by the states as though they were laws emanating from a foreign sovereign. Its teaching is that the Constitution and the laws passed pursuant to it are the supreme laws of the land, binding alike upon states, courts, and the people, "anything in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." It asserted that the obligation of states to enforce these federal laws is not lessened by reason of the form in which they are cast or the remedy which they provide. And the Court stated that "If an act of Congress gives a penalty to a party aggrieved, without specifying a remedy for its enforcement, there is no reason why it should not be enforced, if not provided otherwise by some act of Congress, by a proper action in a state court." Id. 93 U. S. at page 137. And see United States v. Bank of New York & Trust Co., 296 U. S. 463, 479.

The Clafin opinion thus answered most of the arguments theretofore advanced against the power and duty of state courts to enforce federal penal laws. And since that decision, the remaining areas of doubt have been steadily narrowed. There have been statements in cases concerned with the obligation of states to give full faith and credit to the proceedings of sister states which suggested a theory contrary to that pronounced in the Clafin opinion. But when in Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., supra, this Court was presented with a case testing the power and duty of states to enforce federal laws, it found the solution in the broad principles announced in the Clafin opinion. * * *

So here, the fact that Rhode Island has an established policy against enforcement by its courts of statutes of other states and the United States which it deems penal, cannot be accepted as a "valid excuse." Cf. Douglas v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 279 U. S. 377, 388. For the policy of the federal Act is the prevailing policy in every state. * * *

The Rhode Island court in its Robinson decision on which it relies cites cases of this Court which have held that states are not required by the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution to enforce judgments of the courts of other states based on claims arising out of penal statutes. But those holdings have no relevance here, for this case raises no full faith and credit question. Nor need we consider in this case prior decisions to the effect that federal courts are not required to enforce state penal laws. Compare Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U. S. 265, with Massachusetts v. Missouri, 308 U. S. 1, 20. For whatever consideration they may be entitled in the field in which they are relevant, those decisions did not bring before us our instant problem of the effect of the supremacy clause on the relation of federal laws to state courts. Our question concerns only the right of a state to deny enforcement to claims growing out of a valid federal law.

It is conceded that this same type of claim arising under Rhode Island law would be enforced by that State's courts. Its courts have enforced claims for double damages growing out of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U. S. C. § 201 et seq. [F. C. A. 29 § 201 et seq.]. Thus the Rhode Island courts have jurisdiction adequate and appropriate under established local law to adjudicate this action. Under these circumstances the State courts are not free to refuse enforcement of petitioners' claim. See McKnett v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co., 292 U. S. 230, and compare Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U. S. 117; Id., 325 U. S. 77. The case is reversed and the cause is remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

NOTES

1. In "assuming" that the statute involved was penal in the "public international," "private international," or any other sense, did not the court go further than was necessary in order to impose an obligation on the Rhode Island tribunal to entertain this suit? Could not the provision of the Emergency Price Control Act have been considered remedial in that it gave to a party aggrieved by its violation a right of recovery to the extent of three times the amount of the overcharge?

2. The view that state courts could refuse to assume jurisdiction to enforce laws of Congress which they considered penal in nature was asserted in earlier state court decisions and supported by dicta in Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 672, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1129, 13 Sup. Ct. 224, 229 (1892). See Note, 21 So. Cal. L. Rev. 392 (1948).

KOHL v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1875.

91 U. S. 367, 23 L. ed. 449.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This was a proceeding instituted by the United States to appropriate a parcel of land in the city of Cincinnati as a site for a post-office and other public uses.

The plaintiffs in error owned a perpetual leasehold estate in a portion of the property sought to be appropriated. They moved to dismiss the proceeding on the ground of want of jurisdiction; which motion was overruled. * * * Judgment was rendered in favor of the United States. * * *

MR. JUSTICE STRONG delivered the opinion of the Court.

It has not been seriously contended during the argument that the United States government is without power to appropriate lands or other property within the states for its own uses, and to enable it to perform its proper functions. Such an authority is essential to its independent existence and perpetuity. These cannot be preserved if the obstinacy of a private person, or if any other authority, can prevent the acquisition of the means or instruments by which alone governmental functions can be performed. The powers vested by the Constitution in the general government demand for their exercise the acquisition of lands in all the states. These are needed for forts, armories, and arsenals, for navy-yards and light-houses, for custom-houses, post-offices, and court-houses, and for other public uses. If the right to acquire property for such uses may be made a barren right by the unwillingness of property-holders to sell, or by the action of a state prohibiting a sale to the federal government, the constitutional grants of power may be rendered nugatory, and the government is dependent for its practical existence upon the will of a state, or even upon that of a private citizen. This cannot be. No one doubts the existence in the state governments of the right of eminent domain,—a right distinct from and paramount to the right of ultimate ownership. It grows out of the necessities of their being, not out of the tenure by which lands are held. * * *

But, if the right of eminent domain exists in the federal government, it is a right which may be exercised within the states, so far as is necessary to the enjoyment of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution. In Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506, 523, Chief Justice Taney described in plain language the complex nature of our government, and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its powers, and each, within its sphere of action prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the other. Neither is under the necessity of applying to the other for permission to exercise its lawful powers. Within its own sphere, it may employ all the agencies for exerting them which are appropriate or necessary, and which are not forbidden by the law of its being. When the power to establish post-offices and to create courts within the states was conferred upon the federal government, included in it was authority to obtain sites for such offices and for court-houses, and to obtain them by such means as were known and appropriate. The right of eminent domain was one of those means well known when the Constitution was adopted, and employed to obtain lands for public uses. Its existence, therefore, in the grantee of that power, ought not to be questioned. The Constitution itself contains an implied recognition of it beyond what may justly be implied from the express grants. The fifth amendment contains a provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. What is that but an implied assertion, that, on making just compensation, it may be taken? * * *

It is true, this power of the federal government has not heretofore been exercised adversely; but the non-user of a power does not disprove its existence. In some instances, the states, by virtue of their own right of eminent domain, have condemned lands for the use of the general government, and such condemnations have been sustained by their courts, without, however, denying the right of the United States to act independently of the states. * * * The proper view of the right of eminent domain seems to be, that it is a right belonging to a sovereignty to take private property for its own public uses, and not for those of another. Beyond that, there exists no necessity; which alone is the foundation of the right. If the United States have the power, it must be complete in itself. It can neither be enlarged nor diminished by a state. Nor can any state prescribe the manner in which it must be exercised. The consent of a state can never be a condition precedent to its enjoyment. Such consent is needed only, if at all, for the transfer of jurisdiction and of the right of exclusive legislation after the land shall have been acquired. * * *

But it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs in error that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction of the proceeding. There is nothing in the acts of 1872, it is true, that directs the process by which the contemplated condemnation should be effected, or which expressly authorizes a proceeding in the Circuit Court to secure it. Doubtless Congress might have provided a mode of taking the land, and determining the compensation to be made, which would have been exclusive of all other modes. They might have prescribed in what tribunal or by what agents the taking and the ascertainment of the just compensation should be accomplished. The mode might have been by a commission, or it might have been referred expressly to the Circuit Court; but this, we think, was not necessary. The investment of the Secretary of the Treasury with power to obtain the land by condemnation, without prescribing the mode of exercising the power, gave him also the power to obtain it by any means that were competent to adjudge a condemnation. The Judiciary Act of 1789 conferred upon the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of all suits at common law or in equity, when the United States, or any officer thereof, suing under the authority of any act of Congress, are plaintiffs. If, then, a proceeding to take land for public uses by condemnation may be a suit at common law, jurisdiction of it is vested in the Circuit Court. That it is a "suit" admits of no question. * * *

The judgment of the Circuit Court is

Affirmed.

[Mr. JUSTICE FIELD dissented.]

NOTE

1. Mr. Justice Field's dissent in the instant case expressed the view that federal courts have no inherent power to entertain a suit of this character. He said: "It appears to me that provision for the exercise of the right must first be made by legislation. The federal courts have no inherent jurisdiction of a proceeding instituted for the condemnation of property; and I do not find any statute of Congress conferring upon them such authority." Before the Civil War it was generally denied that the government of the United States could exercise the power of eminent domain within a state without the consent of the state. See Corwin, National Supremacy—Treaty Power v. State Power (1913), 262-263.

UNITED STATES v. ARJONA.

Supreme Court of United States, 1887.

120 U. S. 479, 30 L. ed. 728, 7 Sup. Ct. 628.

Indictment under the Act of May 16, 1884, 23 Stat. 22, to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, and other securities of foreign governments. The court below certified a division in opinion on several points.

Congress has power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States, Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 18; and the government of the United States has been vested exclusively with the power of representing the nation in all its intercourse with foreign countries. It alone can "regulate commerce with foreign nations," Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 3; make treaties and appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls. Art. II, Sec. 2, Cl. 2. A state is expressly prohibited from entering into any "treaty, alliance, or confederation." Art. I, Sec. 10, Cl. 1. Thus all official intercourse between a state and foreign nations is prevented, and exclusive authority for that purpose given to the United States. The national government is in this way made responsible to foreign nations for all violations by the United States of their international obligations, and because of this, Congress is expressly authorized "to define and punish * * * offenses against the law of nations." Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 10.

The law of nations requires every national government to use "due diligence" to prevent a wrong being done within its own dominion to another nation with which it is at peace, or to the people thereof; and because of this the obligation of one nation to punish those who within its own jurisdiction counterfeit the money of another nation has long been recognized. Vattel, in his Law of Nations, which was first printed at Neuchatel in 1758, and was translated into English and published in England in 1760, uses this language: "From the principles thus laid down, it is easy to conclude, that if one nation counterfeits the money of another, or if she allows and protects false coiners who presume to do it, she does that nation an injury." When this was written money was the chief thing of this kind that needed protection, but still it was added: "There is another custom more modern, and of no less use to commerce than the establishment of coin, namely, exchange, or the traffic of bankers, by means of which a merchant remits immense sums from one end of the world to the other, at very trifling expense, and, if he pleases, without risk. For the same reason that sovereigns are obliged to protect commerce, they are obliged to support this custom, by good laws, in which every merchant, whether citizen or foreigner, may find security. In general, it is equally the interest and duty of every nation to have wise and equitable commercial laws established in the country." Vattel, Law of Nations, Phil. ed. 1876, Book I, chap. 10, pages 46, 47. * * *

In the time of Vattel certificates of the public debt of a nation, government bonds, and other government securities, were rarely seen in any other country than that in which they were put out. Banks of issue were not so common as to need special protection for themselves or the public against forgers and counterfeiters elsewhere than at home, and the great corporations, now so numerous and so important, established by public authority for the promotion of public enterprises, were almost unknown, and certainly they had not got to be extensive borrowers of money whenever it could be had at home or abroad on the faith of their quasi public securities. Now, however, the amount of national and corporate debt and of corporate property represented by bonds, certificates, notes, bills, and other forms of commercial securities, which are bought and sold in all the money markets of the world, both in and out of the country under whose authority they were created, is something enormous. * * *

No nation can be more interested in this question than the United States. Their money is practically composed of treasury notes or certificates issued by themselves, or of bank bills issued by banks created under their authority and subject to their control. Their own securities, and those of the states, the cities, and the public corporations, whose interests abroad they alone have the power to guard against foreign national neglect, are found on sale in the principal money markets of Europe. If these securities, whether national, municipal, or corporate, are forged and counterfeited with impunity at the places where they are sold, it is easy to see that a great wrong will be done to the United States and their people. Any uncertainty about the genuineness of the security necessarily depreciates its value as a merchantable commodity, and against this international comity requires that national protection shall, as far as possible, be afforded. If there is neglect in that, the United States may, with propriety, call on the proper government to provide for the punishment of such an offense, and thus secure the restraining influences of a fear of the consequences of wrong doing. * * *

But if the United States can require this of another, that other may require it of them, because international obligations are of necessity reciprocal in their nature. The right, if it exists at all, is given by the law of nations, and what is law for one is, under the same circumstances, law for the other. A right secured by the law of nations to a nation, or its people, is one the United States as the representatives of this nation are bound to protect. Consequently, a law which is necessary and proper to afford this protection is one that Congress may enact, because it is one that is needed to carry into execution a power conferred by the Constitution on the government of the United States exclusively. There is no authority in the United States to require the passage and enforcement of such a law by the states. Therefore the United States must have the power to pass it and enforce it themselves, or be unable to perform a duty which they may owe to another nation, and which the law of nations has imposed on them as part of their international obligations. This, however, does not prevent a state from providing for the punishment of the same thing; for here, as in the case of counterfeiting the coin of the United States, the act may be an offense against the authority of a state as well as that of the United States. * * * [It was further held that it was unnecessary for Congress to declare an act to be an offense against the law of nations, if it was in fact of this character.]

KANSAS v. COLORADO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1907.
206 U. S. 46, 51 L. ed. 956, 27 Sup. Ct. 655.

[The State of Kansas brought this original suit in the Supreme Court to restrain the State of Colorado and certain corporations organized under the latter's laws from diverting the water of the Arkansas River for irrigation of lands in Colorado thereby, as alleged, preventing the natural and customary flow of the river into and through Kansas. The United States filed an intervention petition claiming a right to control the water of the river to aid in the reclamation of arid lands.]

MR. JUSTICE BREWER delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The primary question is, of course, of national control. For, if the nation has a right to regulate the flow of the waters, we must inquire what it has done in the way of regulation. If it has done nothing the further question will then arise, what are the respective rights of the two states in the absence of national regulation? Congress has, by virtue of the grant to it of power to regulate commerce "among the several States," extensive control over the highways, natural or artificial, upon which such commerce may be carried. It may prevent or remove obstructions in the natural waterways and preserve the navigability of those ways. * * *

It follows from this that if in the present case the National Government was asserting, as against either Kansas or Colorado, that the appropriation for the purposes of irrigation of the waters of the Arkansas was affecting the navigability of the stream, it would become our duty to determine the truth of the charge. But the government makes no such contention. On the contrary, it distinctly asserts that the Arkansas River is not now and never was practically navigable beyond Fort Gibson in the Indian Territory, and nowhere claims that any appropriation of the waters by Kansas or Colorado affects its navigability.

It rests its petition of intervention upon its alleged duty of legislating for the reclamation of arid lands; alleges that in or near the Arkansas River, as it runs through Kansas and Colorado, are large tracts of those lands; that the national government is itself the owner of many thousands of acres; that it has the right to make such legislative provision as in its judgment is needful for the reclamation of all these arid lands and for that purpose to appropriate the accessible waters. * * *

In other words, the determination of the rights of the two states inter sese in regard to the flow of waters in the Arkansas River is subordinate to a superior right on the part of the national government to control the whole system of the reclamation of arid lands. That involves the question whether the reclamation of arid lands is one of the powers granted to the general government. As heretofore stated, the constant declaration of this Court from the beginning is that this government is one of enumerated powers. "The government, then, of the United States, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted, must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication." Story, J., in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304, 326. "The Government of the United States is one of delegated, limited, and enumerated powers." United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629, 635.

Turning to the enumeration of the powers granted to Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is enough to say that no one of them by any implication refers to the reclamation of arid lands. * * *

We must look beyond section 8 for Congressional authority over arid lands, and it is said to be found in the second paragraph of section 3 of Article IV, reading: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

The full scope of this paragraph has never been definitely settled. Primarily, at least, it is a grant of power to the United States of control over its property. That is implied by the words "territory or other property." It is true it has been referred to in some decisions as granting political and legislative control over the Territories as distinguished from the states of the union. It is unnecessary in the present case to consider whether the language justifies this construction. Certainly we have no disposition to limit or qualify the expressions which have heretofore fallen from this court in respect thereto. But clearly it does not grant to Congress any legislative control over the states, and must, so far as they are concerned, be limited to authority over the property belonging to the United States within their limits. Appreciating the force of this, counsel for the government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power," adding "I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge great decisions of the court, and I speak with deference." His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested in either the state or the national government; no legislative powers belong to a state government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that state; consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States. But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a government of enumerated powers. That this is such a government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the Amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things.

This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the Tenth Amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the states, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, "we the people of the United States," not the people of one state, but the people of all the states, and Article X reserves to the people of all the states the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the states not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the national government by the Constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted, they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated. This Article X is not to be shorn of its meaning by any narrow or technical construction, but is to be considered fairly and liberally so as to give effect to its scope and meaning. * * *

[Upon extended consideration of the evidence the Court concluded that Kansas had not established sufficient present injury from the acts of Colorado to entitle her to equitable relief.]

The decree which, therefore, will be entered will be one dismissing the petition of the intervenor, without prejudice to the rights of the United States to take such action as it shall deem necessary to preserve or improve the navigability of the Arkansas River. The decree will also dismiss the bill of the State of Kansas as against all the defendants, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to institute new proceedings whenever it shall appear that through a material increase in the depletion of the waters of the Arkansas by Colorado, its corporations or citizens, the substantial interests of Kansas are being injured to the extent of destroying the equitable apportionment of benefits between the two states resulting from the flow of the river. Each party will pay its own costs. * * *

MR. JUSTICE WHITE and MR. JUSTICE McKENNA concur in the result. MR. JUSTICE MOODY took no part in the decision of this case.

NOTES

1. The doctrine of "inherent federal power," repudiated in Kansas v. Colorado, has been ascribed to James Wilson, a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and later a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. See 1 Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (2d ed., 1929), 80-83. It achieved prominence during the presidency of Theodore Roosevelt, who warmly espoused it as supplying a philosophical basis for his "New Nationalism." The doctrine has received judicial approval as regards the powers of the national government to wage war and conduct its foreign relations, which have been said to exist, independently of the Constitution, as an inherent attribute of national sovereignty. Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 37 L. ed. 905, 13 Sup. Ct. 1016 (1893); United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, 299 U. S. 304, 81 L. ed. 255, 57 Sup. Ct. 216 (1936).

2. Besides its significance as a decision marking the limits of national power, the principal case illustrates how controversies between states of a justiciable nature may be settled peacefully in the judicial forum. As a substitute for force in the settlement of such controversies, the Constitution (Art. III, § 2, cl. 1) extends the judicial power of the United States to "controversies between two or more states." Cases of such a character are included within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Viewed from this aspect, the case might well be included in Section 4 of this chapter.

3. In a recently published historical study the challenging and unorthodox thesis is presented that the framers of the Constitution intended to, and did, give Congress "a general national legislative power," unrestrained by any division of authority between federal and state governments, and that within this national government of plenary powers the intention was to make Congress supreme. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (2 vols. 1953). This work is subjected to critical examination and analysis in the symposium reviews in 54 Col. L. Rev. 439 (1954); 41 Cal. L. Rev. 209 (1953), and 49 Northwestern U. L. Rev. 107 (1954).

Section 2.—Some Problems of Sole and Dual Government.

JOHNSON v. MARYLAND.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920.
254 U. S. 51, 65 L. ed. 126, 41 Sup. Ct. 16.

This was a prosecution based on § 143 of Art. 56 of the Code of Public General Laws of Maryland, as amended by c. 85, Acts of 1918. The opinion states the case.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiff in error was an employee of the Post Office Department of the United States and while driving a government motor truck in the transportation of mail over a post road from Mt. Airy, Maryland, to Washington, was arrested in Maryland, and was tried, convicted and fined for so driving without having obtained a license from the state. He saved his constitutional rights by motion to quash, by special pleas which were overruled upon demurrer and by motion in arrest of judgment. The facts were admitted and the naked question is whether the state has power to require such an employee to obtain a license by submitting to an examination concerning his competence and paying three dollars, before performing his official duty in obedience to superior command.

The cases upon the regulation of interstate commerce cannot be relied upon as furnishing an answer. They deal with the conduct of private persons in matters in which the states as well as the general government have an interest and which would be wholly under the control of the states but for the supervening destination and the ultimate purpose of the acts. Here the question is whether the state can interrupt the acts of the general government itself. With regard to taxation, no matter how reasonable, or how universal and indiscriminating, the state's inability to interfere has been regarded as established since McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316. The decision in that case was not put upon any consideration of degree but upon the entire absence of power on the part of the states to touch, in that way at least, the instrumentalities of the United States; 4 Wheat. 429, 430; and that is the law today. Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank v. Minnesota, 232 U. S. 516, 525, 526. A little later the scope of the proposition as then understood was indicated in Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 867. "Can a contractor for supplying a military post with provisions, be restrained from making purchases within any state, or from transporting the provisions to the place at which the troops were stationed? or could he be fined or taxed for doing so? We have not yet heard these questions answered in the affirmative." In more recent days the principle was applied when the governor of a soldiers' home was convicted for disregard of a state law concerning the use of oleomargarine, while furnishing it to the inmates of the home as part of their rations. It was said that the federal officer was not "subject to the jurisdiction of the State in regard to those very matters of administration which are thus approved by federal authority." Ohio v. Thomas, 173 U. S. 276, 283. It seems to us that the foregoing decisions establish the law governing this case.

Of course an employee of the United States does not secure a general immunity from state law while acting in the course of his employment. That was decided long ago by Mr. Justice Washington in United States v. Hart, Pet. C. C. 390. 5 Ops. Atty. Gen. 554. It very well may be that, when the United States has not spoken, the subjection to local law would extend to general rules that might effect incidentally the mode of carrying out the employment—as, for instance, a statute or ordinance regulating the mode of turning at the corners of streets. Commonwealth v. Closson, 229 Massachusetts, 329. This might stand on much the same footing as liability under the common law of a state to a person injured by the driver's negligence. But even the most unquestionable and most universally applicable of state laws, such as those concerning murder, will not be allowed to control the conduct of a marshal of the United States acting under and in pursuance of the laws of the United States. In re Neagle, 135 U. S. 1.

It seems to us that the immunity of the instruments of the United States from state control in the performance of their duties extends to a requirement that they desist from performance until they satisfy a state officer upon examination that they are competent for a necessary part of them and pay a fee for permission to go on. Such a requirement does not merely touch the Government servants remotely by a general rule of conduct; it lays hold of them in their specific attempt to obey orders and requires qualifications in addition to those that the Government has pronounced sufficient. It is the duty of the Department to employ persons competent for their work and that duty it must be presumed has been performed. Keim v. United States, 177 U. S. 290, 293.

Judgment reversed.

MR. JUSTICE PITNEY and MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS dissent.

NOTES

1. "The most important agents of the federal government are its officers, but no one will contend that when a man becomes an officer of the government he ceases to be subject to the laws of the state. The principle we are discussing has its limitation, a limitation growing out of the necessity on which the principle itself is founded. That limitation is, that the agencies of the federal government are only exempted from state legislation, so far as that legislation may interfere with, or impair their efficiency in performing the functions by which they are designed to serve that government. Any other rule would convert a principle founded alone in the necessity of securing to the government of the United States the means of exercising its legitimate powers, into an unauthorized and unjustifiable invasion of the rights of the states. The salary of a federal officer may not be taxed; he may be exempted from any personal service which interferes with the discharge of his official duties, because those exemptions are essential to enable him to perform those duties. But he is subject to all the laws of the state which affect his family or social relations, or his property, and he is liable to punishment for crime, though that punishment be imprisonment or death." Mr. Justice Miller in First National Bank v. Kentucky, 9 Wall. 353, 361-362, 19 L. ed. 701 (1870).

2. A statute of Florida which required inspection and a label on each bag indicating payment of the inspection fee, was held invalid as applied to fertilizers used by the United States in its soil conservation program in Mayo v. United States, 319 U. S. 441, 87 L. ed. 1504, 63 Sup. Ct. 1137, 147 A. L. R. 761 (1943).

ANDERSON NATIONAL BANK v. LUCKETT.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1943.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Under Kentucky Revised Statutes of 1942, c. 393, §§ 393.060 et seq., every bank or trust company in the state is required to turn over to the state, deposits which have remained inactive and unclaimed for specified periods. * * *

The statute thus sets up a comprehensive scheme for the administration of abandoned bank deposits. Upon a report by the bank and notice to the depositors and with an opportunity to be heard, if either wish it, the state takes into its protective custody bank accounts which, having been inactive for at least ten years if demand accounts, or at least twenty-five years if non-demand, the statute declares to be presumptively abandoned. The bank is relieved of its liability to the depositors, who receive instead a claim against the state, enforceable at any time until the deposits are judicially found to be abandoned in fact and for five years thereafter. Refusal by the designated state officer to make payment is reviewable by the state courts. * * *

[The plaintiff national bank sued for an injunction in a Kentucky court. On appeal therefrom the Kentucky Court of Appeals sustained the statute in its entirety and this appeal was taken.]

Appellant contends here: (1) that the statute, in requiring payment of the deposit accounts to the state on the prescribed notice, without recourse to judicial proceedings or any court order or judgment, deprives the depositors and appellant of property without due process of law, and (2) that such withdrawal of accounts from a national bank infringes the national banking laws, particularly R. S. § 5136, 12 U. S. C. § 24, which authorize national banks to accept deposits and to do a banking business, and is an unconstitutional interference with the federally authorized function of national banks as instrumentalities of the Federal Government. * * *

[On the first point the Court held that the procedural provisions of the statute meet all constitutional requirements and that it does not deprive the bank or its depositors of property without due process of law.]

We come now to appellant's second contention, that the Kentucky statute infringes the national banking laws and unconstitutionally interferes with appellant as an instrumentality of the federal government. But the statute does not discriminate against national banks, cf. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, by directing payment to the state by state and national banks alike, of presumptively abandoned accounts. Nor do we find any word in the national banking laws which expressly or by implication conflicts with the provisions of the Kentucky statutes. Cf. Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank, 161 U. S. 275.

This Court has often pointed out that national banks are subject to state laws, unless those laws infringe the national banking laws or impose an undue burden on the performance of the banks' functions.

As we have seen, a bank account is a chose in action of the depositor against the bank, which the latter is obligated to pay in accordance with the terms of the deposit. It is a part of the mass of property within the state whose transfer and devolution is subject to state control.
* * * It has never been suggested that non-discriminatory laws of this type are so burdensome as to be inapplicable to the accounts of depositors in national banks.

The statute here attacked does not purport to do more than does any other regulation of the devolution of bank accounts of missing persons, a function which is, as we have seen, within the competence of the state. Under the statute the state merely acquires the right to demand payment of the accounts in the place of the depositors. Upon payment of the deposits to the state, the bank's obligation is discharged. Something more than this is required to render the statute obnoxious to the federal banking laws. For an inseparable incident of a national bank's privilege of receiving deposits is its obligation to pay them to the persons entitled to demand payment according to the law of the state where it does business. A demand for payment of an account by one entitled to make the demand does not infringe or interfere with any authorized function of the bank. In fact, inability to comply with such demands is made a basis in the national banking laws for closing the doors of the bank and winding up its affairs.

Appellant argues that if the present act is sustained, it will open the door to the exertion of unlimited state discretionary power over the deposits in national banks, and that the act imposes a burden on appellants such as was held to be inadmissible in First National Bank v.

California, 262 U. S. 366, which was followed in National City Bank v. Philippine Islands, 302 U. S. 651. As we have seen, the only power sought to be exerted by the state over the depositors' accounts is the assertion of its lawfully acquired right to collect them, in accordance with the obligation, which was both assumed by appellant and is to be performed in conformity with the banking laws of the United States. In this respect the state's power to make such a demand cannot extend beyond its power under state law and the Federal Constitution to acquire control of deposit accounts from their owners. So long as it is thus limited, and the power is exercised only to demand payment of the accounts in the same way and to the same extent that the depositors could, we can perceive no danger of unlimited control by the state over the operations of national banking institutions. * * *

The decision of this Court in First National Bank v. California, supra, did not rest on any want of power of a state to demand of a national bank, payment of deposits which the state was lawfully entitled to receive. Decision there turned rather on the effect of the state statute in altering the contracts of deposit in a manner considered so unusual and so harsh in its application to depositors as to deter them from placing or keeping their funds in national banks. * * *

The unusual alteration of depositors' accounts to which the Court referred was plainly the statutory declaration of escheat of depositors' accounts merely because of their dormancy for the specified period, without any determination of abandonment in fact. This it treated as in effect "confiscation" of depositors' accounts, operating as an effective deterrent to depositors' placing their funds in national banks doing business within the state.

We have no occasion to reconsider this decision, as appellees urge, for the grounds assigned for it are wholly wanting here. While the seizure and escheat or forfeiture for mere dormancy of a national bank account are unusual, the escheat or appropriation by the state of property in fact abandoned or without an owner is, as we have seen, as old as the common law itself. Here there is no escheat or forfeiture by reason of dormancy. Dormancy without more is made the statutory ground for the state's taking inactive bank accounts into its custody, the state assuming the bank's obligation to the depositors. And the deposits need not be surrendered, if the depositors or the bank make it appear that abandonment has not occurred. This is not confiscation or even an attempted deprivation of property. Escheat or forfeiture to the state may follow, but only on proof of abandonment in fact. We cannot say that the protective custody of long inactive bank accounts, for which the Kentucky statute provides, and which in many circumstances may operate for the benefit and security of depositors, * * * will deter them from placing their funds in national banks in that state. It cannot be said that it would have that effect, more than would the tax laws, the attachment laws, or the laws for the administration of estates of decedents or of missing or unknown persons, which a state may maintain and apply to depositors in national banks. * * *

Since Kentucky may enforce its statute requiring the surrender to it of presumptively abandoned accounts in national as well as state banks, it may, as an appropriate incident to this exercise of authority, require the banks to file reports of inactive accounts, as the statute directs. * * * Affirmed.

McCULLOCH v. MARYLAND.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1819.

4 Wheat. 316, 425, 4 L. ed. 579.

[For other facts and the first part of the opinion see post, p. 355. The Maryland statute forbade any bank or branch in the state, not chartered by the state, to issue notes except upon stamped paper to be bought from the state at rates varying from 1 to 2% of the face value of the notes, provided that such bank or branch could relieve itself of this requirement by paying $15,000 annually.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

It being the opinion of the court, that the Act [of Congress] incorporating the bank [Bank of the United States] is constitutional; and that the power of establishing a branch in the State of Maryland might be properly exercised by the bank itself, we proceed to inquire:—

2. Whether the State of Maryland may, without violating the Constitution, tax that branch?

That the power of taxation is one of vital importance; that it is retained by the states; that it is not abridged by the grant of a similar power to the government of the Union; that it is to be concurrently exercised by the two governments; are truths which have never been denied. But, such is the paramount character of the Constitution, that its capacity to withdraw any subject from the action of even this power, is admitted. The states are expressly forbidden to lay any duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing their inspection laws. If the obligation of this prohibition must be conceded—if it may restrain a state from the exercise of its taxing power on imports and exports; the same paramount character would seem to restrain, as it certainly may restrain, a state from such other exercise of this power, as is in its nature incompatible with, and repugnant to, the constitutional laws of the Union. A law, absolutely repugnant to another, as entirely repeals that other as if express terms of repeal were used.

On this ground the counsel for the bank place its claim to be exempted from the power of a state to tax its operations. There is no express provision for the case, but the claim has been sustained on a principle which so entirely pervades the Constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it, so interwoven with its web, so blended with its texture, as to be incapable of being separated from it, without rending it into shreds.

This great principle is, that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the Constitution and laws of the respective states, and cannot be controlled by them. From this, which may be almost termed an axiom, other propositions are adduced as corollaries, on the truth or error of which, and on their application to this case, the cause has been supposed to depend. These are, 1st. That a power to create implies a power to preserve. 2d. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to, and incompatible with, these powers to create and to preserve. 3d. That where this repugnance exists, that authority which is supreme must control, not yield to that over which it is supreme. * * *

The power of Congress to create, and of course to continue, the bank, was the subject of the preceding part of this opinion; and is no longer to be considered as questionable.

That the power of taxing it by the states may be exercised so as to destroy it, is too obvious to be denied. But taxation is said to be an absolute power, which acknowledges no other limits than those expressly prescribed in the Constitution, and like sovereign powers of every other description, is trusted to the discretion of those who use it. But the very terms of this argument admit that the sovereignty of the state, in the article of taxation itself, is subordinate to, and may be controlled by, the Constitution of the United States. How far it has been controlled by that instrument must be a question of construction. In making this construction, no principle not declared, can be admissible, which would defeat the legitimate operations of a supreme government. It is of the very essence of supremacy to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere, and so to modify every power vested in subordinate governments, as to exempt its own operations from their own influence. This effect need not be stated in terms. It is so involved in the declaration of supremacy, so necessarily implied in it, that the expression of it could not make it more certain. We must, therefore, keep it in view while construing the Constitution.

The argument on the part of the State of Maryland, is, not that the states may directly resist a law of Congress, but that they may exercise their acknowledged powers upon it, and that the Constitution leaves them this right in the confidence that they will not abuse it.

Before we proceed to examine this argument, and to subject it to the test of the Constitution, we must be permitted to bestow a few considerations on the nature and extent of this original right of taxation, which is acknowledged to remain with the states. It is admitted that the power of taxing the people and their property is essential to the very existence of government, and may be legitimately exercised on the objects to which it is applicable, to the utmost extent to which the government may choose to carry it. The only security against the abuse of this power, is found in the structure of the government itself. In imposing a tax the legislature acts upon its constituents. This is in general a sufficient security against erroneous and oppressive taxation.

The people of a state, therefore, give to their government a right of taxing themselves and their property, and as the exigencies of government cannot be limited, they prescribe no limits to the exercise of this right, resting confidently on the interest of the legislator, and on the influence of the constituents over their representative, to guard them against its abuse. But the means employed by the government of the Union have no such security, nor is the right of a state to tax them sustained by the same theory. Those means are not given by the people of a particular state, not given by the constituents of the legislature, which claim the right to tax them, but by the people of all the states. They are given by all, for the benefit of all—and upon theory, should be subjected to that government only which belongs to all. * * *

All subjects over which the sovereign power of a state extends, are objects of taxation; but those over which it does not extend, are, upon the soundest principles, exempt from taxation. This proposition may almost be pronounced self-evident.

The sovereignty of a state extends to everything which exists by its own authority, or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by Congress to carry into execution powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think it demonstrable that it does not. Those powers are not given by the people of a single state. They are given by the people of the United States, to a government whose laws, made in pursuance of the Constitution, are declared to be supreme. Consequently, the people of a single state cannot confer a sovereignty which will extend over them. * * *

That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance, in conferring on one government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, with respect to those very measures, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied. But all inconsistencies are to be reconciled by the magic of the word "confidence." Taxation, it is said, does not necessarily and unavoidably destroy. To carry it to the excess of destruction would be an abuse, to presume which, would banish that confidence which is essential to all government.

But is this a case of confidence? Would the people of any one state trust those of another with a power to control the most insignificant operations of their state government? We know they would not. Why, then, should we suppose that the people of any one state should be willing to trust those of another with a power to control the operations of a government to which they have confided their most important and most valuable interests? In the legislature of the Union alone, are all represented. The legislature of the Union alone, therefore, can be trusted by the people with the power of controlling measures which concern all, in the confidence that it will not be abused. This, then, is not a case of confidence, and we must consider it as it really is.

If we apply the principle for which the State of Maryland contends, to the Constitution generally, we shall find it capable of changing totally the character of that instrument. We shall find it capable of arresting all the measures of the government, and of prostrating it at the foot of the states. The American people have declared their Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, to be supreme; but this principle would transfer the supremacy, in fact, to the states.

If the states may tax one instrument, employed by the government in the execution of its powers, they may tax any and every other instrument. They may tax the mail; they may tax the mint; they may tax patent rights; they may tax the papers of the custom-house; they may tax judicial process; they may tax all the means employed by the government, to an excess which would defeat all the ends of government. This was not intended by the American people. They did not design to make their government dependent on the states.

Gentlemen say, they do not claim the right to extend state taxation to these objects. They limit their pretensions to property. But on what principle is this distinction made? Those who make it have furnished no reason for it, and the principle for which they contend denies it. They contend that the power of taxation has no other limit than is found in the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution; that, with respect to everything else, the power of the states is supreme, and admits of no control. If this be true, the distinction between property and other subjects to which the power of taxation is applicable, is merely arbitrary, and can never be sustained. This is not all. If the controlling power of the states be established; if their supremacy as to taxation be acknowledged; what is to restrain their exercising this control in any shape they may please to give it? Their sovereignty is not confined to taxation. That is not the only mode in which it might be displayed. The question is, in truth, a question of supremacy; and if the right of the states to tax the means employed by the general government be conceded, the declaration that the Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, is empty and unmeaning declamation. * * *

It has also been insisted, that, as the power of taxation in the general and state governments is acknowledged to be concurrent, every argument which would sustain the right of the general government to tax banks chartered by the states, will equally sustain the right of the states to tax banks chartered by the general government.

But the two cases are not on the same reason. The people of all the states have created the general government, and have conferred upon it the general power of taxation. The people of all the states, and the states themselves, are represented in Congress, and, by their representatives, exercise this power. When they tax the chartered institutions of the states, they tax their constituents; and these taxes must be uniform. But when a state taxes the operations of the government of the United States, it acts upon institutions created, not by their own constituents, but by people over whom they claim no control. It acts upon the measures of a government created by others as well as themselves, for the benefit of others in common with themselves. The difference is that which always exists, and always must exist, between the action of the whole on a part, and the action of a part on the whole—between the laws of a government declared to be supreme, and those of a government which, when in opposition to those laws, is not supreme.

But if the full application of this argument could be admitted, it might bring into question the right of Congress to tax the state banks, and could not prove the right of the states to tax the Bank of the United States.

The court has bestowed on this subject its most deliberate consideration. The result is a conviction that the states have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control, the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government. This is, we think, the unavoidable consequence of that supremacy which the Constitution has declared.

We are unanimously of opinion, that the law passed by the legislature of Maryland, imposing a tax on the Bank of the United States, is unconstitutional and void.

This opinion does not deprive the states of any resources which they originally possessed. It does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank, in common with the other real property within the state, nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland may hold in this institution, in common with other property of the same description throughout the state. But this is a tax on the operations of the bank, and is, consequently, a tax on the operation of an instrument employed by the government of the Union to carry its powers into execution. Such a tax must be unconstitutional.

1. For discussions of the case in its historical setting see 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), ch. 12, and 4 Beveridge, The Life of John Marshall (1919), 282 et seq.

2. Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449, 7 L. ed. 481 (1829) involved a city tax on bonds, notes, and stock, including United States stock but exempting South Carolina stock, stocks of the incorporated banks of South Carolina and the United States bank. Chief Justice Marshall's opinion holding the tax invalid (Justices Johnson and Thompson dissenting) was not based upon the slight discriminatory features of the tax but upon the proposition that it cast a burden upon the power of the government to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

3. In First National Bank v. Fellows, 244 U. S. 416, 61 L. ed. 1233, 37 Sup. Ct. 734 (1917), a statute of Congress was sustained giving to the Federal Reserve Board authority "to grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the said board may prescribe."

THE COLLECTOR v. DAY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1870.

11 Wall. 113, 20 L. ed. 122.

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

MR. JUSTICE NELSON delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The case presents the question whether or not it is competent for Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of a state?

In Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie County, 16 Pet. 435, it was decided that it was not competent for the legislature of a state to levy a tax upon the salary or emoluments of an officer of the United States. The decision was placed mainly upon the ground that the officer was a means or instrumentality employed for carrying into effect some of the legitimate powers of the government, which could not be interfered with by taxation or otherwise by the states, and that the salary or compensation for the service of the officer was inseparably connected with the office; that if the officer, as such, was exempt, the salary assigned for his support or maintenance while holding the office was also, for like reasons, equally exempt.

The cases of McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, and Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449, were referred to as settling the principle that governed the case, namely, "that the state governments cannot lay a tax upon the constitutional means employed by the government of the Union to execute its constitutional powers." * * *

It is conceded in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, that the power of taxation by the states was not abridged by the grant of a similar power to the government of the Union; that it was retained by the states, and that the power is to be concurrently exercised by the two governments; and also that there is no express constitutional prohibition upon the states against taxing the means or instrumentalities of the general government. But, it was held, and, we agree properly held, to be prohibited by necessary implication; otherwise, the states might impose taxation to an extent that would impair, if not wholly defeat, the operations of the federal authorities when acting in their appropriate sphere.

These views, we think, abundantly establish the soundness of the decision of the case of Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie, which determined that the states were prohibited, upon a proper construction of the Constitution, from taxing the salary or emoluments of an officer of the government of the United States. And we shall now proceed to show that upon the same construction of that instrument, and for like reasons, that government is prohibited from taxing the salary of the judicial officer of a state. * * *

The general government, and the states, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the states within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the Tenth Amendment, "reserved," are as independent of the general government as that government within its sphere is independent of the states. * * *

Upon looking into the Constitution it will be found that but a few of the articles in that instrument could be carried into practical effect without the existence of the states. * * * Such being the separate and independent condition of the states in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution and the existence of which is so indispensable, that, without them, the general government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow, as a reasonable, if not a necessary consequence, that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by the taxing power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body imposing the tax. And, more especially, those means and instrumentalities which are the creation of their sovereign and reserved rights, one of which is the establishment of the judicial department, and the appointment of officers to administer their laws. Without this power, and the exercise of it, we risk nothing in saying that no one of the States under the form of government guaranteed by the Constitution could long preserve its existence. A despotic government might. * * *

The supremacy of the general government, therefore, so much relied on in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, in respect to the question before us, cannot be maintained. The two governments are upon an equality, and the question is whether the power "to lay and collect taxes" enables the general government to tax the salary of a judicial officer of the state, which officer is a means or instrumentality employed to carry into execution one of its most important functions, the administration of the laws, and which concerns the exercise of a right reserved to the states? * * *

It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the general government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the states, nor is there any prohibiting the states from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government, whose means employed in conducting its operations, is subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. * * *

Judgment Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY, dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case, because, it seems to me that the general government has the same power of taxing the income of officers of the state governments as it has of taxing that of its own officers. It is the common government of all alike; and every citizen is presumed to trust his own government in the matter of taxation. No man ceases to be a citizen of the United States by being an officer under the state government. I cannot accede to the doctrine that the general government is to be regarded as in any sense foreign or antagonistic to the state governments, their officers, or people; nor can I agree that a presumption can be admitted that the general government will act in a manner hostile to the existence or functions of the state governments, which are constituent parts of the system or body politic forming the basis on which the general government is founded. The taxation by the state governments of the instruments employed by the general government in the exercise of its powers, is a very different thing. Such taxation involves an interference with the powers of a government in which other states and their citizens are equally interested with the state which imposes the taxation. In my judgment, the limitation of the power of taxation in the general government, which the present decision establishes, will be found very difficult of control. Where are we to stop in enumerating the functions of the state governments which will be interfered with by federal taxation? If a state incorporates a railroad to carry out its purposes of internal improvement, or a bank to aid its financial arrangements, reserving, perhaps, a percentage on the stock or profits, for the supply of its own treasury, will the bonds or stock of such an institution be free from federal taxation? How can we now tell what the effect of this decision will be? I cannot but regard it as founded on a fallacy, and that it will lead to mischievous consequences. I am as much opposed as any one can be to any interference by the general government with the just powers of the state governments. But no concession of any of the just powers of the general government can easily be recalled. I, therefore, consider it my duty to at least record my dissent when such concession appears to be made. An extended discussion of the subject would answer no useful purpose.

NOTES

1. In holding that the reasoning of Dobbins v. Commissioners of Erie County, 16 Pet. 435, 10 L. ed. 1022 (1842) applied to taxation by the federal government of the salary of a state officer the Supreme Court ignored Chief Justice Marshall's view (restated with telling force in Mr. Justice Bradley's dissent) that the situation involved where the whole taxed all its parts was different from that where a part taxed the operations of the whole. After Collector v. Day, state and federal tax immunities were considered to be substantially reciprocal and the area of immunity tended to grow. The immunity was held to cover not only federal securities (Weston v. Charleston, supra) but state bonds and the interest thereon as well. Mercantile National Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138, 30 L. ed. 895, 7 Sup. Ct. 826 (1887); Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S. 429, 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 759, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. 673, 15 Sup. Ct. 912 (1895). Sales of goods to the government were also held to be covered by the immunity on the theory that the government was one of the parties to the contract of sale and was thus adversely affected by a tax on the transaction. Panhandle Oil Co. v. Mississippi ex rel. Knox, 277 U. S. 218, 72 L. ed. 857, 48 Sup. Ct. 451, 56 A. L. R. 583 (1928); Graves v. Texas Co., 298 U. S. 393, 80 L. ed. 1236, 56 Sup. Ct. 818 (1936).

The immunity rule was limited, however, by cases holding that when a state engages in a business enterprise, as distinguished from a function traditionally governmental, the business is not exempted from federal taxation. Thus, in South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, 50 L. ed. 261, 26 Sup. Ct. 110 (1905), the State was required to pay federal excise taxes on the liquor sold by its dispensaries, and in Ohio v. Helvering, 292 U. S. 360, 78 L. ed. 1307, 54 Sup. Ct. 725 (1934) this view was reaffirmed and applied to the liquor monopolies set up in some states after the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. And in Allen v. Regents of University System, 304 U. S. 439, 82 L. ed. 1448, 58 Sup. Ct. 980 (1938), receipts from the University of Georgia athletic contests were held subject to federal taxation. Another limitation on the immunity rule was the view that independent contractors, not themselves government employees, may claim tax exemption only by showing that to tax them is to impose a direct and substantial burden on the government. Thus, in Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514, 70 L. ed. 384, 46 Sup. Ct. 172 (1926) it was held that a partnership of engineers acting as consultants to states and municipalities in regard to water supply and sewage disposal systems were liable to federal income taxation.

A judicial trend toward further limitation of the doctrine of intergovernmental tax immunity was discernible in a case decided in the early thirties. In Long v. Rockwood, 277 U. S. 142, 72 L. ed. 824, 48 Sup. Ct. 463 (1928) the court had held, by a bare majority, that a state could not tax income derived from patents issued by the United States. In Fox Film Corporation v. Doyal, 286 U. S. 123, 76 L. ed. 1010, 52 Sup. Ct. 546 (1932) this decision was overruled, the court taking the view that exemption of patents and copyrights from taxation by the state benefits only the holder of these rights and not the federal government.

Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U. S. 405, 82 L. ed. 1427, 58 Sup. Ct. 969 (1938) was the first case that evidenced an unmistakable willingness to limit the immunity doctrine in the field of official salaries. Here it was held that the imposition of a non-discriminatory income tax on salaries of employees of the Port of New York Authority did not place an unconstitutional burden on the States of New York and New Jersey, which had created the Port Authority. The court said that to avoid the tax a state must show that the burden on it is actual and substantial, and not conjectural. Here the burden was deemed to be so speculative and uncertain that to allow the immunity would restrict the federal taxing power without affording any corresponding tangible protection to the State government. While the decision did not specifically overrule Collector v. Day, it prepared the way for further reconsideration of the problems involved.

GRAVES v. NEW YORK EX REL. O'KEEFE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939.

MR. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are asked to decide whether the imposition by the state of New York of an income tax on the salary of an employee of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation places an unconstitutional burden upon the federal government.

Respondent, a resident of New York, was employed during 1934 as an examining attorney for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation at an annual salary of $2,400. In his income tax return for that year he included his salary as subject to the New York state income tax imposed by Art. 16 of the Tax Law of New York (Consol. Laws, c. 60). Subdivision 2f of § 359, since repealed, exempted from the tax "Salaries, wages and other compensation received from the United States of officials or employees thereof, including persons in the military or naval forces of the United States * * *." Petitioners, New York State Tax Commissioners, rejected respondent's claim for a refund of the tax based on the ground that his salary was constitutionally exempt from state taxation because the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is an instrumentality of the United States Government and that he, during the taxable year, was an employee of the federal government engaged in the performance of a governmental function.

On review by certiorari the Board's action was set aside by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York, 253 App. Div. 91; 1 N. Y. S. 2d 195, whose order was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. 278 N. Y. 691; 16 N. E. 2d 404. Both courts held respondent's salary was free from tax on the authority of New York ex rel. Rogers v. Graves, 299 U. S. 401, which sustained the claim that New York could not constitutionally tax the salary of an employee of the Panama Rail Road Company, a wholly-owned corporate instrumentality of the United States. We granted certiorari, 305 U. S. 592, the constitutional question presented by the record being of public importance.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation was created pursuant to § 4 (a) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 128, 12 U. S. C. § 1461 et seq., which was enacted to provide emergency relief to home owners, particularly to assist them with respect to home mortgage indebtedness. The corporation, which is authorized to lend money to home owners on mortgages and to refinance home mortgage loans within the purview of the Act, is declared by § 4 (a) to be an instrumentality of the United States. Its shares of stock are wholly government-owned. § 4 (b). Its funds are deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and the compensation of its employees is paid by drafts upon the Treasury.

For the purposes of this case we may assume that the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was a constitutional exercise of the powers of the federal government. Cf. Kay v. United States, 303 U. S. 1. As that government derives its authority wholly from powers delegated to it by the Constitution, its every action within its constitutional power is governmental action, and since Congress is made the sole judge of what powers within the constitutional grant are to be exercised, all activities of government constitutionally authorized by Congress must stand on a parity with respect to their constitutional immunity from taxation. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 432; Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 151, 158-159; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, 451-452; Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U. S. 405, 412-415. And when the national government lawfully acts through a corporation which it owns and controls, those activities are governmental functions entitled to whatever tax immunity attaches to those functions when carried on by the government itself through its departments. See McCulloch v. Maryland, supra, 421-422; Smith v. Kansas City Title Co., 255 U. S. 180, 208; Federal Land Bank v. Crosland, 261 U. S. 374; New York ex rel. Rogers v. Graves, supra.

The single question with which we are now concerned is whether the tax laid by the state upon the salary of respondent, employed by a corporate instrumentality of the federal government, imposes an unconstitutional burden upon that government. The theory of the tax immunity of either government, state or national, and its instrumentalities, from taxation by the other, has been rested upon an implied limitation on the taxing power of each, such as to forestall undue interference, through the exercise of that power, with the governmental activities of the other. That the two types of immunity may not, in all respects, stand on a parity has been recognized from the beginning. McCulloch v. Maryland, supra, 435-436, and possible differences in application, deriving from differences in the source, nature and extent of the immunity of the governments and their agencies, were pointed out and discussed by this Court in detail during the last term. Helvering v. Gerhardt, supra, 412-413, 416.

So far as now relevant, those differences have been thought to be traceable to the fact that the federal government is one of delegated powers in the exercise of which Congress is supreme; so that every agency which Congress can constitutionally create is a governmental agency. And since the power to create the agency includes the implied power to do whatever is needful or appropriate, if not expressly prohibited, to protect the agency, there has been attributed to Congress some scope, the limits of which it is not now necessary to define, for granting or withholding immunity of federal agencies from state taxation. * * * Whether its power to grant tax exemptions as an incident to the exercise of powers specifically granted by the Constitution can ever, in any circumstances, extend beyond the constitutional immunity of federal agencies which courts have implied, is a question which need not now be determined.

Congress has declared in § 4 of the Act that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is an instrumentality of the United States and that its bonds are exempt, as to principal and interest, from federal and state taxation, except surtaxes, estate, inheritance and gift taxes. The corporation itself, "including its franchise, its capital, reserves and surplus, and its loans and income," is likewise exempted from taxation; its real property is subject to tax to the same extent as other real property. But Congress has given no intimation of any purpose either to grant or withhold immunity from state taxation of the salary of the corporation's employees, and the Congressional intention is not to be gathered from the statute by implication. Cf. Baltimore National Bank v. State Tax Comm'n, supra.

It is true that the silence of Congress, when it has authority to speak, may sometimes give rise to an implication as to the Congressional purpose. The nature and extent of that implication depend upon the nature of the Congressional power and the effect of its exercise. But there is little scope for the application of that doctrine to the tax immunity of governmental instrumentalities. The constitutional immunity of either government from taxation by the other, where Congress is silent, has its source in an implied restriction upon the powers of the taxing government. So far as the implication rests upon the purpose to avoid interference with the functions of the taxed government or the imposition upon it of the economic burden of the tax, it is plain that there is no basis for implying a purpose of Congress to exempt the federal government or its agencies from tax burdens which are substantial or which courts are unable to discern. Silence of Congress implies immunity no more than does the silence of the Constitution. It follows that when exemption from state taxation is claimed on the ground that the federal government is burdened by the tax, and Congress has disclosed no intention with respect to the claimed immunity, it is in order to consider the nature and effect of the alleged burden, and if it appears that there is no ground for implying a constitutional immunity, there is equally a want of any ground for assuming any purpose on the part of Congress to create an immunity.

The present tax is a non-discriminatory tax on income applied to salaries at a specified rate. It is not in form or substance a tax upon the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or its property or income, nor is it paid by the corporation or the government from their funds. It is measured by income which becomes the property of the taxpayer when received as compensation for his services; and the tax laid upon the privilege of receiving it is paid from his private funds and not from the funds of the government, either directly or indirectly. The theory, which once won a qualified approval, that a tax on income is legally or economically a tax on its source, is no longer tenable, New York ex rel. Cohn v. Graves, 300 U. S. 308, 313, 314; Hale v. State Board, 302 U. S. 95, 108; Helvering v. Gerhardt, supra; cf. Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514; Fox Film Corp. v. Doyal, 286 U. S. 123; James v. Dravo Contracting Co., supra, 149; Helvering v. Mountain Producers Corp., 303 U. S. 376, and the only possible basis for implying a constitutional immunity from state income tax of the salary of an employee of the national government or of a governmental agency is that the economic burden of the tax is in some way passed on so as to impose a burden on the national government tantamount to an interference by one government with the other in the performance of its functions.

In the four cases in which this Court has held that the salary of an officer or employee of one government or its instrumentality was immune from taxation by the other, it was assumed, without discussion, that the immunity of a government or its instrumentality extends to the salaries of its officers and employees. This assumption made with respect to the salary of a governmental officer in Dobbins v. Commissioners of Erie County, 16 Pet. 435, and in Collector v. Day, 11 Wall. 113, was later extended to confer immunity on income derived by a lessee from lands leased to him by a government in the performance of a governmental function, Gillespie v. Oklahoma, 257 U. S. 501; Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U. S. 393, and cases cited, although the claim of a like exemption from tax on the income of a contractor engaged in carrying out a governmental project was rejected both in the case of a contractor with a state, Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, supra and of a contractor with the national government, James v. Dravo Contracting Co., supra.

The ultimate repudiation in Helvering v. Mountain Producers Corp., supra, of the doctrine that a tax on the income of a lessee derived from a lease of government owned or controlled lands is a forbidden interference with the activities of the government concerned led to the re-examination by this Court, in the Gerhardt case, of the theory underlying the asserted immunity from taxation by one government of salaries of employees of the other. It was there pointed out that the implied immunity of one government and its agencies from taxation by the other should, as a principle of constitutional construction, be narrowly restricted. For the expansion of the immunity of the one government correspondingly curtails the sovereign power of the other to tax, and where that immunity is invoked by the private citizen it tends to operate for his benefit at the expense of the taxing government and without corresponding benefit to the government in whose name the immunity is claimed. See Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, supra, 523-524; James v. Dravo Contracting Co., supra, 156-158. It was further pointed out that, as applied to the taxation of the salaries of the employees of one government, the purpose of the immunity was not to confer benefits on the employees by relieving them from contributing their share of the financial support of the other government, whose benefits they enjoy, or to give an advantage to a government by enabling it to engage employees at salaries lower than those paid for like services by other employers, public or private, but to prevent undue interference with the one government by imposing on it the tax burdens of the other.

In applying these controlling principles in the Gerhardt case the Court held that the salaries of employees of the New York Port Authority, a state instrumentality created by New York and New Jersey, were not immune from federal income tax, even though the Authority be regarded as not subject to federal taxation. It was said that the taxpayers enjoyed the benefit and protection of the laws of the United States and were under a duty, common to all citizens, to contribute financial support to the government; that the tax laid on their salaries and paid by them could be said to affect or burden their employer, the Port Authority, or the states creating it, only so far as the burden of the tax was economically passed on to the employer; that a non-discriminatory tax laid on the income of all members of the community could not be assumed to obstruct the function which New York and New Jersey had undertaken to perform, or to cast an economic burden upon them, more than does the general taxation of property and income which, to some extent, incapable of measurement by economists, may tend to raise the price level of labor and materials. The Court concluded that the claimed immunity would do no more than relieve the taxpayers from the duty of financial support to the national government in order to secure to the state a theoretical advantage, speculative in character and measurement and too unsubstantial to form the basis of an implied constitutional immunity from taxation.

The conclusion reached in the Gerhardt case that in terms of constitutional tax immunity a federal income tax on the salary of an employee is not a prohibited burden on the employer makes it imperative that we should consider anew the immunity here claimed for the salary of an employee of a federal instrumentality. As already indicated, such differences as there may be between the implied tax immunity of a state and the corresponding immunity of the national government and its instrumentalities may be traced to the fact that the national government is one of delegated powers, in the exercise of which it is supreme. Whatever scope this may give to the national government to claim immunity from state taxation of all instrumentalities which it may constitutionally create, and whatever authority Congress may possess as incidental to the exercise of its delegated powers to grant or withhold immunity from state taxation, Congress has not sought in this case to exercise such power. Hence these distinctions between the two types of immunity cannot affect the question with which we are now concerned. The burden on government of a non-discriminatory income tax applied to the salary of the employee of a government or its instrumentality is the same, whether a state or national government is concerned. The determination in the Gerhardt case that the federal income tax imposed on the employees of the Port Authority was not a burden on the Port Authority made it unnecessary to consider whether the Authority itself was immune from federal taxation; the claimed immunity failed because even if the Port Authority were itself immune from federal income tax, the tax upon the income of its employees cast upon it no unconstitutional burden.

Assuming, as we do, that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is clothed with the same immunity from state taxation as the government itself, we cannot say that the present tax on the income of its employees lays any unconstitutional burden upon it. All the reasons for refusing to imply a constitutional prohibition of federal income taxation of salaries of state employees, stated at length in the Gerhardt case, are of equal force when immunity is claimed from state income tax on salaries paid by the national government or its agencies. In this respect we perceive no basis for a difference in result whether the taxed income be salary or some other form of compensation, or whether the taxpayer be an employee or an officer of either a state or the national government, or of its instrumentalities. In no case is there basis for the assumption that any such tangible or certain economic burden is imposed on the government concerned as would justify a court's declaring that the taxpayer is clothed with the implied constitutional tax immunity of the government by which he is employed. That assumption, made in Collector v. Day, supra, and in New York ex rel. Rogers v. Graves, supra, is contrary to the reasoning and to the conclusions reached in the Gerhardt case and in Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, supra; Group No. 1 Oil Corp. v. Bass, 283 U. S. 279; James v. Dravo Contracting Co., supra; Helvering v. Mountain Producers Corp., supra; McLoughlin v. Commissioner, 303 U. S. 218. In their light the assumption can no longer be made. Collector v. Day, supra, and New York ex rel. Rogers v. Graves, supra, are overruled so far as they recognize an implied constitutional immunity from income taxation of the salaries of officers or employees of the national or a state government or their instrumentalities.

So much of the burden of a non-discriminatory general tax upon the incomes of employees of a government, state or national, as may be passed on economically to that government, through the effect of the tax on the price level of labor or materials, is but the normal incident of the organization within the same territory of two governments, each possessing the taxing power. The burden, so far as it can be said to exist or to affect the government in any indirect or incidental way, is one which the Constitution presupposes, and hence it cannot rightly be deemed to be within an implied restriction upon the taxing power of the national and state governments which the Constitution has expressly granted to one and has confirmed to the other. The immunity is not one to be implied from the Constitution, because if allowed it would impose to an inadmissible extent a restriction on the taxing power which the Constitution has reserved to the state governments.

NOTES

1. The Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 extended the provisions of the federal Income Tax Act to include personal services of officers or employees of a state, and of its political subdivisions and instrumentalities. The United States also consented to taxation by the states of the salaries of officers or employees of the United States and of its instrumentalities, provided such taxation does not discriminate against such officers or employees because of the source of their compensation.

2. James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U. S. 134, 82 L. ed. 155, 58 Sup. Ct. 208, 114 A. L. R. 318 (1937) sustained a state tax on the gross earnings from construction contracts with the United States. The contracting company had relied upon Panhandle Oil Co. v. Mississippi, supra, and Graves v. Texas Co., supra, which had invalidated state gasoline taxes on gasoline sold to federal agencies. These cases were said to be limited to their particular facts and were later overruled in Alabama v. King & Boozer, 314 U. S. 1, 86 L. ed. 3, 62 Sup. Ct. 43, 140 A. L. R. 615 (1941), which sustained a state sales tax on the purchase of building materials by a contractor constructing an army camp for the United States under the cost-plus fixed-fee basis, the court viewing the tax as the normal incident of the existence of two governments functioning within the same territory. While the tax did not involve a direct sale to the United States or one of its agencies, it was conceded that its economic burden was passed on to the United States.

3. Overruling five earlier decisions the court held in Oklahoma Tax Commission v. Texas Co., 336 U. S. 342, 93 L. ed. 721, 69 Sup. Ct. 561 (1949) that lessees of mineral rights in allotted and restricted Indian lands were not entitled to immunity from taxes imposed by Oklahoma upon the production of petroleum. The taxes were nondiscriminatory; one was laid upon the gross value of production and was in lieu of all other local ad valorem property taxes; another was an excise tax on every barrel of petroleum produced. The court said that approval of a judicial doctrine of immunity could not be inferred from mere Congressional silence. "We do not imply, by this decision, that Congress does not have power to immunize these lessees from the taxes we think the Constitution permits Oklahoma to impose in the absence of such action. The question whether immunity shall be extended in situations like these is essentially legislative in character."

PITTMAN v. HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation brought this proceeding in the Baltimore City Court for a writ of mandamus requiring the Clerk of the Superior Court of Baltimore to record a mortgage executed to the Corporation upon the payment of the ordinary recording charge and without affixing stamps for the state recording tax. Demurrer to the petition was overruled, the Clerk did not avail himself of the opportunity to answer, and mandamus was granted. The order was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. 175 Md. 512; 2 A. 2d 689. We granted certiorari. 306 U. S. 628.

The Maryland statute imposes a tax upon every mortgage, recorded or offered for record, at the rate of ten cents for each $100, or fraction thereof, of the principal amount of the debt secured by the mortgage. As the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is expressly declared to be an instrumentality of the United States (Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, c. 64, 48 Stat. 128) and the mortgage was acquired in that capacity, the Court of Appeals held the tax as thus applied to be invalid.

The court relied upon our decision in Federal Land Bank v. Crosland, 261 U. S. 374. The question there related to a tax imposed by Alabama as a condition for the recording of a mortgage executed to a Federal Land Bank. The Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916 provides that first mortgages executed to Federal Land Banks shall be deemed "instrumentalities of the Government of the United States, and as such they and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from federal, state, municipal, and local taxation." 39 Stat. 360, 380. We held that the state tax, as distinguished from a reasonable fee to meet the expenses of the registry, constituted a general tax on mortgages, using the condition attached to registration as a practical mode of collecting it, and that the tax on the mortgage in question was beyond the power of the state.

Petitioner suggests that the Crosland case may be distinguished; that the Alabama tax was imposed on the lender, whereas the Maryland tax is on the privilege of recording the instrument and the statute is silent as to the one who shall pay the tax; also that the Federal Farm Loan Act expressly declared the mortgages of Federal Land Banks to be instrumentalities of the Federal Government. The Court of Appeals thought these differences to be immaterial. As to the first, the court rightly observed that in the Crosland case the provision for the payment of tax by the lender was regarded as having no determining significance. We said that "whoever pays it it is a tax upon the mortgage and that is what is forbidden by the law of the United States." 261 U. S., pp. 378, 379. Here, also, the tax is imposed upon the mortgage and is graded according to the amount of the loan, and the condition attached to the registration is a practical method of collection. The recording sought was for the protection of the interest of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. In fact, the mortgage in the instant case was offered for record by the Corporation and the tax was demanded from the Corporation.

The second suggested distinction rests upon the terms of the Home Owners' Loan Act. That provides that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, its franchise, capital, reserves and surplus, and its loans and income shall be exempt from all state or municipal taxes. The critical term, in the present relation, is "loans." We think that this term, in order to carry out the manifest purpose of the broad exemption, should be construed as covering the entire process of lending, the debts which result therefrom and the mortgages given to the Corporation as security. The Home Owners' Loan Act requires that the loans made by the Corporation "shall be secured by a duly recorded home mortgage." Both the mortgage and its recordation were indispensable elements in the lending operations authorized by Congress. We agree with the state court that there is no sound distinction which makes inapplicable the reasoning which was decisive in the Crosland case.

Alive to this consideration, petitioner advances a broader contention, asking us to review and overrule the Crosland decision as being out of harmony with correct principle. Petitioner insists that the tax is not discriminatory; that it does not impose a burden upon the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; and that if the Act of Congress be construed as conferring an immunity, it went beyond the power of Congress, as Congress cannot "grant an immunity of greater extent than the constitutional immunity."

We assume here, as we assumed in Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U. S. 466, that the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was a constitutional exercise of the congressional power and that the activities of the Corporation through which the national government lawfully acts must be regarded as governmental functions and as entitled to whatever immunity attaches to those functions when performed by the government itself through its departments. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421, 422; Smith v. Kansas City Title Co., 255 U. S. 180, 208, 209; Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, supra. Congress has not only the power to create a corporation to facilitate the performance of governmental functions, but has the power to protect the operations thus validly authorized. "A power to create implies a power to preserve." McCulloch v. Maryland, supra, p. 426. This power to preserve necessarily comes within the range of the express power conferred upon Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. Const. Art. I, § 8, par. 18. In the exercise of this power to protect the lawful activities of its agencies, Congress has the dominant authority which necessarily inheres in its action within the national field. The Shreveport Case, 234 U. S. 342, 351, 352. The exercise of this protective power in relation to state taxation has many illustrations. See e. g., Bank v. Supervisors, 7 Wall. 26, 31; Choate v. Trapp, 224 U. S. 665, 668, 669; Smith v. Kansas City Title Co., supra, p. 207; Trotter v. Tennessee, 290 U. S. 354, 356; Lawrence v. Shaw, 300 U. S. 245, 249. In this instance, Congress has undertaken to safeguard the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation by providing the described immunity. As we have said, we construe this provision as embracing and prohibiting the tax in question. Since Congress had the constitutional authority to enact this provision, it is binding upon this Court as the supreme law of the land. Const. Art. VI.

The judgment of the state court is

Affirmed.

ESSO STANDARD OIL v. EVANS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1953.
345 U. S. 495, 97 L. ed. 1174, 73 Sup. Ct. 800.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

These are appeals from the Supreme Court of Tennessee, affirming a Chancery Court judgment for some $196,000 in favor of the State Commissioner of Finance and Taxation, against Esso Standard Oil Co., the party of record in No. 330. Ultimately liable, the United States intervened in that litigation and brought a separate appeal here, No. 378. It contended that the State tax involved is barred by principles of sovereign immunity. This is a test case. We are told that if the tax is sustained, a liability for upwards of $4,000,000 will result.

The facts are these. During World War II the Government was actively engaged in the production and procurement of high octane aviation fuel. All such gasoline produced was purchased before it left the refinery and, by formal passage of title, became immediately the property of the Defense Supplies Corporation, a corporation wholly owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, 6 Fed. Reg. 2972, as amended 6 Fed. Reg. 3363, and specifically exempt from state storage and use taxes, 55 Stat. 248. Release from storage by the producing companies occurred only on notification by the Petroleum Administration for War, in accordance with allocation of specific lots of fuel to various official consumers, including the Services and the Allies. The Air Force, in particular, then arranged for transportation of its various allotments—sometimes by government carrier—from the refineries to the nearest consuming point.

We are concerned with certain lots of Air Force fuel produced in the South at various plants and shipped through Memphis, Tennessee. It appears that in 1943 a shortage of storage facilities developed in the area, forcing resort to privately owned tanks. Appellant Esso and the Lion Oil Company were able to provide such service through tanks at various points near Memphis. As a result, the Government entered into extensive contracts with Esso which in turn rented the Lion tanks, providing that the Company would "render services * * * in receiving, storing, handling and loading Government-owned fuel." The Company's service charge ranged from 18/100 of a cent to 6 3/10 cents per gallon. The United States agreed to assume liability for all state taxes. Pursuant thereto, allotments of gasoline were moved by barge from refineries to these private tanks, stored there pending need, and later reshipped by truck to consuming air fields on order of the Air Force. The operations continued from 1943 through 1946 under several contracts of similar import.

August 2, 1949, the State, after investigation, demanded that Esso pay taxes in connection with these operations under the Tennessee gasoline tax, 2 Williams' Tenn. Code §§ 1126-1147. This statute, in material part, provided:

"Every distributor when engaged in such business in this state, shall pay to the state controller, through commissioner of finance and taxation, for the exclusive use of the state, a special privilege tax, in addition to all other taxes, for engaging in and carrying on such business in this state, in an amount equal to six cents for each gallon of gasoline, and six cents for each gallon of distillate refined, manufactured, produced, or compounded by such distributor and sold, stored or distributed by him in this state, or shipped, transported or imported by such distributor into, and distributed, stored or sold by him within this state, during such year; * * *." § 1127. * * *

Esso paid the required tax for the privilege of storing gasoline measured by the amount stored during the month of January 1944—the statute of limitations having run in regard to 1943 operations—and sued to recover. The Government intervened in the trial court and entered its plea, echoed by Esso, that the tax was barred by the constitutional doctrine of intergovernmental immunity; that to construe the Tennessee statute as applicable to storage of gasoline owned by the United States makes it repugnant to the Constitution and void. Both the Chancery Court and the Court of Appeals rejected the claimed immunity and held the statute valid as applied. We noted our probable jurisdiction on appeal. 28 U. S. C. § 1257(2) [F. C. A. 28 § 1257(2)].

The appellants take a firm stand on United States v. Allegheny County, 322 U. S. 174, which they contend is an analogous case that compels reversal of this decision. They say, in effect, that the tax here is no less "on" the property of the Federal Government than it was in that case, and in support of this claimed similiarity they point to the following factors: that the statute grew out of the state's effort to tax sales to the final consumer, that the tax is paid but once, and this by the first producer or importer, and that refunds when the fuel is subsequently exported are provided. Thus the "true character" of the tax, as one "on property of the United States," it is claimed, is precisely the same as that in Allegheny County.

Allegheny County, however, was quite different. The United States had leased certain machinery to the Mesta Machine Company. In imposing the state ad valorem property tax, Pennsylvania included in the Mesta assessment both the privately owned land and buildings, and the government machinery. Id., 322 U. S. at pages 179-180, 186. So the value of the federal property was, in part, the measure of the tax. We held the substance of this procedure was "to lay an ad valorem general property tax on property owned by the United States", Id., 322 U. S. at page 185, and therefore invalid. Our holding was not "dependent upon the ultimate resting place of the economic burden of the tax." Id., 322 U. S. at page 189.

This tax was imposed because Esso stored gasoline. It is not, as the Allegheny County tax was, based on the worth of the government property. Instead, the amount collected is graduated in accordance with the exercise of Esso's privilege to engage in such operations; so it is not "on" the federal property as was Pennsylvania's. Federal ownership of the fuel will not immunize such a private contractor from the tax on storage. It may generally, as it did here, burden the United States financially. But since James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U. S. 134, 151, this has been no fatal flaw. We must look further, and find either a stated immunity created by Congress in the exercise of a constitutional power, or one arising by implication from our constitutional system of dual government.

Neither condition applies to the kind of governmental operations here involved. There is no claim of a stated immunity. And we find none implied. The United States, today, is engaged in vast and complicated operations in business fields, and important purchasing, financial, and contract transactions with private enterprise. The Constitution does not extend sovereign exemption from state taxation to corporations or individuals, contracting with the United States, merely because their activities are useful to the Government. We hold, therefore, that sovereign immunity does not prohibit this tax. * * * Affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE BLACK and MR. JUSTICE JACKSON dissent.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, not having heard the argument, took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTES

1. The Supreme Court has upheld other specific Congressional exemptions of the property of federal agencies and instrumentalities from state taxation. In Federal Land Bank of St. Paul v. Bismarck Lumber Co., 314 U. S. 95, 86 L. ed. 65, 62 Sup. Ct. 1 (1941) it was held that the Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916 exempts federal land banks from sales taxes imposed by states on building materials for improvement of farm property acquired in foreclosure proceedings.

In Maricopa County v. Valley National Bank, 318 U. S. 357, 87 L. ed. 834, 63 Sup. Ct. 587 (1943) the court sustained an Act of Congress of 1936 which enacted that preferred shares of national banks, when held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, should not be taxed by states or their political subdivisions. Before this statute was enacted, the court had held in Baltimore National Bank v. State Tax Commission, 297 U. S. 209, 80 L. ed. 586, 56 Sup. Ct. 417 (1936) that such shares were subject to state taxation, even when held by the R. F. C. In the Maricopa County case the court said: "Little need be said in answer to the argument that the Act violates the Tenth Amendment. The authority by which the taxes in question were levied did not stem from the powers 'reserved to the states' under the Tenth Amendment. It was conferred by Congress which has under the Constitution exclusive authority to determine whether and to what extent its instrumentalities, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, shall be immune from state taxation. * * * Hence when Congress withdrew the privilege which it had previously granted, it was not curtailing any political power which the Constitution had reserved to Arizona. * * *"

In Cleveland v. United States, 323 U. S. 329, 89 L. ed. 274, 65 Sup. Ct. 280 (1945), a case involving state taxation of property of the Federal Public Housing Authority, the statutory exemption was sustained, the court saying: "And Congress may exempt property owned by the United States or its instrumentality from state taxation in furtherance of the purposes of the federal legislation. This is settled by such an array of authority that citation would seem unnecessary."

In Carson v. Roane-Anderson Co., 342 U. S. 232, 96 L. ed. 257, 72 Sup. Ct. 257 (1952) the court held that the purchase and use of materials and supplies by private corporations in performance of cost-plus fixed-fee contracts with the Atomic Energy Commission to operate government-owned plants for the production of fissionable materials at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, and to manage the government-owned town of Oak Ridge, were activities of the Commission exempt from Tennessee sales and use taxes under the Atomic Energy Act of 1946.

In Dameron v. Brodhead, 345 U. S. 322, 97 L. ed. 1041, 73 Sup. Ct. 721, 32 A. L. R. (2d) 612 (1953) the court held constitutional the provision of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 that the taxable domicile of servicemen shall not be changed by military assignments. The Act provided that "personal property shall not be deemed to be located or present in or to have a situs for taxation" in the state of temporary presence in any case. The court said that the effect of the statute was to free servicemen from both income and property taxes imposed by any state by virtue of their presence there as a result of military orders. "It saved the sole right of taxation to the state of original residence whether or not that state exercised the right. Congress, manifestly, thought that compulsory presence in a state should not alter the benefits and burdens of our system of dual federalism during service with the armed forces." Justices Douglas and Black dissented.

PENN DAIRIES v. MILK CONTROL COMMISSION.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1943.
318 U. S. 261, 87 L. ed. 748, 63 Sup. Ct. 617.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Decision in this case turns on the question whether the minimum price regulations of the Pennsylvania Milk Control Law of April 28, 1937, P. L. 417, Purdon's Pa. Stat. Ann., Tit. 31, § 700j, may constitutionally be applied to the sale of milk by a dealer to the United States, the sale being consummated within the territorial limits of the state in a place subject to its jurisdiction. * * *

[Penn Dairies supplied milk under a contract calling for prices substantially below the minimum prices fixed by the Milk Control Commission, to the United States government at a military encampment located on lands owned by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The encampment was established under a permit from the Commonwealth which did not involve surrender of state jurisdiction or authority over the area occupied by the camp. The Milk Control Commission, after hearings, denied Penn Dairies' application for a milk dealer's license for the year beginning May 1, 1941, because of its sale and delivery of the milk to the encampment at prices below the fixed minima. The Pennsylvania courts sustained the denial of the license and the dairy appealed to this Court.]

Appellants urged that the Pennsylvania Milk Control Act, as applied to a dealer selling to the United States, violates a constitutional immunity of the United States, and also conflicts with federal legislation regulating purchases by the United States and therefore cannot constitutionally apply to such purchases.

Appellants' first proposition proceeds on the assumption that local price regulations normally controlling milk dealers who carry on their business within the state, when applied to sales made to the government, so burden it or so conflict with the Constitution as to render the regulations unlawful. We may assume that Congress, in aid of its granted power to raise and support armies, Article I, § 8, cl. 12, and with the support of the supremacy clause, Article VI, § 2, could declare state regulations like the present inapplicable to sales to the government. Cf. Pittman v. Home Owners' Loan Corp., 308 U. S. 21, 33; Federal Land Bank v. Bismarck Co., 314 U. S. 95, 101-04; Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341, 350-351, and cases cited. But there is no clause of the Constitution which purports, unaided by Congressional enactment, to prohibit such regulations, and the question with which we are now concerned is whether such a prohibition is to be implied from the relationship of the two governments established by the Constitution.

We may assume also that, in the absence of Congressional consent, there is an implied constitutional immunity of the national government from state taxation and from state regulation of the performance, by federal officers and agencies, of governmental functions. Ohio v. Thomas, 173 U. S. 276; Johnson v. Maryland, 254 U. S. 51; Hunt v. United States, 278 U. S. 96; Arizona v. California, 283 U. S. 423. But those who contract to furnish supplies or render services to the government are not such agencies and do not perform governmental functions, Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514, 524-5; James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U. S. 134, 149; Buckstaff Co. v. McKinley, 308 U. S. 358, 362-63 and cases cited; cf. Susquehanna Co. v. Tax Comm'n, 283 U. S. 291, 294; Helvering v. Mountain Producers Corp., 303 U. S. 376, 385-86, and the mere fact that non-discriminatory taxation or regulation of the contractor imposes an increased economic burden on the government is no longer regarded as bringing the contractor within any implied immunity of the government from state taxation or regulation. Alabama v. King & Boozer, 314 U. S. 1, 9, and cases cited; Baltimore & Annapolis R. Co. v. Lichtenberg, 176 Md. 383, 4 A. 2d 734, s. c., United States v. Baltimore & Annapolis R. Co., 308 U. S. 525.

Here the state regulation imposes no prohibition on the national government or its officers. They may purchase milk from whom and at what price they will, without incurring any penalty. See the opinion below, 148 Pa. Super. 270-71. As in the case of state taxation of the seller, the government is affected only as the state's regulation may increase the price which the government must pay for milk. By the exercise of control over the seller, the regulation imposes or may impose an increased economic burden on the government, for it may be assumed that the regulation if enforceable and enforced will increase the price of milk purchased for consumption in Pennsylvania, unless the government is able to procure a supply from without the state, see Baldwin v. Seelig, 294 U. S. 511. But in this burden, if Congress has not acted to forbid it, we can find no different or greater impairment of federal authority than in the tax on sales to a government contractor sustained in Alabama v. King & Boozer, supra; or the state regulation of the operations of a trucking company in performing its contract with the government to transport workers employed on a Public Works Administration project, upheld in Balti- more & Annapolis R. Co. v. Lichtenberg, supra; or the local building regulations applied to a contractor engaged in constructing a post-office building for the government, sustained in Stewart & Co. v. Sadrakula, 309 U. S. 94.

The trend of our decisions is not to extend governmental immunity from state taxation and regulation beyond the national government itself and governmental functions performed by its officers and agents. We have recognized that the Constitution presupposes the continued existence of the states functioning in coordination with the national government, with authority in the states to lay taxes and to regulate their internal affairs and policy, and that state regulation like state taxation inevitably imposes some burdens on the national government of the same kind as those imposed on citizens of the United States within the state's borders. * * *

Since the Constitution has left Congress free to set aside local taxation and regulation of government contractors which burden the national government, we see no basis for implying from the Constitution alone a restriction upon such regulations which Congress has not seen fit to impose, unless the regulations are shown to be inconsistent with Congressional policy. * * *

[The majority found no such legislation or expressed policy and the judgment was affirmed. On the latter point, JUSTICES DOUGLAS, BLACK and JACKSON dissented.]

NOTES

1. In Pacific Coast Dairy v. Department of Agriculture, 318 U. S. 285, 87 L. ed. 761, 63 Sup. Ct. 628 (1943), it was held that California was precluded by the Constitution (Art. I, § 8, cl. 17, granting to Congress the power of "exclusive legislation" over territory ceded by a state, and the enlargement of this authority by the "necessary and proper clause" to include the power to enact all appropriate incidental legislation) from revoking the license of a milk dealer for selling milk to the War Department at less than the minimum prices fixed by state law, where the sales and deliveries were made on Moffett Field, which is subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, having been acquired by act of Congress in 1931. Penn Dairies v. Milk Control Commission was distinguished on the ground that there the sales occurred within the state's jurisdiction, and there was absent specific national legislation excluding the operation of the state's regulatory laws. Justices Frankfurter and Murphy wrote separate dissenting opinions.

2. Howard v. Commissioners of Sinking Fund, 344 U. S. 624, 97 L. ed. 617, 73 Sup. Ct. 465 (1953) sustained an occupational license tax of the City of Louisville, computed on gross receipts from work done or business conducted in the city, as applied to employees of a naval ordnance plant located on land owned by, and under the jurisdiction of, the United States since 1941. (By ordinances enacted in 1947 and 1950, the city had annexed certain territory, including the ordnance plant tract, which annexation was not challenged by the United States.) The court based its holding on the fact that Congress had made recession of its exclusive jurisdiction over such federal area to the extent of permitting the taxation involved. Justices Douglas and Black dissented.

NEW YORK v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.
326 U. S. 572, 90 L. ed. 326, 66 Sup. Ct. 310.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion in which MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE joined.

Section 615(a)(5) of the 1932 Revenue Act, 47 Stat. 169, 264, imposed a tax on mineral waters. The United States brought this suit to recover taxes assessed against the State of New York on the sale of mineral waters taken from Saratoga Springs, New York. The state claims immunity from this tax on the ground that "in the bottling and sale of the said waters the defendant State of New York was engaged in the exercise of a usual, traditional and essential governmental function." The claim was rejected by the District Court and judgment went for the United States. 48 F. Supp. 15. The judgment was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. 140 F. (2d) 608. The strong urging of New York for further clarification of the amenability of States to the taxing power of the United States led us to grant certiorari. 322 U. S. 724.

On the basis of authority the case is quickly disposed of. When States sought to control the liquor traffic by going into the liquor business, they were denied immunity from federal taxes upon the liquor business. South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437; Ohio v. Helvering, 292 U. S. 360. And in rejecting a claim of immunity from federal taxation when Massachusetts took over the street railways of Boston, this Court a decade ago said: "We see no reason for putting the operation of a street railway [by a State] in a different category from the sale of liquors." Helvering v. Powers, 293 U. S. 214, 227. We certainly see no reason for putting soft drinks in a different constitutional category from hard drinks. See also Allen v. Regents, 304 U. S. 439.

One of the greatest sources of strength of our law is that it adjudicates concrete cases and does not pronounce principles in the abstract. But there comes a time when even the process of empiric adjudication calls for a more rational disposition than that the immediate case is not different from preceding cases. The argument pressed by New York and the forty-five other states who, as amici curiae, have joined her deserves an answer. * * *

* * * the fear that one government may cripple or obstruct the operations of the other early led to the assumption that there was a reciprocal immunity of the instrumentalities of each from taxation by the other. It was assumed that there was an equivalence in the implications of taxation by a State of the governmental activities of the National Government and the taxation by the National Government of State instrumentalities. This assumed equivalence was nourished by the phrase of Chief Justice Marshall that "the power to tax involves the power to destroy" McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 431. To be sure, it was uttered in connection with a tax of Maryland which plainly discriminated against the use by the United States of the Bank of the United States as one of its instruments. What he said may not have been irrelevant in its setting. But Chief Justice Marshall spoke at a time when social complexities did not so clearly reveal as now the practical limitations of a rhetorical absolute. See Holmes, J., in Long v. Rockwood, 277 U. S. 142, 148, and in Panhandle Oil Co. v. Mississippi, 277 U. S. 218, 223. The phrase was seized upon as the basis of a broad doctrine of intergovernmental immunity, while at the same time an expansive scope was given to what were deemed to be "instrumentalities of government" for purposes of tax immunity. As a result, immunity was until recently accorded to all officers of one government from taxation by the other, and it was further assumed that the economic burden of a tax on any interest derived from a government imposes a burden on that government so as to involve an interference by the taxing government with the functioning of the other government. See Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514; Helvering v. Producers Corp., 303 U. S. 376; Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U. S. 466, 480-81.

To press a juristic principle designed for the practical affairs of government to abstract extremes is neither sound logic nor good sense. And this Court is under no duty to make law less than sound logic and good sense. When this Court for the first time relieved State officers from a non-discriminatory Congressional tax, not because of anything said in the Constitution but because of the supposed implications of our federal system, Mr. Justice Bradley pointed out the invalidity of the notion of reciprocal intergovernmental immunity. The considerations bearing upon taxation by the States of activities or agencies of the federal government are not correlative with the considerations bearing upon federal taxation of State agencies or activities. The federal government is the government of all the States, and all the States share in the legislative process by which a tax of general applicability is laid. "The taxation by the State governments of the instruments employed by the general government in the exercise of its powers," said Mr. Justice Bradley, "is a very different thing. Such taxation involves an interference with the powers of a government in which other States and their citizens are equally interested with the State which imposes the taxation." Since then we have moved away from the theoretical assumption that the National Government is burdened if its functionaries, like other citizens, pay for the upkeep of their State governments, and we have denied the implied constitutional immunity of federal officials from State taxes. Graves v. N. Y. ex rel. O'Keefe, supra. * * *

In the meantime, cases came here, as we have already noted, in which States claimed immunity from a federal tax imposed generally on enterprises in which the State itself was also engaged. This problem did not arise before the present century, partly because State trading did not actively emerge until relatively recently, and partly because of the narrow scope of federal taxation. In South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, immunity from a federal tax on a dispensary system, whereby South Carolina monopolized the sale of intoxicating liquors, was denied by drawing a line between taxation of the historically recognized governmental functions of a State, and business engaged in by a State of a kind which theretofore had been pursued by private enterprise. The power of the federal government thus to tax a liquor business conducted by the State was derived from an appeal to the Constitution "in the light of conditions surrounding at the time of its adoption." South Carolina v. United States, supra, at 457. That there is a Constitutional line between the State as government and the State as trader, was still more recently made the basis of a decision sustaining a liquor tax against Ohio. "If a state chooses to go into the business of buying and selling commodities, its right to do so may be conceded so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned; but the exercise of the right is not the performance of a governmental function. * * * When a state enters the market place seeking customers it divests itself of its quasi sovereignty pro tanto, and takes on the character of a trader, so far, at least, as the taxing power of the federal government is concerned." Ohio v. Helvering, supra at 369. When the Ohio case was decided it was too late in the day not to recognize the vast extension of the sphere of government, both State and national, compared with that with which the Fathers were familiar. It could hardly remain a satisfactory constitutional doctrine that only such State activities are immune from federal taxation as were engaged in by the States in 1787. Such a static concept of government denies its essential nature. "The science of government is the most abstruse of all sciences; if, indeed, that can be called a science which has but few fixed principles, and practically consists in little more than the exercise of a sound discretion, applied to the exigencies of the state as they arise. It is the science of experiment." Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, 226.

When this Court came to sustain the federal taxing power upon a transportation system operated by a State, it did so in ways familiar in developing the law from precedent to precedent. It edged away from reliance on a sharp distinction between the "governmental" and the "trading" activities of a State, by denying immunity from federal taxation to a State when it "is undertaking a business enterprise of a sort that is normally within the reach of the federal taxing power and is distinct from the usual governmental functions that are immune from federal taxation in order to safeguard the necessary independence of the State." Helvering v. Powers, supra, at 227. But this likewise does not furnish a satisfactory guide for dealing with such a practical problem as the constitutional power of the United States over State activities. To rest the federal taxing power on what is "normally" conducted by private enterprise in contradiction to the "usual" governmental functions is too shifting a basis for determining constitutional power and too entangled in expediency to serve as a dependable legal criterion. The essential nature of the problem cannot be hidden by an attempt to separate manifestations of indivisible governmental powers. See Wambaugh, Present Scope of Government (1897), 20 A. B. A. Rep. 307; Frankfurter, The Public and Its Government (1930). * * *

In the older cases, the emphasis was on immunity from taxation. The whole tendency of recent cases reveals a shift in emphasis to that of limitation upon immunity. They also indicate an awareness of the limited role of courts in assessing the relative weight of the factors upon which immunity is based. Any implied limitation upon the supremacy of the federal power to levy a tax like that now before us, in the absence of discrimination against State activities, brings fiscal and political factors into play. The problem cannot escape issues that do not lend themselves to judgment by criteria and methods of reasoning that are within the professional training and special competence of judges. Indeed the claim of implied immunity by States from federal taxation raises questions not wholly unlike provisions of the Constitution, such as that of Art. IV, § 4, guaranteeing States a republican form of government, see Pac. States Tel. & T. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118, which this Court has deemed not within its duty to adjudicate.

We have already held that by engaging in the railroad business a State cannot withdraw the railroad from the power of the federal government to regulate commerce. United States v. California, 297 U. S. 175. See also University of Illinois v. United States, 289 U. S. 48. Surely the power of Congress to lay taxes has impliedly no less a reach than the power of Congress to regulate commerce. There are, of course, State activities and State-owned property that partake of uniqueness from the point of view of intergovernmental relations. These inherently constitute a class by themselves. Only a State can own a State-house; only a State can get income by taxing. These could not be included for purposes of federal taxation in any abstract category of taxpayers without taxing the State as a State. But so long as Congress generally taps a source of revenue by whomsoever earned and not uniquely capable of being earned only by a State, the Constitution of the United States does not forbid it merely because its incidence falls also on a State. If Congress desires, it may of course leave untaxed enterprises pursued by States for the public good while it taxes like enterprises organized for private ends. Cf. Springfield Gas Co. v.

Springfield, 257 U. S. 66; University of Illinois v. United States, supra, at 57; Puget Sound Co. v. Seattle, 291 U. S. 619. If Congress makes no such differentiation and, as in this case, taxes all vendors of mineral water alike, whether State vendors or private vendors, it simply says, in effect, to a State: "You may carry out your own notions of social policy in engaging in what is called business, but you must pay your share in having a nation which enables you to pursue your policy." After all, the representatives of all the States, having, as the appearance of the Attorneys General of forty-six States at the bar of this Court shows, common interests, alone can pass such a taxing measure and they alone in their wisdom can grant or withhold immunity from federal taxation of such State activities.

The process of Constitutional adjudication does not thrive on conjuring up horrible possibilities that never happen in the real world and devising doctrines sufficiently comprehensive in detail to cover the remotest contingency. Nor need we go beyond what is required for a reasoned disposition of the kind of controversy now before the Court. The restriction upon States not to make laws that discriminate against interstate commerce is a vital constitutional principle, even though "discrimination" is not a code of specifics but a continuous process of application. So we decide enough when we reject limitations upon the taxing power of Congress derived from such untenable criteria as "proprietary" against "governmental" activities of the States, or historically sanctioned activities of Government, or activities conducted merely for profit, and find no restriction upon Congress to include the States in levying a tax exacted equally from private persons upon the same subject matter.

Judgment affirmed.

[Mr. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case. Mr. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE concurred in a separate opinion which is omitted.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE concurring.

MR. JUSTICE REED, MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, MR. JUSTICE BURTON and I concur in the result. We are of the opinion that the tax here involved should be sustained and the judgment below affirmed.

In view of our decisions in South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, Ohio v. Helvering, 292 U. S. 360, Helvering v. Powers, 292 U. S. 214, and Allen v. Regents, 304 U. S. 439, we would find it difficult not to sustain the tax in this case, even though we regard as untenable the distinction between "governmental" and "proprietary" interests on which those cases rest to some extent. But we are not prepared to say that the national government may constitutionally lay a non-discriminatory tax on every class of property and activities of States and individuals alike.

Concededly a federal tax discriminating against a State would be an unconstitutional exertion of power over a coexisting sovereignty within the same framework of government. But our difficulty with the formula, now first suggested as offering a new solution for an old problem, is that a federal tax which is not discriminatory as to the subject matter may nevertheless so affect the State, merely because it is a State that is being taxed, as to interfere unduly with the State's performance of its sovereign functions of government. The counterpart of such undue interference has been recognized since Marshall's day as the implied immunity of each of the dual sovereignties of our constitutional system from taxation by the other. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316. We add nothing to this formula by saying, in a new form of words, that a tax which Congress applies generally to the property and activities of private citizens may not be in some instances constitutionally extended to the States, merely because the States are included among those who pay taxes on a like subject of taxation. If the phrase "non-discriminatory tax" is to be taken in its long accepted meaning as referring to a tax laid on a like subject matter, without regard to the personality of the taxpayer, whether a State, a corporation or a private individual, it is plain that there may be non-discriminatory taxes which, when laid on a State, would nevertheless impair the sovereign status of the State quite as much as a like tax imposed by a State on property or activities of the national government. Mayo v. United States, 319 U. S. 441, 447-448. This is not because the tax can be regarded as discriminatory but because a sovereign government is the taxpayer, and the tax, even though non-discriminatory, may be regarded as infringing its sovereignty.

A State may, like a private individual, own real property and receive income. But in view of our former decisions we could hardly say that a general non-discriminatory real estate tax (apportioned), or an income tax laid upon citizens and States alike could be constitutionally applied to the State's capitol, its State-house, its public school houses, public parks, or its revenues from taxes or school lands, even though all real property and all income of the citizen is taxed. If it be said that private citizens do not own State-houses or public school buildings or receive tax revenues, it may equally be said that private citizens do not conduct a State-owned liquor business or derive revenue from a State-owned athletic field. Obviously Congress, in taxing property or income generally, is not taxing a State "as a State" because the State happens to own real estate or receive income. Whether a State or an individual is taxed, in each instance the taxable occasion is the same. The tax reaches the State because of the Congressional purpose to lay the tax on the subject matter chosen, regardless of who pays it. To say that the tax fails because the State happens to be the taxpayer is only to say that the State, to some extent undefined, is constitutionally immune from federal taxation. Only when and because the subject of taxation is State property or a State activity must we consider whether such a non-discriminatory tax unduly interferes with the performance of the State's functions of government. If it does, then the fact that the tax is non-discriminatory does not save it. If we are to treat as invalid, because discriminatory, a tax on "State activities and State-owned property that partake of uniqueness from the point of view of intergovernmental relations", it is plain that the invalidity is due wholly to the fact that it is a State which is being taxed so as unduly to infringe, in some manner, the performance of its functions as a government which the Constitution recognizes as sovereign.

It is enough for present purposes that the immunity of the State from federal taxation would, in this case, accomplish a withdrawal from the taxing power of the nation a subject of taxation of a nature which has been traditionally within that power from the beginning. Its exercise now, by a non-discriminatory tax, does not curtail the business of the state government more than it does the like business of the citizen. It gives merely an accustomed and reasonable scope to the federal taxing power. Such a withdrawal from a non-discriminatory federal tax, and one which does not bear on the State any differently than on the citizen, is itself an impairment of the taxing power of the national government, and the activity taxed is such that its taxation does not unduly impair the State's functions of government. The nature of the tax immunity requires that it be so construed as to allow to each government reasonable scope for its taxing power, Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514, 524. * * *

The problem is not one to be solved by a formula, but we may look to the structure of the Constitution as our guide to decision. * * *

Since all taxes must be laid by general, that is, workable, rules, the effect of the immunity on the national taxing power is to be determined not quantitatively but by its operation and tendency in withdrawing taxable property or activities from the reach of federal taxation. Not the extent to which a particular State engages in the activity, but the nature and extent of the activity by whomsoever performed is the relevant consideration.

Regarded in this light we cannot say that the Constitution either requires or permits immunity of the State's mineral water business from federal taxation, or denies to the federal government power to lay the tax.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK concurs, dissenting.

If South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, is to stand, the present judgment would have to be affirmed. For I agree that there is no essential difference between a federal tax on South Carolina's liquor business and a federal tax on New York's mineral water business. Whether South Carolina v. United States reaches the right result is another matter.

Mr. Justice Brandeis stated that "Stare decisis is usually the wise policy, because in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right." Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U. S. 393, 406. But throughout the history of the Court stare decisis has had only a limited application in the field of constitutional law. And it is a wise policy which largely restricts it to those areas of the law where correction can be had by legislation. Otherwise the Constitution loses its flexibility necessary if it is to serve the needs of successive generations.

I do not believe South Carolina v. United States states the correct rule. A State's project is as much a legitimate governmental activity whether it is traditional, or akin to private enterprise, or conducted for profit. Cf. Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U. S. 405, 426-427. A State may deem it as essential to its economy that it own and operate a railroad, a mill, or an irrigation system as it does to own and operate bridges, street lights, or a sewage disposal plant. What might have been viewed in an earlier day as an improvident or even dangerous extension of state activities may today be deemed indispensable. But as Mr. Justice White said in his dissent in South Carolina v. United States, any activity in which a State engages within the limits of its police power is a legitimate governmental activity. Here a State is disposing of some of its natural resources. Tomorrow it may issue securities, sell power from its public power project, or manufacture fertilizer. Each is an exercise of its power of sovereignty. Must it pay the federal government for the privilege of exercising that inherent power? If the Constitution grants it immunity from a tax on the issuance of securities, on what grounds can it be forced to pay a tax when it sells power or disposes of other natural resources?

One view, just announced, purports to reject the distinction which South Carolina v. United States drew between those activities of a State which are and those which are not strictly governmental, usual, or traditional. But it is said that a federal tax on a State will be sustained so long as Congress "does not attempt to tax a State because it is a State." Yet if that means that a federal real estate tax of general application (apportioned) would be valid if applied to a power dam owned by a state but invalid if applied to a state-house, the old doctrine has merely been poured into a new container. If, on the other hand, any federal tax on any state activity were sustained unless it discriminated against the State, then a constitutional rule would be fashioned which would undermine the sovereignty of the States as it has been understood throughout our history. Any such change should be accomplished only by constitutional amendment. The doctrine of state immunity is too intricately involved in projects which have been launched to be whittled down by judicial fiat.

* * * The Supremacy Clause, Article VI, clause 2, applies to federal laws within the powers delegated to Congress by the States. But it is antagonistic to the very implications of our federal system to say that the power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, Article I, § 8, includes the power to tax any state activity or function so long as the tax does not discriminate against the States. * * *

A tax is a powerful, regulatory instrument. Local government in this free land does not exist for itself. The fact that local government may enter the domain of private enterprise and operate a project for profit does not put it in the class of private business enterprise for tax purposes. Local government exists to provide for the welfare of its people, not for a limited group of stockholders. If the federal government can place the local governments on its tax collector's list, their capacity to serve the needs of their citizens is at once hampered or curtailed. The field of federal excise taxation alone is practically without limits. Many state activities are in marginal enterprises where private capital refuses to venture. Add to the cost of these projects a federal tax and the social program may be destroyed before it can be launched. In any case, the repercussions of such a fundamental change on the credit of the States and on their programs to take care of the needy and to build for the future would be considerable. To say the present tax will be sustained because it does not impair the State's functions of government is to conclude either that the sale by the State of its mineral water is not a function of government or that the present tax is so slight as to be no burden. The former obviously is not true. The latter overlooks the fact that the power to tax lightly is the power to tax severely. The power to tax is indeed one of the most effective forms of regulation. And no more powerful instrument for centralization of government could be devised. For with the federal government immune and the State subject to tax, the economic ability of the federal government to expand its activities at the expense of the States is at once apparent. That is the result whether the rule of South Carolina v. United States be perpetuated or a new rule of discrimination be adopted.

The notion that the sovereign position of the States must find its protection in the will of a transient majority of Congress is foreign to and a negation of our constitutional system. There will often be vital regional interests represented by no majority in Congress. The Constitution was designed to keep the balance between the States and the nation outside the field of legislative controversy.

The immunity of the States from federal taxation is no less clear because it is implied. The States on entering the Union surrendered some of their sovereignty. It was further curtailed as various Amendments were adopted. But the Tenth Amendment provides that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The Constitution is a compact between sovereigns. The power of one sovereign to tax another is an innovation so startling as to require explicit authority if it is to be allowed. If the power of the federal government to tax the States is conceded, the reserved power of the States guaranteed by the Tenth Amendment does not give them the independence which they have always been assumed to have. They are relegated to a more servile status. They become subject to interference and control both in the functions which they exercise and the methods which they employ. They must pay the federal government for the privilege of exercising the powers of sovereignty guaranteed them by the Constitution, whether, as here, they are disposing of their natural resources, or tomorrow they issue securities or perform any other acts within the scope of their police power.

Of course, the levying of the present tax does not curtail the business of the state government more than it does the like business of the citizen. But the same might be true in the case of many state activities which have long been assumed to be immune from federal taxation. When a municipality acquires a water system or an electric power plant and transmission facilities, it withdraws projects from the field of private enterprise. Is the tax immunity to be denied because a tax on the municipality would not curtail the municipality more than it would the prior private owner? Is the municipality to be taxed whenever it engages in an activity which once was in the field of private enterprise and therefore was once taxable? Every expansion of state activity since the adoption of the Constitution limits the reach of federal taxation if state immunity is recognized. Yet none would concede that the sovereign powers of the States were limited to those which they exercised in 1787. Nor can it be said that if the present tax is not sustained there will be withdrawn from the taxing power of the federal government a subject of taxation which has been traditionally within that power from the beginning. Not until South Carolina v. United States was it held that so-called business activities of a State were subject to federal taxation. That was after the turn of the present century. Thus the major objection to the suggested test is that it disregards the Tenth Amendment, places the sovereign States on the same plane as private citizens, and makes the sovereign States pay the federal government for the privilege of exercising the powers of sovereignty guaranteed them by the Constitution. * * *

1. Property owned by the United States is not subject to state taxation even though it is not being devoted to governmental use. In Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 151, 29 L. ed. 845, 6 Sup. Ct. 670 (1886) land acquired by the United States at tax foreclosure and held for resale was held to be exempt from assessment and sale for state taxes, the court saying that "whether the property of the United States shall be taxed under the laws of a state depends upon the will of its owner, the United States, and no state can tax the property of the United States without their consent."

UNITED STATES v. CALIFORNIA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1936.
297 U. S. 175, 80 L. ed. 567, 56 Sup. Ct. 421.

MR. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a suit brought by the United States against the State of California in the District Court for northern California to recover the statutory penalty of $100 for violation of the federal Safety Appliance Act, § 2, Act of March 2, 1893, c. 196, 27 Stat. 531, 45 U. S. C. § 2, and § 6 of the Act as amended April 1, 1896, 29 Stat. 85, 45 U. S. C. § 6.

The complaint alleges that California, in the operation of the state-owned State Belt Railroad, is a common carrier engaged in interstate transportation by railroad, and that it has violated the Safety Appliance Act by hauling over the road a car equipped with defective coupling apparatus. Upon the trial, without a jury, upon stipulated facts, the district court gave judgment for the United States. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed, 75 F. (2d) 41, on the ground that as exclusive jurisdiction of suits to which a state is a party is conferred upon this Court by § 233 of the Judicial Code, 36 Stat. 1156, 28 U. S. C. 341, the District Court was without jurisdiction of the cause. We granted certiorari to review the case as one involving questions of public importance, upon a petition of the government which urged that the state is a common carrier by railroad, subject to the Safety Appliance Act, and, under its provisions, to suit in the district court to recover penalties for violation of the Act. * * *

1. Whether a transportation agency is a common carrier depends not upon its corporate character or declared purposes, but upon what it does. United States v. Brooklyn Terminal, 249 U. S. 296, 304. The State Belt Railroad is owned and operated by the state, * * *. It parallels the water front of San Francisco harbor and extends onto some forty-five state-owned wharves. It serves directly about one hundred and seventy-five industrial plants, has track connection with one interstate railroad, and, by wharf connections with freight car ferries, links that and three other interstate rail carriers with freight yards in San Francisco leased to them by the state. It receives and transports from the one to the other, by its own engines, all freight cars, loaded and empty, and the freight they contain, offered to it by railroads, steamship companies and industrial plants. The larger part of this traffic has its origin or destination in states other than California. For the transportation service it makes a flat charge per car. * * *

2. The state urges that it is not subject to the federal Safety Appliance Act. It is not denied that the omission charged would be a violation if by a privately-owned rail carrier in interstate commerce. But it is said that as the state is operating the railroad without profit, for the purpose of facilitating the commerce of the port, and is using the net proceeds of operation for harbor improvement, * * *, it is engaged in performing a public function in its sovereign capacity and for that reason cannot constitutionally be subjected to the provisions of the federal Act. In any case it is argued that the statute is not to be construed as applying to the state acting in that capacity.

Despite reliance upon the point both by the government and the state, we think it unimportant to say whether the state conducts its railroad in its "sovereign" or in its "private" capacity. That in operating its railroad it is acting within a power reserved to the states cannot be doubted. See Puget Sound Power & Light Co. v. Seattle, 291 U. S. 619, 624; Green v. Frazier, 253 U. S. 233; Jones v. Portland, 245 U. S. 217. The only question we need consider is whether the exercise of that power, in whatever capacity, must be in subordination to the power to regulate interstate commerce, which has been granted specifically to the national government. The sovereign power of the states is necessarily diminished to the extent of the grants of power to the federal government in the Constitution. The power of a state to fix intrastate railroad rates must yield to the power of the national government when their regulation is appropriate to the regulation of interstate commerce. United States v. Louisiana, 290 U. S. 70, 74, 75; Wisconsin Railroad Comm'n v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 257 U. S. 563; Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 342. A contract between a state and a rail carrier fixing intrastate rates is subject to regulation and control of Congress, acting within the commerce clause, New York v. United States, 257 U. S. 591, as are state agencies created to effect a public purpose, see Sanitary District of Chicago v. United States, 266 U. S. 405; Board of Trustees v. United States, 289 U. S. 48; see Georgia v. Chattanooga, 264 U. S. 472. In each case the power of the state is subordinate to the constitutional exercise of the granted federal power.

The analogy of the constitutional immunity of state instrumentalities from federal taxation, on which respondent relies, is not illuminating. That immunity is implied from the nature of our federal system and the relationship within it of state and national governments and is equally a restriction on taxation by either of the instrumentalities of the other. Its nature requires that it be so construed as to allow to each government reasonable scope for its taxing power, see Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514, 522-524, which would be unduly curtailed if either by extending its activities could withdraw from the taxing power of the other subjects of taxation traditionally within it. Helvering v. Powers, 293 U. S. 214, 225; Ohio v. Helvering, 292 U. S. 360; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437; see Murray v. Wilson Distilling Co., 213 U. S. 151, 173, explaining South Carolina v. United States, supra. Hence we look to the activities in which the states have traditionally engaged as marking the boundary of the restriction upon the federal taxing power. But there is no such limitation upon the plenary power to regulate commerce. The state can no more deny the power if its exercise has been authorized by Congress than can an individual.

California, by engaging in interstate commerce by rail, has subjected itself to the commerce power, and is liable for a violation of the Safety Appliance Act, as are other carriers, unless the statute is to be deemed inapplicable to state-owned railroads because it does not specifically mention them. The federal Safety Appliance Act is remedial, to protect employees and the public from injury because of defective railway appliances, Swinson v. Chicago, St. Paul, M. & O. Ry. Co., 294 U. S. 529; Fairport, P. & E. R. Co. v. Meredith, 292 U. S. 589, 594; Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 196 U. S. 1, 17, and to safeguard interstate commerce itself from obstruction and injury due to defective appliances upon locomotives and cars used on the highways of interstate commerce, even though their individual use is wholly intrastate. Southern Ry. Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20; Moore v. Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., 291 U. S. 205, 214. The danger to be apprehended is as great and commerce may be equally impeded whether the defective appliance is used on a railroad which is state-owned or privately-owned. No convincing reason is advanced why interstate commerce and persons and property concerned in it should not receive the protection of the act whenever a state, as well as a privately-owned carrier, brings itself within the sweep of the statute, or why its all-embracing language should not be deemed to afford that protection. * * *

[The Court further held that Congress had given district courts jurisdiction over a suit against a state in actions under the Safety Appliance Act.] Judgment reversed.

NOTE

1. The University of Illinois imported scientific apparatus for use in one of its educational departments. Customs duties were exacted at the rates prescribed by the Tariff Act of 1922. The university paid under protest, claiming that as a state instrumentality, discharging a governmental function, it was entitled to import the articles duty free. The custom duty was sustained, since the control of importation does not rest with the state but with Congress. The Supreme Court said, through Chief Justice Hughes: "To permit the States and their instrumentalities to import commodities for their own use, regardless of the requirements imposed by the Congress, would undermine, if not destroy, the single control which it was one of the dominant purposes of the Constitution to create. It is for the Congress to decide to what extent, if at all, the States and their instrumentalities shall be relieved of the payment of duties on imported articles." Board of Trustees of University of Illinois v. United States, 289 U. S. 48, 77 L. ed. 1025, 53 Sup. Ct. 509 (1933). See also, Johnson, When the Importer is a State University, May the Government Collect a Duty? 27 Mich. L. Rev. 499 (1929).

UNITED STATES v. LANZA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1922.
260 U. S. 377, 67 L. ed. 314, 43 Sup. Ct. 141.

[The defendants were indicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington charged with manufacturing intoxicating liquor, transporting it and having it in their possession in violation of the National Prohibition Act. The defendants pleaded in bar a prior conviction for the same acts in the Superior Court of Whatcom County, State of Washington, wherein they had been tried upon an information charging them with having done these acts in violation of a state prohibition statute. The United States District Court sustained the plea and ordered the indictment dismissed. The United States took this writ of error under the Criminal Appeals Act (c. 2564, 34 Stat. 1246) to reverse the order.]

The defendants insist that two punishments for the same act, one under the National Prohibition Act and the other under a state law, constitute double jeopardy under the Fifth Amendment; and in support of this position it is argued that both laws derive their force from the same authority,—the second section of the [Eighteenth] Amendment,—and therefore that in principle it is as if both punishments were in prosecutions by the United States in its courts. * * *

The [Eighteenth] Amendment was adopted for the purpose of establishing prohibition as a national policy reaching every part of the United States and affecting transactions which are essentially local or intrastate, as well as those pertaining to interstate or foreign commerce. The second section means that power to take legislative measures to make the policy effective shall exist in Congress in respect of the territorial limits of the United States and at the same time the like power of the several states within their territorial limits shall not cease to exist. Each state, as also Congress, may exercise an independent judgment in selecting and shaping measures to enforce prohibition. Such as are adopted by Congress become laws of the United States and such as are adopted by a state become laws of that state. They may vary in many particulars, including the penalties prescribed, but this is an inseparable incident of independent legislative action in distinct jurisdictions.

To regard the Amendment as the source of the power of the States to adopt and enforce prohibition measures is to take a partial and erroneous view of the matter. Save for some restrictions arising out of the federal Constitution, chiefly the commerce clause, each state possessed that power in full measure prior to the Amendment, and the probable purpose of declaring a concurrent power to be in the States was to negative any possible inference that in vesting the national government with the power of country-wide prohibition, state power would be excluded.

In effect the second section of the Eighteenth Amendment put an end to restrictions upon the state's power arising out of the federal Constitution and left her free to enact prohibition laws applying to all transactions within her limits. To be sure, the first section of the Amendment took from the States all power to authorize acts falling within its prohibition, but it did not cut down or displace prior state laws not inconsistent with it. Such laws derive their force, as do all new ones consistent with it, not from this Amendment, but from power originally belonging to the States, preserved to them by the Tenth Amendment, and now relieved from the restriction heretofore arising out of the federal Constitution. This is the ratio decidendi of our decision in Vigliotti v. Pennsylvania, 258 U. S. 403.

We have here two sovereignties, deriving power from different sources, capable of dealing with the same subject matter within the same territory. Each may, without interference by the other, enact laws to secure prohibition, with the limitation that no legislation can give validity to acts prohibited by the Amendment. Each government in determining what shall be an offense against its peace and dignity is exercising its own sovereignty, not that of the other.

It follows that an act denounced as a crime by both national and state sovereignties is an offense against the peace and dignity of both and may be punished by each. The Fifth Amendment, like all the other guaranties in the first eight amendments, applies only to proceedings by the federal government, Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, and the double jeopardy therein forbidden is a second prosecution under authority of the federal government after a first trial for the same offense under the same authority. Here the same act was an offense against the State of Washington, because a violation of its law, and also an offense against the United States under the National Prohibition Act. The defendants thus committed two different offenses by the same act, and a conviction by a court of Washington of the offense against that state is not a conviction of a different offense against the United States and so is not double jeopardy. * * *

Counsel for defendants in error invokes the principle that, as between federal and state jurisdictions over the same prisoner, the one which first gets jurisdiction may first exhaust its jurisdiction to the exclusion of the other. Ponzi v. Fessenden, 258 U. S. 254. This is beside the point and has no application. The effect of the ruling of the court below was to exclude the United States from jurisdiction to punish the defendants after the state court had exhausted its jurisdiction and when there was no conflict of jurisdiction.

If Congress sees fit to bar prosecution by the federal courts for any act when punishment for violation of state prohibition has been imposed, it can, of course, do so by proper legislative provision; but it has not done so. If a state were to punish the manufacture, transportation and sale of intoxicating liquor by small or nominal fines, the race of offenders to the courts of that state to plead guilty and secure immunity from federal prosecution for such acts would not make for respect for the federal statute or for its deterrent effect. But it is not for us to discuss the wisdom of legislation, it is enough for us to hold that, in the absence of special provision by Congress, conviction and punishment in a state court under a state law for making, transporting and selling intoxicating liquors is not a bar to a prosecution in a court of the United States under the federal law for the same acts.

Judgment reversed with direction to sustain the demurrer to the special plea in bar of the defendants and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

NOTES

1. The guaranty of the Fifth Amendment that no person shall twice be put in jeopardy of life and limb for the same offense prevents an appeal from being taken by the government in a criminal prosecution in the federal courts, and a verdict of acquittal is therefore final. United States v. Sanges, 144 U. S. 310, 36 L. ed. 445, 12 Sup. Ct. 609 (1892); United States v. Ball, 163 U. S. 662, 41 L. ed. 300, 16 Sup. Ct. 1192 (1896).

2. A rule similar to the one applied in the Lanza case to double jeopardy applies also to the guaranty of the Fifth Amendment against compulsory self-incrimination. In United States v. Murdock, 284 U. S. 141, 76 L. ed. 210, 52 Sup. Ct. 63, 82 A. L. R. 1376 (1931) it was held that a federal immunity statute is valid even though it affords no protection against prosecution under state law. This view was reaffirmed in Feldman v. United States, 322 U. S. 487, 88 L. ed. 1408, 64 Sup. Ct. 1082, 154 A. L. R. 982 (1944), where it was held that the privilege is not violated by permitting the use in evidence against a defendant of testimony given by him in state proceedings in which he has been compelled to testify as to those matters. Justices Black, Douglas and Rutledge dissented. Also, a state immunity statute is valid though it cannot prevent prosecution under federal laws nor the use in such prosecution of evidence obtained in the state court. Jack v. Kansas, 199 U. S. 372, 50 L. ed. 234, 26 Sup. Ct. 73 (1905).

3. The Lanza decision is criticised in Grant, The Lanza Rule of Successive Prosecutions, 32 Col. L. Rev. 1309 (1932), 2 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 1375.

ERIE R. CO. v. TOMPKINS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1938.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question for decision is whether the oft-challenged doctrine of Swift v. Tyson shall now be disapproved.

Tompkins, a citizen of Pennsylvania, was injured on a dark night by a passing freight train of the Erie Railroad Company while walking along its right of way at Hughestown in that State. He claimed that the accident occurred through negligence in the operation, or maintenance, of the train; that he was rightfully on the premises as licensee because on a commonly used beaten footpath which ran for a short distance alongside the tracks; and that he was struck by something which looked like a door projecting from one of the moving cars. To enforce that claim he brought an action in the federal court for southern New York, which had jurisdiction because the company is a corporation of that State. It denied liability; and the case was tried by jury.

The Erie insisted that its duty to Tompkins was no greater than that owed to a trespasser. It contended, among other things, that its duty to Tompkins, and hence its liability, should be determined in accordance with the Pennsylvania law; that under the law of Pennsylvania, as declared by its highest court, persons who use pathways along the railroad right of way—that is a longitudinal pathway as distinguished from a crossing—are to be deemed trespassers; and that the railroad is not liable for injuries to undiscovered trespassers resulting from its negligence, unless it be wanton or wilful. Tompkins denied that any such rule had been established by the decisions of the Pennsylvania courts; and contended that, since there was no statute of the State on the subject, the railroad's duty and liability is to be determined in federal courts as a matter of general law.

The trial judge refused to rule that the applicable law precluded recovery. The jury brought in a verdict of $30,000; and the judgment entered thereon was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, which held, 90 F. 2d 603, 604, that it was unnecessary to consider whether the law of Pennsylvania was as contended, because the question was one not of local, but of general, law and that "upon questions of general law the federal courts are free, in the absence of a local statute, to exercise their independent judgment as to what the law is; and it is well settled that the question of the responsibility of a railroad for injuries caused by its servants is one of general law. * * * Where the public has made open and notorious use of a railroad right of way for a long period of time and without objection, the company owes to persons on such permissive pathway a duty of care in the operation of its trains. * * * It is likewise generally recognized law that a jury may find that negligence exists toward a pedestrian using a permissive path on the railroad right of way if he is hit by some object projecting from the side of the train."

The Erie had contended that application of the Pennsylvania rule was required, among other things, by § 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, c. 20, 28 U. S. C. § 725, which provides: "The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

Because of the importance of the question whether the federal court was free to disregard the alleged rule of the Pennsylvania common law, we granted certiorari.

First. Swift v. Tyson [1842], 16 Pet. 1, 18, held that federal courts exercising jurisdiction on the ground of diversity of citizenship need not, in matters of general jurisprudence, apply the unwritten law of the State as declared by its highest court; that they are free to exercise an independent judgment as to what the common law of the State is—or should be; and that, as there stated by Mr. Justice Story: “the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local, that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us, that the section did apply, or was intended to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case.”

The Court in applying the rule of § 34 to equity cases, in Mason v. United States, 260 U. S. 545, 559, said: “The statute, however, is merely declarative of the rule which would exist in the absence of the statute.” The federal courts assumed, in the broad field of “general law,” the power to declare rules of decision which Congress was confessedly without power to enact as statutes. Doubt was repeatedly expressed as to the correctness of the construction given § 34, and as to the soundness of the rule which it introduced. But it was the more recent research of a competent scholar, who examined the original document, which established that the construction given to it by the Court was erroneous; and that the purpose of the section was merely to make certain that, in all matters except those in which some federal law is controlling, the federal courts exercising jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases would apply as their rules of decision the law of the State, unwritten as well as written.

Criticism of the doctrine became widespread after the decision of Black & White Taxicab Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab Co., 276 U. S. 518. There, Brown and Yellow, a Kentucky corporation owned by Kentuckians, and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, also a Kentucky corporation, wished that the former should have the exclusive privilege of soliciting passenger and baggage transportation at the Bowling Green, Kentucky, railroad station; and that the Black and White, a competing Kentucky corporation, should be prevented from interfering with that privilege. Knowing that such a contract would be void under the common law of Kentucky, it was arranged that the Brown and Yellow re-incorporate under the law of Tennessee, and that the contract with the railroad should be executed there. The suit was then brought by the Tennessee corporation in the federal court for western Kentucky to enjoin competition by the Black and White; an injunction issued by the District Court was sustained by the Court of Appeals; and this Court, citing many decisions in which the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson had been applied, affirmed the decree.

Second. Experience in applying the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, had revealed its defects, political and social; and the benefits expected to flow from the rule did not accrue. Persistence of state courts in their own opinions on questions of common law prevented uniformity; and the impossibility of discovering a satisfactory line of demarcation between the province of general law and that of local law developed a new well of uncertainties.

On the other hand, the mischievous results of the doctrine had become apparent. Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction was conferred in order to prevent apprehended discrimination in state courts against those not citizens of the State. Swift v. Tyson introduced grave discrimination by non-citizens against citizens. It made rights enjoyed under the unwritten "general law" vary according to whether enforcement was sought in the state or in the federal court; and the privilege of selecting the court in which the right should be determined was conferred upon the non-citizen. Thus, the doctrine rendered impossible equal protection of the law. In attempting to promote uniformity of law throughout the United States, the doctrine had prevented uniformity in the administration of the law of the State.

The discrimination resulting became in practice far-reaching. This resulted in part from the broad province accorded to the so-called "general law" as to which federal courts exercised an independent judgment. In addition to questions of purely commercial law, "general law" was held to include the obligations under contracts entered into and to be performed within the State, the extent to which a carrier operating within a State may stipulate for exemption from liability for his own negligence or that of his employee; the liability for torts committed within the State upon persons resident or property located there, even where the question of liability depended upon the scope of a property right conferred by the State; and the right to exemplary or punitive damages. Furthermore, state decisions construing local deeds, mineral conveyances, and even devises of real estate were disregarded.

In part the discrimination resulted from the wide range of persons held entitled to avail themselves of the federal rule by resort to the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Through this jurisdiction individual citizens willing to remove from their own State and become citizens of another might avail themselves of the federal rule. And, without even change of residence, a corporate citizen of the State could avail itself of the federal rule by re-incorporating under the laws of another State, as was done in the Taxicab case.

The injustice and confusion incident to the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson have been repeatedly urged as reasons for abolishing or limiting diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Other legislative relief has been proposed. If only a question of statutory construction were involved, we should not be prepared to abandon a doctrine so widely applied throughout nearly a century. But the unconstitutionality of the course pursued has now been made clear and compels us to do so.

Third. Except in matters governed by the Federal Constitution or by Acts of Congress, the law to be applied in any case is the law of the State. And whether the law of the State shall be declared by its Legislature in a statute or by its highest court in a decision is not a matter of federal concern. There is no federal general common law. Congress has no power to declare substantive rules of common law applicable in a State whether they be local in their nature or "general," be they commercial law or a part of the law of torts. And no clause in the Constitution purports to confer such a power upon the federal courts. * * *

Thus the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson is, as Mr. Justice Holmes said, "an unconstitutional assumption of powers by courts of the United States which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct." In disapproving that doctrine we do not hold unconstitutional § 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789 or any other Act of Congress. We merely declare that in applying the doctrine this Court and the lower courts have invaded rights which in our opinion are reserved by the Constitution to the several States.

Fourth. The defendant contended that by the common law of Pennsylvania as declared by its highest court in Falchetti v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 307 Pa. 203; 160 A. 859, the only duty owed to the plaintiff was to refrain from wilful or wanton injury. The plaintiff denied that such is the Pennsylvania law. In support of their respective contentions the parties discussed and cited many decisions of the Supreme Court of the State. The Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the question of liability is one of general law; and on that ground declined to decide the issue of state law. As we hold this was error, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded to it for further proceedings in conformity with our opinion.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE REED.

I concur in the conclusion reached in this case, in the disapproval of the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, and in the reasoning of the majority opinion except in so far as it relies upon the unconstitutionality of the "course pursued" by the federal courts.

The "doctrine of Swift v. Tyson," as I understand it, is that the words "the laws," as used in § 34, line one, of the Federal Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, do not include in their meaning "the decisions of the local tribunals." Mr. Justice Story, in deciding that point, said (16 Pet. 19): "Undoubtedly, the decisions of the local tribunals upon such subjects are entitled to, and will receive, the most deliberate attention and respect of this Court; but they cannot furnish positive rules, or conclusive authority, by which our own judgments are to be bound up and governed."

To decide the case now before us and to "disapprove" the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson requires only that we say that the words "the laws" include in their meaning the decisions of the local tribunals. As the majority opinion shows, by its reference to Mr. Warren's researches and the first quotation from Mr. Justice Holmes, that this Court is now of the view that "laws" includes "decisions," it is unnecessary to go further and declare that the "course pursued" was "unconstitutional," instead of merely erroneous.

The "unconstitutional" course referred to in the majority opinion is apparently the ruling in Swift v. Tyson that the supposed omission of Congress to legislate as to the effect of decisions leaves federal courts free to interpret general law for themselves. I am not at all sure whether, in the absence of federal statutory direction, federal courts would be compelled to follow state decisions. There was sufficient doubt about the matter in 1789 to induce the first Congress to legislate. No former opinions of this Court have passed upon it. Mr. Justice Holmes evidently saw nothing "unconstitutional" which required the overruling of Swift v. Tyson, for he said in the very opinion quoted by the majority, "I should leave Swift v. Tyson undisturbed, as I indicated in Kuhn v. Fairmount Coal Co., but I would not allow it to spread the assumed dominion into new fields." Black & White Taxicab Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab Co., 276 U. S. 518, 535. If the opinion commits this Court to the position that the Congress is without power to declare what rules of substantive law shall govern the federal courts, that conclusion also seems questionable. The line between procedural and substantive law is hazy but no one doubts federal power over procedure. Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1. The Judiciary Article and the "necessary and proper" clause of Article One may fully authorize legislation, such as this section of the Judiciary Act.

In this Court, stare decisis, in statutory construction, is a useful rule, not an inexorable command. Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U. S. 393, dissent, p. 406, note 1. Compare Read v. Bishop of Lincoln, [1892] A. C. 644, 655; London Street Tramways Co. v. London County Council, [1898] A. C. 375, 379. It seems preferable to overturn an established construction of an Act of Congress, rather than, in the circumstances of this case, to interpret the Constitution. Cf. United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366. * * *

1. In the event a state court changes the construction of its law before final disposition of a case in the federal courts, the latter courts must change their construction to conform with that of the state court. Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U. S. 538, 85 L. ed. 327, 61 Sup. Ct. 347 (1941); Huddleston v. Dwyer, 322 U. S. 232, 88 L. ed. 1246, 64 Sup. Ct. 1015 (1944).

2. What is the state law which must be followed by the federal courts? Is the doctrine of Erie Railroad v. Tompkins limited to the decisions of the highest state courts? If not, must the federal courts follow any state decision, no matter how inferior the court or how ill-reasoned the decision? In West v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 311 U. S. 223, 237, 85 L. ed. 139, 61 Sup. Ct. 179, 132 A. L. R. 956 (1940) the court said: "Where an intermediate appellate court rests its considered judgment upon the rule of law it announces, that is a datum for ascertaining state law which is not to be disregarded by a federal court unless it is convinced by other persuasive data that the highest court of the state would decide otherwise."

Two other decisions handed down on the same day as the West case held that the opinions of intermediate state courts must be followed. In Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. Field, 311 U. S. 169, 85 L. ed. 109, 61 Sup. Ct. 176 (1940), the court held that a federal court had to follow decisions of the New Jersey court of chancery, a court having state-wide jurisdiction whose standing on the equity side was comparable to that of New Jersey's intermediate Appellate Courts on the law side. In Six Companies of California v. Joint Highway District 13 of California, 311 U. S. 180, 85 L. ed. 114, 61 Sup. Ct. 186 (1940) the court held that federal courts were bound to follow decisions of the district courts of appeal of California, and reversed a Circuit Court of Appeals decision which had failed to do so.

In King v. Order of United Commercial Travelers of America, 333 U. S. 153, 92 L. ed. 608, 68 Sup. Ct. 488 (1948) the court held that a federal court was not obliged to give effect to a decision of a South Carolina court of common pleas, a trial court for civil cases, which was the only state decision in point at the time. The court distinguished Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. Field. It further pointed out that its decision was not to be taken as promulgating a general rule that federal courts need never abide by determinations of state law by state trial courts.

3. In Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 326 U. S. 99, 89 L. ed. 2079, 65 Sup. Ct. 1464, 160 A. L. R. 1231 (1945), in holding that the New York statute of limitations applied in an equitable proceeding in a federal court, where jurisdiction of the court rested upon diversity of citizenship, the Supreme Court said of the Erie case: "In essence, the intent of that decision was to insure that, in all cases where a federal court is exercising jurisdiction solely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties, the outcome of the litigation in the federal court should be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine the outcome of a litigation, as it would be if tried in a state court." Is it not clear, however, that the rule of the Erie case should apply not only in diversity of citizenship cases, and other cases where the jurisdiction of the federal court exists solely because of the character of the parties, but also to cases where the federal court has jurisdiction because of a federal question but there is also an issue of state law in the case? Whenever the law of a state is the proper law governing any issue in a federal court, the reasoning of the Erie case would seem to make it the duty of the federal court to follow the decisions of the courts of that state.

This has been the rule of the Supreme Court in cases that start in state courts and come to the Supreme Court by appeal.

4. Note the present revised version (28 U. S. C. § 1652; F. C. A. 28 § 1652) of the Rules of Decision Act: "The laws of the several states, except where the Constitution or treaties of the United States or Acts of Congress otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in civil actions in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

5. Congress having adopted the policy of opening the federal courts to suitors in all diversity cases involving the jurisdictional amount, federal courts are not freed from the duty of deciding questions of state law in cases properly before them for decision merely because the law is undetermined or uncertain. Meredith v. Winter Haven, 320 U. S. 228, 88 L. ed. 9, 64 Sup. Ct. 7 (1943).

TERRAL v. BURKE CONSTRUCTION CO.

[An Arkansas statute provided for the revocation of a corporation's authority to carry on business in the state if the corporation removed to the federal courts any suit brought against it in the state courts, or instituted any suit against a citizen of the State in the federal courts. The Burke Construction Company, a Missouri corporation doing business in Arkansas, was granted an injunction against the revocation of its license by a United States District Court for the eastern district of Arkansas.]

This is an appeal from the District Court under section 238 of the Judicial Code in a case in which the law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. * * *

The sole question presented on the record is whether a state law is unconstitutional which revokes a license to a foreign corporation to do business within the state because, while doing only a domestic business in the state, it resorts to the federal court sitting in the state.

The cases in this court in which the conflict between the power of a state to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its borders, and the federal constitutional right of such foreign corporation to resort to the federal courts, has been considered, cannot be reconciled. They began with Insurance Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, which was followed by Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 535; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186; Southern Pacific Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202; Martin v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 151 U. S. 673, 684; Barrow Steamship Co. v. Kane, 170 U. S. 100, 111; Security Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U. S. 246; Herndon v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pac. Ry. Co., 218 U. S. 135; Harrison v. St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. Co., 232 U. S. 318, and Donald v. Philadelphia & Reading Coal Co., 241 U. S. 329.

The principle established by the more recent decisions of this court is that a state may not, in imposing conditions upon the privilege of a foreign corporation's doing business in the state, exact from it a waiver of the exercise of its constitutional right to resort to the federal courts, or thereafter withdraw the privilege of doing business because of its exercise of such right, whether waived in advance or not. The principle does not depend for its application on the character of the business the corporation does, whether state or interstate, although that has been suggested as a distinction in some cases. It rests on the ground that the federal Constitution confers upon citizens of one state the right to resort to federal courts in another, that state action, whether legislative or executive, necessarily calculated to curtail the free exercise of the right thus secured is void because the sovereign power of a state in excluding foreign corporations, as in the exercise of all others of its sovereign powers, is subject to the limitations of the supreme fundamental law. It follows that the cases of Doyle v. Continental Insurance Co., 94 U. S. 535, and Security Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U. S. 246, must be considered as overruled and that the views of the minority judges in those cases have become the law of this court. The appellant in proposing to comply with the statute in question and revoke the license was about to violate the constitutional right of the appellee. In enjoining him the District Court was right, and its decree is Affirmed.

NOTES

1. The shift to a new point of view, of which the above decision is one of the results, began in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 54 L. ed. 355, 30 Sup. Ct. 190 (1910). There a foreign telegraph company had been permitted to enter the state without condition and had established extensive lines and numerous offices for both intrastate and interstate business. Many years later the state attempted to subject it to payment of a tax as a condition to its being permitted to continue to engage in intrastate business in the state. In holding that the state could not oust the corporation from its intrastate business for nonpayment of this tax, the court said that the tax was of a kind that both the commerce clause and the due process clause forbade the state to levy, and that the state could not use its power to impose conditions as a method of exacting payment of such a tax from a foreign corporation. Mr. Justice Harlan, for the court, said that the state could not require of the company that it should "surrender rights belonging to it under the Constitution of the United States secured by that instrument against hostile state action" and that any such condition was "unconstitutional and void." Mr. Justice Holmes, whose dissent was concurred in by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller and Mr. Justice McKenna, said: "I confess my inability to understand how a condition can be unconstitutional when attached to a matter over which a state has absolute arbitrary power. * * * I am aware that the battle has raged with varying fortunes over this matter of unconstitutional conditions, but it appears to me ground for regret that the court so soon should abandon its latest decision, Security Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U. S. 246. * * *

Section 3.—Interstate Privileges and Immunities of State Citizens.

CORFIELD v. CORYELL.

Circuit Court of the United States, 1825.

4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230.

This was an action of trespass for seizing * * * a certain vessel, the property of the plaintiff. [The defendant justified by showing seizure in accordance with a statute of New Jersey, as follows:—"it shall not be lawful for any person who is not at the time an actual inhabitant and resident in this state, to rake or gather clams, oysters, or shells, in any of the rivers, bays or waters in this state, on board of any * * * vessel, not wholly owned by some person, inhabitant of and actually residing in this state," under penalty of $10 fine and forfeiture of the vessel. The plaintiff pleaded the invalidity of this statute under Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1 of the Constitution of the United States.]

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The next question is, whether this act infringes that section of the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states"? The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have, at all times, been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which compose this Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are, it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through, or to reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the state; to take, hold and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the state; may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental; to which may be added, the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or Constitution of the state in which it is to be exercised. These, and many others which might be mentioned, are, strictly speaking, privileges and immunities, and the enjoyment of them by the citizens of each state, in every other state, was manifestly calculated (to use the expressions of the preamble of the corresponding provision in the old Articles of Confederation) "the better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states of the Union."

But we cannot accede to the proposition which was insisted on by the counsel, that, under this provision of the Constitution, the citizens of the several states are permitted to participate in all the rights which belong exclusively to the citizens of any other particular state, merely upon the ground that they are enjoyed by those citizens; much less, that in regulating the use of the common property of the citizens of such state, the legislature is bound to extend to the citizens of all the other states the same advantages as are secured to their own citizens. A several fishery, either as the right to it respects running fish, or such as are stationary, such as oysters, clams, and the like, is as much the property of the individual to whom it belongs, as dry land, or land covered by water; and is equally protected by the laws of the state against the aggressions of others, whether citizens or strangers. Where those private rights do not exist to the exclusion of the common right, that of fishing belongs to all the citizens or subjects of the state. It is the property of all; to be enjoyed by them in subordination to the laws which regulate its use. They may be considered as tenants in common of this property; and they are so exclusively entitled to the use of it, that it cannot be enjoyed by others without the tacit consent, or the express permission of the sovereign who has the power to regulate its use. * * *

Judgment for the defendant.

NOTES

1. In accord with the principal case is McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. ed. 248 (1877), holding that the planting of oysters in tidal waters within the state might be confined to citizens of the state. In Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 40 L. ed. 793, 16 Sup. Ct. 600 (1896) a state statute was sustained which forbade the killing of wild game for transportation beyond the state. And in Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 349, 52 L. ed. 828, 28 Sup. Ct. 529, 14 Ann. Cas. 560 (1908) it was held that a state may forbid the drawing off of water from lakes or rivers wholly within the state to supply inhabitants of other states.

Considerable doubt has been cast recently upon the continued validity of the theory exemplified by the above decisions that the state holds certain common property in trust for its own citizens and therefore may deny access to all others. In Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U. S. 385, 92 L. ed. 1460, 68 Sup. Ct. 1157 (1948) the Supreme Court held that South Carolina may not, consistently with the interstate privileges and immunities clause, impose discriminatory license fees upon citizens of another state for the privilege of commercial shrimp fishing in the three-mile maritime belt off the South Carolina coast. The court said, through Mr. Chief Justice Vinson: "However satisfactorily the ownership theory explains the McCready case, the very factors which make the present case distinguishable render that theory but a weak prop for the South Carolina statute. * * * The whole ownership theory, in fact, is now generally regarded as but a fiction expressive in legal shorthand of the importance to its people that a state have power to preserve and regulate the exploitation of an important resource. And there is no necessary conflict between that vital policy consideration and the constitutional command that the state exercise that power, like its other powers, so as not to discriminate without reason against citizens of other states. These considerations lead us to the conclusion that the McCready exception to the privileges and immunities clause, if such it be, should not be expanded to cover this case." Justices Frankfurter and Jackson thought that the majority opinion had misapplied the privileges and immunities clause.

2. In United States v. Wheeler, 254 U. S. 281, 65 L. ed. 270, 41 Sup. Ct. 133 (1920), a judgment of a lower federal court was affirmed which had quashed an indictment against twenty-five defendants accused of conspiring, in violation of a federal statute, "to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate" certain citizens of the United States residing in Arizona of rights and privileges secured to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States, i. e., the right to reside therein and to be immune from unlawful deportation from that state to another. Defendants were alleged to have kidnapped these persons and removed them from Arizona to New Mexico.

The court, through Mr. Chief Justice White, said: "Undoubtedly the right of citizens of the states to reside peacefully in, and to have free ingress into and egress from, the several states had, prior to the Confederation, a two-fold aspect: (1) as possessed in their own states and (2) as enjoyed in virtue of the comity of other states. But although the Constitution fused these distinct rights into one by providing that one state should not deny the citizens of other states rights given to its own citizens, no basis is afforded for contending that a wrongful prevention by an individual of the enjoyment by a citizen of one state in another of rights possessed in that state by its own citizens was a violation of a right afforded by the Constitution. This is the necessary result of Article IV, section 2, which reserves to the several states authority over the subject, limited by the restriction against state discriminatory action, hence excluding federal authority except where invoked to enforce the limitation, which is not here the case; a conclusion expressly sustained by the ruling in United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629, 645, to the effect that the second section of Article IV, like the Fourteenth Amendment, is directed alone against state action."

PAUL v. VIRGINIA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1869.

8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357.

Error to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia.

[A Virginia statute required all insurance companies incorporated under any but its own laws to deposit with the treasurer of the state a large stated amount of bonds before doing business in the state and provided that no agent of any foreign insurance company should be licensed to represent it in the state unless such deposit were made. Any person acting as such agent without license was declared subject to a fine. Paul as agent for several New York insurance companies which had refused to make such deposits was refused a license but nevertheless undertook to act as agent for these companies in Virginia and issued a policy in Virginia on behalf of one of them to a citizen of Virginia. For this he was indicted and convicted. From an affirmance of this conviction he took this writ of error.]

MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the Court.

The corporators of the several insurance companies were at the time, and still are, citizens of New York, or of some one of the states of the Union other than Virginia. And the business of insurance was then, and still is a lawful business in Virginia, and might then, and still may, be carried on by all resident citizens of the state, and by insurance companies incorporated by the state, without a deposit of bonds, or a deposit of any kind with any officer of the commonwealth.

On the trial in the court below the validity of the discriminating provisions of the statute of Virginia between her own corporations and corporations of other States was assailed. It was contended that the statute in this particular was in conflict with that clause of the Constitution [Art. IV, § 2] which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," and the clause which declares that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." The same grounds are urged in this court for the reversal of the judgment.

The answer which readily occurs to the objection founded upon the first clause consists in the fact that corporations are not citizens within its meaning. The term "citizens" as there used applies only to natural persons, members of the body politic, owing allegiance to the State, not to artificial persons created by the legislature, and possessing only the attributes which the legislature has prescribed. It is true that it has been held that where contracts or rights of property are to be enforced by or against corporations, the courts of the United States will, for the purpose of maintaining jurisdiction, consider the corporation as representing citizens of the State under the laws of which it is created, and to this extent will treat a corporation as a citizen within the clause of the Constitution extending the judicial power of the United States to controversies between citizens of different States. * * *

But in no case which has come under our observation, either in the state or federal courts, has a corporation been considered a citizen within the meaning of that provision of the Constitution which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States. * * *

It was undoubtedly the object of the clause in question to place the citizens of each State upon the same footing with citizens of other States, so far as the advantages resulting from citizenship in those States are concerned. It relieves them from the disabilities of alienage in other States; it inhibits discriminating legislation against them by other States; it gives them the right of free ingress into other States, and egress from them; it insures to them in other States the same freedom possessed by the citizens of those States in the acquisition and enjoyment of property, and in the pursuit of happiness; and it secures to them in other States the equal protection of their laws. It has been justly said that no provision in the Constitution has tended so strongly to constitute the citizens of the United States one people as this. Lemmon v. People, 20 N. Y. 607.

Indeed, without some provision of the kind, removing from the citizens of each State the disabilities of alienage in the other States, and giving them equality of privilege with citizens of those States, the republic would have constituted little more than a league of States; it would not have constituted the Union which now exists.

But the privileges and immunities secured to citizens of each state in the several states, by the provision in question, are those privileges and immunities which are common to the citizens in the latter states under their constitution and laws by virtue of their being citizens. Special privileges enjoyed by citizens in their own states are not secured in other states by this provision. It was not intended by the provision to give to the laws of one state any operation in other states. They can have no such operation, except by the permission, express or implied, of those states. The special privileges which they confer must, therefore, be enjoyed at home, unless the assent of other states to their enjoyment therein be given.

Now, a grant of corporate existence is a grant of special privileges to the corporators, enabling them to act for certain designated purposes as a single individual, and exempting them (unless otherwise specially provided) from individual liability. The corporation being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. As said by this court in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters 519, "It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty." The recognition of its existence even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those states—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other states, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those states may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely; they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion.

If, on the other hand, the provision of the Constitution could be construed to secure to citizens of each state in other states the peculiar privileges conferred by their laws, an extra-territorial operation would be given to local legislation utterly destructive of the independence and the harmony of the states. At the present day corporations are multiplied to an almost indefinite extent. There is scarcely a business pursued requiring the expenditure of large capital, or the union of large numbers, that is not carried on by corporations. It is not too much to say that the wealth and business of the country are to a great extent controlled by them. And if, when composed of citizens of one state, their corporate powers and franchises could be exercised in other states without restriction, it is easy to see that, with the advantages thus possessed, the most important business of those states would soon pass into their hands. The principal business of every state would, in fact, be controlled by corporations created by other states.

If the right asserted of the foreign corporation, when composed of citizens of one state, to transact business in other states were even restricted to such business as corporations of those states were authorized to transact, it would still follow that those states would be unable to limit the number of corporations doing business therein. They could not charter a company for any purpose, however restricted, without at once opening the door to a flood of corporations from other states to engage in the same pursuits. They could not repel an intruding corporation, except on the condition of refusing incorporation for a similar purpose to their own citizens; and yet it might be of the highest public interest that the number of corporations in the state should be limited, that they should be required to give publicity to their transactions, to submit their affairs to proper examination, to be subject to forfeiture of their corporate rights in case of mismanagement, and that their officers should be held to a strict accountability for the manner in which the business of the corporations is managed and be liable to summary removal.

"It is impossible," to repeat the language of this court, in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, "upon any sound principle, to give such a construction to the article in question,"—a construction which would lead to results like these.

We proceed to the second objection urged to the validity of the Virginia statute, which is founded upon the commercial clause of the Constitution. * * * Issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce. * * *

We perceive nothing in the statute of Virginia which conflicts with the Constitution of the United States, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeals of that state must, therefore, be Affirmed.

NOTES

1. While a corporation is not a citizen under the interstate privileges and immunities clause, for jurisdictional purposes under Article III of the Constitution it is treated as a citizen of the state of its incorporation, thus bringing suits between it and the citizens of another state within the scope of the federal judicial power. This result has been accomplished by conclusively presuming that the members of a corporation are citizens of the state of its incorporation. Bank of United States v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch 61, 3 L. ed. 38 (1809); Louisville, C. & C. R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. 497, 11 L. ed. 353 (1844); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. James, 161 U. S. 545, 40 L. ed. 802, 16 Sup. 2. With respect to the holding in the principal case that "issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce" it should be noted that in United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U. S. 533, 88 L. ed. 1440, 64 Sup. Ct. 1162 (1944) the Supreme Court reclassified the business of insurance as one coming within the regulatory power of Congress under the commerce clause and within the coverage of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

3. A business trust organized under the laws of a state and treated as an entity similar to a corporation by such state is not a citizen within the meaning of the interstate privileges and immunities clause. Hemphill v. Orloff, 277 U. S. 537, 72 L. ed. 978, 48 Sup. Ct. 577 (1928).

BLAKE v. McCLUNG.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1898.

172 U. S. 239, 43 L. ed. 432, 19 Sup. Ct. 165.

[On writ of error to the Supreme Court of Tennessee. The Embreeville Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for mining and manufacturing purposes complied in 1890 with the requirements of the statutes of Tennessee for doing business in that state and engaged in business therein. In 1893 McClung and other creditors, citizens of Tennessee, applied to a Tennessee court to appoint a receiver of the corporation's property in Tennessee, the corporation being insolvent. Other creditors intervened, among them Blake, a resident of and citizen of Ohio, the firm of Rogers, Brown & Company, the members of which were also residents of and citizens of Ohio, and the Hull Coal and Coke Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Virginia. There also were creditors who were residents of Great Britain. A Tennessee statute provided that the property of foreign mining and manufacturing corporations admitted to do business in the state should be liable for their debts and that "creditors who may be residents of this state shall have a priority in the distribution of assets, or subjection of the same, or any part thereof, to the payment of debts over all simple contract creditors, being residents of any other country or countries." On issues involving priority among the creditors the case went on appeal to the Supreme Court of Tennessee which partly modifying the decree below decreed that all the creditors "who resided in the State of Tennessee" were entitled to priority over all of the other creditors whether residents of other states of the United States or of the Kingdom of Great Britain.]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The suggestion is made that, as the statute refers only to "residents," there is no occasion to consider whether it is repugnant to the provision of the national Constitution relating to citizens. We cannot accede to this view. * * * Looking at the purpose and scope of the Tennessee statute, it is plain that the words "residents of this state" refer to those whose residence in Tennessee was such as indicated that their permanent home or habitation was there, without any present intention of removing therefrom, and having the intention, when absent from that state, to return thereto,—such residence as ascertained to or inhered in citizenship. And the words, in the same statute, "residents of any other country or countries," refer to those whose respective habitations were not in Tennessee, but who were citizens, not simply residents, of some other state or country. It is impossible to believe that the statute was intended to apply to creditors of whom it could be said that they were only residents of other states, but not to creditors who were citizens of such states. The state did not intend to place creditors, citizens of other states, upon an equality with creditors, citizens of Tennessee, and to give priority only to Tennessee creditors over creditors who resided in, but were not citizens of, other states. The manifest purpose was to give to all Tennessee creditors priority over all creditors residing out of that state, whether the latter were citizens or only residents of some other state or country. Any other interpretation of the statute would defeat the object for which it was enacted. * * *

Beyond question, a state may, through judicial proceedings, take possession of the assets of an insolvent foreign corporation within its limits, and distribute such assets or their proceeds among creditors according to their respective rights. But may it exclude citizens of other states from such distribution until the claims of its own citizens shall have been first satisfied? In the administration of the property of an insolvent foreign corporation by the courts of the state in which it is doing business, will the Constitution of the United States permit discrimination against individual creditors of such corporation because of their being citizens of other states, and not citizens of the state in which such administration occurs? * * *

This court has never undertaken to give any exact or comprehensive definition of the words "privileges and immunities," in Article IV of the Constitution of the United States. Referring to this clause, Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for the Court in Conner v. Elliot, 18 How. 591, 593, said: "We do not deem it needful to attempt to define the meaning of the word 'privileges' in this clause of the Constitution. It is safer, and more in accordance with the duty of a judicial tribunal, to leave its meaning to be determined, in each case, upon a view of the particular rights asserted and denied therein. And especially is this true when we are dealing with so broad a provision, involving matters not only of great delicacy and importance, but which are of such a character that any merely abstract definition could scarcely be correct; and a failure to make it so would certainly produce mischief." * * *

By the statute in question the British company was to be deemed and taken to be a corporation of Tennessee, with authority to carry on its business in that state. It was the right of citizens of Tennessee to deal with it, as it was their right to deal with corporations created by Tennessee. And it was equally the right of citizens of other states to deal with that corporation. The state did not assume to declare, even if it could legally have declared, that that company, being admitted to do business in Tennessee, should transact business only with citizens of Tennessee, or should not transact business with citizens of other states. No one would question the right of the individual plaintiffs in error, although not residents of Tennessee, to sell their goods to that corporation upon such terms in respect of payment as might be agreed upon, and to ship them to the corporation at its place of business in that state.

But the enjoyment of these rights is materially obstructed by the statute in question; for that statute, by its necessary operation, excludes citizens of other states from transacting business with that corporation upon terms of equality with citizens of Tennessee. By force of the statute alone, citizens of other states, if they contracted at all with the British corporation, must have done so subject to the onerous condition that, if the corporation became insolvent, its assets in Tennessee should first be applied to meet its obligations to residents of that state, although liability for its debts and engagements was "to be enforced in the manner provided by law for the application of the property of natural persons to the payment of their debts, engagements, and contracts." But, clearly, the state could not in that mode secure exclusive privileges to its own citizens in matters of business. If a state should attempt, by statute regulating the distribution of the property of insolvent individuals among their creditors, to give priority to the claims of such individual creditors as were citizens of that state over the claims of individual creditors citizens of other states, such legislation would be repugnant to the Constitution, upon the ground that it withheld from citizens of other states, as such, and because they were such, privileges granted to citizens of the state enacting it. Can a different principle apply, as between individual citizens of the several states, when the assets to be distributed are the assets of an insolvent private corporation lawfully engaged in business, and having the power to contract with citizens residing in states other than the one in which it is located? * * *

We hold such discrimination against citizens of other states to be repugnant to the second section of the Fourth Article of the Constitution of the United States, although, generally speaking, the state has the power to prescribe the conditions upon which foreign corporations may enter its territory for purposes of business. Such a power cannot be exerted with the effect of defeating or impairing rights secured to citizens of the several states by the supreme law of the land. Indeed, all the powers possessed by a state must be exercised consistently with the privileges and immunities granted or protected by the Constitution of the United States. * * *

We must not be understood as saying that a citizen of one state is entitled to enjoy in another state every privilege that may be given in the latter to its own citizens. There are privileges that may be accorded by a state to its own people in which citizens of other states may not participate except in conformity to such reasonable regulations as may be established by the state. For instance, a state cannot forbid citizens of other states from suing in its courts, that right being enjoyed by its own people; but it may require a nonresident, although a citizen of another state, to give bond for costs, although such bond be not required of a resident. Such a regulation of the internal affairs of a state cannot reasonably be characterized as hostile to the fundamental rights of citizens of other states. So, a state may, by rule uniform in its operation as to citizens of the several states, require residence within its limits for a given time before a citizen of another state, who becomes a resident thereof, shall exercise the right of suffrage or become eligible to office. It has never been supposed that regulations of that character materially interfered with the enjoyment by citizens of each state of the privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution to citizens of the several states. The Constitution forbids only such legislation affecting citizens of the respective states as will substantially or practically put a citizen of one state in a condition of alienage when he is within or when he removes to another state, or when asserting in another state the rights that commonly appertain to those who are part of the political community known as the People of the United States, by and for whom the government of the Union was ordained and established. * * *

It may be appropriate to observe that the objections to the statute of Tennessee do not necessarily embrace enactments that are found in some of the states requiring foreign insurance corporations, as a condition of their coming into the state for purposes of business, to deposit with the state treasurer funds sufficient to secure policy holders in its midst. Legislation of that character does not present any question of discrimination against citizens forbidden by the Constitution. Insurance funds set apart in advance for the benefit of home policy holders of a foreign insurance company doing business in the state are a trust fund of a specific kind, to be administered for the exclusive benefit of certain persons. Policy holders in other states know that those particular funds are segregated from the mass of property owned by the company, and that they cannot look to them to the prejudice of those for whose special benefit they were deposited. The present case is not one of that kind. The statute of Tennessee did not make it a condition of the right of the British corporation to come into Tennessee for purposes of business that it should, at the outset, deposit with the state a fixed amount, to stand exclusively or primarily for the protection of its Tennessee creditors. * * *

We adjudge that when the general property and assets of a private corporation lawfully doing business in a state are in course of administration by the courts of such state, creditors who are citizens of other states are entitled, under the Constitution of the United States, to stand upon the same plane with creditors of like class who are citizens of such state, and cannot be denied equality of right simply because they do not reside in that state, but are citizens residing in other states of the Union. The individual plaintiffs in error were entitled to contract with this British corporation, lawfully doing business in Tennessee, and deemed and taken to be a corporation of that state; and no rule in the distribution of its assets among creditors could be applied to them as resident citizens of Ohio, and because they were not residents of Tennessee, that was not applied by the courts of Tennessee to creditors of like character who were citizens of Tennessee. * * *

[The Court held that the decree below was not invalid in so far as it adversely affected the Hull Coal and Coke Company, a Virginia corporation.]

MR. JUSTICE BREWER, with whom MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER concurred, dissenting. * * * Neither the statute, the pleadings nor the decree [below] raise any question of citizenship, or give any priority of right to the citizens of Tennessee over citizens of other states, but only discriminate between residents, and give residents of the state a priority. * * * It is not necessary in this Court to refer to the difference between residence and citizenship. Neither is synonymous with the other, and neither includes the other. A British subject or a citizen of Ohio may be a resident of Tennessee, and entitled to the benefit of this statute. A citizen of Tennessee may, like these plaintiffs in error, be a resident of and doing business in Ohio and not entitled to its benefit. It will be time enough to consider the question discussed in the opinion when it appears that a state has attempted to discriminate between its own citizens and citizens of other states, and the courts of the state have affirmed the validity of such discrimination. * * *

NOTE

1. As the principal case indicates, although the interstate privileges and immunities clause refers specifically to "citizens," the Supreme Court has frequently invalidated statutory discriminations against "nonresidents" on the ground that their practical effect is to deny equal privileges to citizens of other states. Thus, in holding that New York could not collect income taxes from "nonresidents" which were assessed under a state statute allowing them lesser exemptions than it allowed residents in otherwise like circumstances, the court said: "Of course the terms 'resident' and 'citizen' are not synonymous, and in some cases the distinction is important (La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465, 470); but a general taxing scheme such as the one under consideration, if it discriminates against all nonresidents, has the necessary effect of including in the discrimination those who are citizens of other states; and, if there be no reasonable ground for the diversity of treatment, it abridges the privileges and immunities to which such citizens are entitled." Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 252 U. S. 60, 78-79, 64 L. ed. 460, 40 Sup. Ct. 228 (1920).

In Chalker v. Birmingham & N. W. R. Co., 249 U. S. 522, 63 L. ed. 748, 39 Sup. Ct. 366 (1919), the court held invalid a Tennessee occupation tax which provided for a $100 tax on foreign construction companies (including partnerships and individuals) doing business in the state, while having their chief offices outside the state, and a $25 tax on domestic construction companies having their chief offices in the state. The court said: "As the chief office of an individual is commonly in the state of which he is a citizen, Tennessee citizens engaged in constructing railroads in that state will ordinarily have their chief offices therein, while citizens of other states so engaged will not. Practically, therefore, the statute under consideration would produce discrimination against citizens of other states by imposing higher charges against them than citizens of Tennessee are required to pay. We can find no adequate basis for taxing individuals according to the location of their chief office—the classification, we think, is arbitrary and unreasonable. Under the federal Constitution a citizen of one state is guaranteed the right to enjoy in all other states equality of commercial privileges with their citizens; but he cannot have his chief office in every one of them."

DOUGLAS v. NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1929.
279 U. S. 377, 73 L. ed. 747, 49 Sup. Ct. 355.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a suit under the Employers' Liability Act for personal injuries. The injuries were inflicted in Connecticut, the plaintiff, the petitioner, is a citizen and resident of Connecticut, and the defendant, the respondent, is a Connecticut corporation, although doing business in New York where the suit was brought. Upon motion the trial court dismissed the action, assuming that the statutes of the State gave it a discretion in the matter, and its action was affirmed by the Appellate Division, 223 App. Div. 782, and by the Court of Appeals, 248 N. Y. 580. Thus it is established that the statute purports to give to the court the power that it exercised. But the plaintiff says that the Act as construed is void under Article IV, Section 2, of the Constitution of the United States: "The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States." A subordinate argument is added that the jurisdiction is imposed by the Employers' Liability Act when as here the Court has authority to entertain the suit.

U. S. C., Title 45, § 56. Acts of April 22, 1908, c. 149, § 6, 35 Stat. 66, April 5, 1910, c. 143, § 1, 36 Stat. 291. That section gives concurrent jurisdiction to the courts of the United States and the States and forbids removal if the suit is brought in a State court.

The language of the New York statute, Laws of 1913, c. 60, amending § 1780 of the Code of Civil Procedure is: "An action against a foreign corporation may be maintained by another foreign corporation, or by a nonresident, in one of the following cases only; * * * 4. When a foreign corporation is doing business within this State." Laws of 1920, c. 916, § 47. The argument for the petitioner is that, construed as it is, it makes a discrimination between citizens of New York and citizens of other States, because it authorizes the court in its discretion to dismiss an action by a citizen of another State but not an action brought by a citizen of New York, which last it cannot do. Gregonis v. Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., 235 N. Y. 152. It is said that a citizen of New York is a resident of New York wherever he may be living in fact, and thus that all citizens of New York can bring these actions, whereas citizens of other States cannot unless they are actually living in the State. But however often the word "resident" may have been used as equivalent to citizen, and for whatever purposes residence may have been assumed to follow citizenship, there is nothing to prohibit the legislature from using "resident" in the strict primary sense of one actually living in the place for the time, irrespective even of domicile. If that word in this statute must be so construed in order to uphold the act or even to avoid serious doubts of its constitutionality, we presume that the courts of New York would construe it in that way; as indeed the Supreme Court has done already in so many words. Adams v. Penn Bank of Pittsburgh, 35 Hun. 393. Duquesne Club v. Penn Bank of Pittsburgh, 35 Hun. 390. Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Co., 112 N. Y. 315, 324. Klotz v. Angle, 220 N. Y. 347, 358. See Canadian Northern Ry. Co. v. Eggen, 252 U. S. 553, 562, 563. The same meaning seems to be assumed in Gregonis v. Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., 235 N. Y. 152. We cannot presume, against this evidence and in order to overthrow a statute, that the courts of New York would adopt a different rule from that which is well settled here. Panama R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 390.

Construed as it has been, and we believe will be construed, the statute applies to citizens of New York as well as to others and puts them on the same footing. There is no discrimination between citizens as such, and none between non-residents with regard to these foreign causes of action. A distinction of privileges according to residence may be based upon rational considerations and has been upheld by this Court, emphasizing the difference between citizenship and residence, in La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465. Followed in Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S. 525, 539. It is true that in Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 247, "residents" was taken to mean citizens in a Tennessee statute of a wholly different scope, but whatever else may be said of the argument in that opinion (compare p. 262, ibid.) it cannot prevail over the later decision in La Tourette v. McMaster, and the plain intimations of the New York cases to which we have referred. There are manifest reasons for preferring residents in access to often overcrowded courts, both in convenience and in the fact that broadly speaking it is they who pay for maintaining the courts concerned.

As to the grant of jurisdiction in the Employers' Liability Act, that statute does not purport to require State courts to entertain suits arising under it, but only to empower them to do so, so far as the authority of the United States is concerned. It may very well be that if the Supreme Court of New York were given no discretion, being otherwise competent, it would be subject to a duty. But there is nothing in the Act of Congress that purports to force a duty upon such courts as against an otherwise valid excuse. Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 56, 57.

Judgment affirmed.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER and MR. JUSTICE BUTLER dissent.

NOTE

1. In some cases statutes have been upheld which in terms discriminate between "residents" and "nonresidents" on the ground that the word "resident" as thus used in the statute does not mean permanent resident and that, since in the favored class there may be some citizens of other states who are temporarily "residing" in the state and in the disfavored class some citizens of the state temporarily "residing" out of the state, the statute does not discriminate between citizens of the state and citizens of other states. In other words, it is permissible to place "residents" and "nonresidents" into different categories if the term "resident" as used in the statute is not construed to mean "citizen." Thus, in La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465, 63 L. ed. 362, 39 Sup. Ct. 160 (1919), which involved the validity of a South Carolina statute which discriminated between "residents" and "nonresidents" in granting licenses to act as insurance brokers in the state, the Supreme Court of the United States accepted an interpretation of the above sort put upon the statute by the Supreme Court of South Carolina and concluded that, as so interpreted, the statute did not discriminate between citizens of the state and citizens of other states.

CANADIAN NORTHERN R. CO. v. EGGEN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920.

252 U. S. 553, 64 L. ed. 713, 40 Sup. Ct. 402.

MR. JUSTICE CLARKE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The only question presented for decision in this case is as to the validity of § 7709 of the statutes of Minnesota (General Statutes of Minnesota, 1913), which reads:

"When a cause of action has arisen outside of this state and, by the laws of the place where it arose, an action thereon is there barred by lapse of time, no such action shall be maintained in this state unless the plaintiff be a citizen of the state who has owned the cause of action ever since it accrued."

The Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the District Court, held this statute invalid for the reason that the exemption in favor of citizens of Minnesota rendered it repugnant to Article IV, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

The action was commenced in the District Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota, Second Division, by the respondent, a citizen of South Dakota, against the petitioner, a corporation organized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him on November 29, 1913, when employed by the petitioner as a switchman in its yards at Humboldt, in the Province of Saskatchewan. The respondent, a citizen and resident of South Dakota, went to Canada and entered the employ of the petitioner as a switchman a short time prior to the accident complained of. He remained in Canada for six months after the accident and then returned to live in South Dakota. He commenced this action on October 15, 1915, almost two years after the date of the accident. By the laws of Canada, where the cause of action arose, an action of this kind must be commenced within one year from the time injury was sustained. If the statute of Minnesota, above quoted is valid, it is applicable to the action, which, being barred in Canada, cannot be maintained in Minnesota by a nonresident plaintiff. If, however, the statute is invalid, the general statute of limitations of Minnesota, allowing a period of six years within which to commence action, would be applicable. The record properly presents the claim of the petitioner that the Circuit Court of Appeals erred in holding the statute involved unconstitutional and void.

It is plain that the act assailed was not enacted for the purpose of creating an arbitrary or vexatious discrimination against nonresidents of Minnesota. * * *

It is only when the foreign limitation is shorter than that of Minnesota, and when the nonresident who owns the cause of action from the time when it arose has slept on his rights until it is barred in the foreign state (which happens to be the respondent's case), that inequality results—and for this we are asked to declare a statute unconstitutional which has been in force for sixty years.

This Court has never attempted to formulate a comprehensive list of the rights included within the "privileges and immunities" clause of the Constitution, Art. IV, Sec. 2, but it has repeatedly approved as authoritative the statement by Mr. Justice Washington, in 1823, in Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, 380 (the first federal case in which this clause was considered), saying: "We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental." Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 76; Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 248; Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 207 U. S. 142, 155. In this Corfield case the court included in a partial list of such fundamental privileges, "The right of a citizen of one state, * * * to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of another."

The State of Minnesota, in the statute we are considering, recognized this right of citizens of other states to institute and maintain suits in its courts as a fundamental right, protected by the Constitution, and for one year from the time his cause of action accrued the respondent was given all of the rights which citizens of Minnesota had under it. The discrimination of which he complains could arise only from his own neglect. * * *

From very early in our history, requirements have been imposed upon nonresidents in many, perhaps in all, of the states as a condition of resorting to their courts, which have not been imposed upon resident citizens. For instance, security for costs has very generally been required of a nonresident, but not of a resident citizen, and a nonresident's property in many States may be attached under conditions which would not justify the attaching of a resident citizen's property. * * *

The principle on which this holding rests is that the constitutional requirement is satisfied if the nonresident is given access to the courts of the state upon terms which in themselves are reasonable and adequate for the enforcing of any rights he may have, even though they may not be technically and precisely the same in extent as those accorded to resident citizens. The power is in the courts, ultimately in this court, to determine the adequacy and reasonableness of such terms. A man cannot be said to be denied, in a constitutional or in any rational sense, the privilege of resorting to courts to enforce his rights when he is given free access to them for a length of time reasonably sufficient to enable an ordinarily diligent man to institute proceedings for their protection. This is the principle on which this Court has repeatedly ruled that contracts were not impaired in a constitutional sense by change in limitation statutes which reduced the time for commencing actions upon them, provided a reasonable time was given for commencing suit before the new bar took effect. Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 632; Tennessee v. Sneed, 96 U. S. 69, 74; Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769, 774. * * *

The laws of Minnesota gave to the nonresident respondent free access to its courts, for the purpose of enforcing any right which he may have had, for a year,—as long a time as was given him for that purpose by the laws under which he chose to live and work—and having neglected to avail himself of that law, he may not successfully complain because his expired right to maintain suit elsewhere is not revived for his benefit by the laws of the state to which he went for the sole purpose of prosecuting his suit. The privilege extended to him for enforcing his claim was reasonably sufficient and adequate and the statute is a valid law.

It results that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals must be reversed and that of the District Court affirmed. Reversed.

NOTES

1. Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 207 U. S. 142, 52 L. ed. 143, 28 Sup. Ct. 34 (1907) sustained as not violative of the interstate privileges and immunities clause a statute of Ohio which provided that whenever a citizen of that state was killed by wrongful act outside the state, in a jurisdiction which allowed an action therefor, the right of action could be enforced in Ohio. Here a widow sued in Ohio for the wrongful death of her husband (both being citizens of Pennsylvania), alleging it to have been caused in Pennsylvania by the negligence of the defendant. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed a judgment of the Ohio Supreme Court which had reversed the lower Ohio court's judgment for the plaintiff. The court pointed out that the Pennsylvania statute which had created the right of action sought to be enforced in the Ohio courts had been construed by the Pennsylvania courts as creating a new cause of action, unknown to the common law, in favor of the survivor and not derived from the deceased. The widow had not been denied access to the Ohio courts because she was not a citizen of that state but because the cause of action which she presented was not cognizable in those courts. She would have been denied hearing of the same cause for the same reason if she had been a citizen of Ohio. "So far as the parties to the litigation are concerned, the state, by its laws, made no discrimination based on citizenship, and offered precisely the same privileges to citizens of other states which it allowed to its own." Justice Holmes concurred specially and Justices Harlan, White and McKenna dissented.

2. As the principal case emphasizes, the Supreme Court of the United States, following the lead of Mr. Justice Washington in Corfield v. Coryell, has interpreted the word "all" in the interstate privileges and immunities clause to mean "fundamental." Nor has the court undertaken to define with any further exactitude such privileges and immunities, preferring to decide each case in the light of its own facts and circumstances.

3. The interstate privileges and immunities clause (sometimes referred to as the "comity clause") is, of course, not the only anti-discrimination guaranty in the Constitution. Even if the words "citizens of each state" in that clause are authoritatively construed not to include "citizens" of the District of Columbia or of the territories, such persons nevertheless derived some immunity from discrimination by virtue of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (which applies to "any person" and has been construed to protect corporations as well as natural persons) while they are within a state's jurisdiction. While this clause and Article IV, section 2, clause 1 to some extent overlap, they are not coextensive. It should be noted also that the commerce clause of the Constitution gives all persons, including corporations, immunity from state prevention of ingress for the conduct of interstate and foreign commerce within a state.

Section 4.—Other Interstate Relations.

KENTUCKY v. DENNISON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1861.

24 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 717.

[Original proceeding by petition in the Supreme Court by the Governor in behalf of the State of Kentucky for a mandamus commanding Dennison, Governor of the State of Ohio, to deliver up Willis Lago, charged with being a fugitive from justice from Kentucky, where he had been indicted for violation of the fugitive slave law of that state. The Governor of Ohio, acting upon the legal advice of the Attorney-General of Ohio, refused to honor the requisition of the Governor of Kentucky, issued in accordance with an act of Congress of 1793, relating to interstate extradition. The refusal to deliver up Lago was based upon the ground that the crime for which he was indicted in Kentucky was unknown to the laws of Ohio, did not affect the public safety, was not regarded as malum in se, and hence did not come within the meaning of Article IV, Section 2 of the Constitution. The Attorney-General of Ohio, appearing in the proceedings, denied the jurisdiction of the Court to issue the writ.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

[The Court first considered the question of jurisdiction and held that if the right claimed by Kentucky could be enforced by judicial process, the proceeding by mandamus was the only method by which the objective could be accomplished.]

This brings us to the examination of the clause of the Constitution [Art. IV, Sec. 2] which has given rise to the controversy. It is in the following words:

"A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime."

Looking to the language of the clause, it is difficult to comprehend how any doubt could have arisen as to its meaning and construction.

The words, "treason, felony, or other crime," in their plain and obvious import, as well as in their legal and technical sense, embrace every act forbidden and made punishable by a law of the State. The word "crime" of itself includes every offense, from the highest to the lowest in the grade of offenses, and includes what are called "misdemeanors," as well as treason and felony. * * *

But as the word crime would have included treason and felony, without specially mentioning those offenses, it seems to be supposed that the natural and legal import of the word, by associating it with those offenses, must be restricted and confined to offenses already known to the common law and to the usage of nations, and regarded as offenses in every civil community, and that they do not extend to acts made offenses by local statutes growing out of local circumstances, nor to offenses against ordinary police regulations. This is one of the grounds upon which the Governor of Ohio refused to deliver Lago, under the advice of the Attorney-General of that State. * * *

Looking, therefore, to the words of the Constitution—to the obvious policy and necessity of this provision to preserve harmony between States, and order and law within their respective borders, and to its early adoption by the colonies, and then by the confederated States, whose mutual interest it was to give each other aid and support whenever it was needed—the conclusion is irresistible that this compact engrafted in the Constitution included, and was intended to include, every offense made punishable by the law of the State in which it was committed, and that it gives the right to the executive authority of the State to demand the fugitive from the executive authority of the State in which he is found; that the right given to "demand" implies that it is an absolute right, and it follows that there must be a correlative obligation to deliver, without any reference to the character of the crime charged, or to the policy or laws of the State to which the fugitive has fled. * * *

It will be observed, that the judicial acts which are necessary to authorize the demand are plainly specified in the act of Congress, and the certificate of the executive authority is made conclusive as to their verity when presented to the executive of the State where the fugitive is found. He has no right to look behind them, or to question them, or to look into the character of the crime specified in this judicial proceeding. The duty which he is to perform is, as we have already said, merely ministerial—that is, to cause the party to be arrested and delivered to the agent or authority of the State where the crime was committed. * * *

The question which remains to be examined is a grave and important one. When the demand was made, the proofs required by the act of 1793 to support it were exhibited to the Governor of Ohio, duly certified and authenticated, and the objection made to the validity of the indictment is altogether untenable. Kentucky has an undoubted right to regulate the forms of pleading and process in her own courts, in criminal as well as civil cases, and is not bound to conform to those of any other State. And whether the charge against Lago is legally and sufficiently laid in this indictment according to the laws of Kentucky, is a judicial question to be decided by the courts of the State, and not by the executive authority of the State of Ohio.

The demand being thus made, the Act of Congress declares, that "it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state" to cause the fugitive to be arrested and secured, and delivered to the agent of the demanding State. The words, "it shall be the duty," in ordinary legislation, imply the assertion of the power to command and to coerce obedience. But looking to the subject-matter of this law, and the relations which the United States and the several States bear to each other, the court is of opinion, the words "it shall be the duty" were not used as mandatory and compulsory, but as declaratory of the moral duty which this compact [the Constitution] created, when Congress had provided the mode of carrying it into execution. The Act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty, nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every state under the control and dominion of the General Government even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a state officer, as such, any duty whatever, and compel him to perform it, for if it possessed this power, it might overload the officer with duties which would fill up all his time, and disable him from performing his obligations to the state, and might impose on him duties of a character incompatible with the rank and dignity to which he was elevated by the State.

It is true that Congress may authorize a particular state officer to perform a particular duty; but if he declines to do so, it does not follow that he may be coerced, or punished for his refusal. And we are very far from supposing, that in using this word "duty," the statesmen who framed and passed the law, or the President who approved and signed it, intended to exercise a coercive power over state officers not warranted by the Constitution. But the General Government having in that law fulfilled the duty devolved upon it, by prescribing the proof and mode of authentication upon which the state authorities were bound to deliver the fugitive, the word "duty" in the law points to the obligation on the state to carry it into execution.

It is true that in the early days of the government, Congress relied with confidence upon the co-operation and support of the states, when exercising the legitimate powers of the General Government, and were accustomed to receive it, upon principles of comity, and from a sense of mutual and common interest, where no such duty was imposed by the Constitution. * * *

But the language of the act of 1793 is very different. It does not purport to give authority to the executive to arrest and deliver the fugitive, but requires it to be done, and the language of the law implies an absolute obligation which the state authority is bound to perform. And when it speaks of the duty of the Governor, it evidently points to the duty imposed by the Constitution in the clause we are now considering. The performance of this duty, however, is left to depend on the fidelity of the state executive to the compact entered into with the other states when it adopted the Constitution of the United States, and became a member of the Union. It was so left by the Constitution, and necessarily so left by the act of 1793.

And it would seem that when the Constitution was framed, and when this law was passed, it was confidently believed that a sense of justice and of mutual interest would insure a faithful execution of this constitutional provision by the executive of every state, for every state had an equal interest in the execution of a compact absolutely essential to their peace and well being in their internal concerns, as well as members of the Union. Hence, the use of the words ordinarily employed when an undoubted obligation is required to be performed, "it shall be his duty."

But if the Governor of Ohio refuses to discharge this duty, there is no power delegated to the General Government, either through the Judicial Department or any other department, to use any coercive means to compel him.

And upon this ground the motion for the mandamus must be overruled.

NOTES

1. The deficiencies of the interstate extradition clause, as construed in the principal case, have been partially remedied by the negotiation of compacts among the states and by uniform state legislation, as well as by federal legislation enacted under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The Fleeing Felon Act of 1934 (18 U. S. C. § 1073; F. C. A. 18 § 1073) makes it an offense against the United States to move or travel in interstate or foreign commerce by fleeing from one state to another with intent to escape prosecution for a stated number of serious crimes or to avoid giving testimony in any criminal prosecution in which the commission of a felony is charged.

2. When the accused has come within the jurisdiction of the demanding state, he cannot secure release by habeas corpus in the federal courts on the ground that his removal to such state was illegal. Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S. 183, 36 L. ed. 934, 13 Sup. Ct. 40 (1892); Pettibone v. Nichols, 203 U. S. 192, 51 L. ed. 148, 27 Sup. Ct. 111, 7 Ann. Cas. 1047 (1906). This is true even though the fugitive was forcibly kidnapped and returned to the demanding state by armed men acting without color of authority. Mahon v. Justice, 127 U. S. 700, 32 L. ed. 283, 8 Sup. Ct. 1204 (1888).

3. A fugitive from justice, upon his return to the state from which he fled, may be tried not only for the offense for which his return was demanded, but also for any other offense against the laws of the demanding state. Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 537, 37 L. ed. 549, 13 Sup. Ct. 687 (1893).

WEST VIRGINIA EX REL. DYER v. SIMS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1951.

341 U. S. 22, 95 L. ed. 713, 71 Sup. Ct. 557.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

After extended negotiations eight states entered into a Compact to control pollution in the Ohio River system. See Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Compact [July 11, 1940] 54 Stat. 752, ch. 581, 33 U. S. C. § 567a, note, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and West Virginia recognized that they were faced with one of the problems of government that are defined by natural rather than political boundaries. Accordingly, they pledged themselves to cooperate in maintaining waters in the Ohio River basin in a sanitary condition through the administrative mechanism of the Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Commission, consisting of three members from each State and three representing the United States.

The heart of the Compact is Article VI. This provides that sewage discharged into boundary streams or streams flowing from one State into another "shall be so treated, within a time reasonable for the construction of the necessary works, as to provide for substantially complete removal of settleable solids, and the removal of not less than forty-five per cent (45%) of the total suspended solids; provided that, in order to protect the public health or to preserve the waters for other legitimate purposes, * * * in specific instances such higher degree of treatment shall be used as may be determined to be necessary by the Commission after investigation, due notice and hearing." Industrial wastes are to be treated "to such degree as may be determined to be necessary by the Commission after investigation, due notice and hearing." * * *

Article IX provides that the Commission may, after notice and hearing, issue orders for compliance enforceable in the State and federal courts. It further provides: "No such order shall go into effect unless and until it receives the assent of at least a majority of the commissioners from each of not less than a majority of the signatory States; and no such order upon a municipality, corporation, person or entity in any State shall go into effect unless and until it receives the assent of not less than a majority of the Commissioners from such State."

By Article X the States also agree "to appropriate for the salaries, office and other administrative expenses, their proper proportion of the annual budget as determined by the Commission and approved by the Governors of the signatory states. * * *"

The present controversy arose because of conflicting views between officials of West Virginia regarding the responsibility of West Virginia under the Compact.

The Legislature of that State ratified and approved the Compact on March 11, 1939, W. Va. Acts 1939, ch. 38. Congress gave its consent on July 11, 1940, 54 Stat. 752, ch. 581, and upon adoption by all the signatory States the Compact was formally executed by the Governor of West Virginia on June 30, 1948. At its 1949 session the West Virginia Legislature appropriated $12,250 as the State's contribution to the expenses of the Commission for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1949. W. Va. Acts 1949, ch. 9, Item 93. Respondent Sims, the auditor of the State, refused to issue a warrant upon its treasury for payment of this appropriation. To compel him to issue it, the West Virginia Commissioners to the Compact Commission and the members of the West Virginia State Water Commission instituted this original mandamus proceeding in the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. The court denied relief on the merits and we brought the case here. 340 U. S. 807, ante, 19, 71 S. Ct. 51, because questions of obviously important public interest are raised.

The West Virginia court found that the "sole question" before it was the validity of the Act of 1939 approving West Virginia's adherence to the Compact. It found that Act invalid in that (1) the Compact was deemed to delegate West Virginia's police power to other States and to the Federal Government, and (2) it was deemed to bind future legislatures to make appropriations for the continued activities of the Sanitation Commission and thus to violate Art. 10, § 4 of the West Virginia Constitution.

Briefs filed on behalf of the United States and other States, as amici, invite the Court to consider far-reaching issues relating to the Compact Clause of the United States Constitution. Art. 1, § 10, cl. 3. The United States urges that the Compact be so read as to allow any signatory State to withdraw from its obligations at any time. Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and New York contend that the Compact Clause precludes any State from limiting its power to enter into a compact to which Congress has consented. We must not be tempted by these inviting vistas. We need not go beyond the issues on which the West Virginia court found the Compact not binding on that State. That these are issues which give this Court jurisdiction to review the State court proceeding, 28 U. S. C. § 1257 [F. C. A. 28 § 1257], needs no discussion after Delaware River Joint Toll Bridge Com. v. Colburn, 310 U. S. 419, 427.

Control of pollution in interstate streams might, on occasion, be an appropriate subject for national legislation. Compare Oklahoma ex rel. Phillips v. Guy F. Atkinson Co., 313 U. S. 508. But, with prescience, the Framers left the States free to settle regional controversies in diverse ways. Solution of the problem underlying this case may be attempted directly by the affected States through contentious litigation before this Court. Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208; New York v. New Jersey, 256 U. S. 296. Adjudication here of conflicting State interests affecting stream pollution does not rest upon the law of a particular State. This Court decides such controversies according to "principles it must have power to declare." Missouri v. Illinois, supra (200 U. S. at 519). But the delicacy of interstate relationships and the inherent limitations upon this Court's ability to deal with multifarious local problems have naturally led to exacting standards of judicial intervention and have inhibited the formulation of a code for dealing with such controversies. As Mr. Justice Holmes put it: "Before this Court ought to intervene the case should be of serious magnitude, clearly and fully proved, and the principle to be applied should be one which the Court is prepared deliberately to maintain against all considerations on the other side." Missouri v. Illinois, supra (200 U. S. at 521).

Indeed, so awkward and unsatisfactory is the available litigious solution for these problems that this Court deemed it appropriate to emphasize the practical constitutional alternative provided by the Compact Clause. Experience led us to suggest that a problem such as that involved here is "more likely to be wisely solved by coöperative study and by conference and mutual concession on the part of representatives of the States so vitally interested in it than by proceedings in any court however constituted." New York v. New Jersey, supra (256 U. S. at 313). The suggestion has had fruitful response.

The growing interdependence of regional interests, calling for regional adjustments, has brought extensive use of compacts. A compact is more than a supple device for dealing with interests confined within a region. That it is also a means of safeguarding the national interest is well illustrated in the Compact now under review. Not only was congressional consent required, as for all compacts; direct participation by the Federal Government was provided in the President's appointment of three members of the Compact Commission. Art. IV; Art. XI, § 3.

But a compact is after all a legal document. Though the circumstances of its drafting are likely to assure great care and deliberation, all avoidance of disputes as to scope and meaning is not within human gift. Just as this Court has power to settle disputes between States where there is no compact, it must have final power to pass upon the meaning and validity of compacts. It requires no elaborate argument to reject the suggestion that an agreement solemnly entered into between States by those who alone have political authority to speak for a State can be unilaterally nullified, or given final meaning by an organ of one of the contracting States. A State cannot be its own ultimate judge in a controversy with a sister State. To determine the nature and scope of obligations as between States, whether they arise through the legislative means of compact or the "federal common law" governing interstate controversies (Hinderlider v. La Plata River & C. Creek Ditch Co. 304 U. S. 92, 110), is the function and duty of the Supreme Court of the Nation. Of course every deference will be shown to what the highest court of a State deems to be the law and policy of its State, particularly when recondite or unique features of local law are urged. Deference is one thing; submission to a State's own determination of whether it has undertaken an obligation, what that obligation is, and whether it conflicts with a disability of the State to undertake it is quite another.

The Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of West Virginia is, for exclusively State purposes, the ultimate tribunal in construing the meaning of her Constitution. But two prior decisions of this Court make clear that we are free to examine determinations of law by State courts in the limited field where a compact brings in issue the rights of other States and the United States.

Kentucky v. Indiana, 281 U. S. 163, dealt with a compact to build a bridge across the Ohio River. In an original action brought before this Court, Indiana defended on the ground that she should not be compelled to perform until the Indiana courts decided, in a pending case, whether her officials had been authorized to enter into the compact. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for a unanimous Court, dismissed the argument: "Where the States themselves are before this Court for the determination of a controversy between them, neither can determine their rights inter sese, and this Court must pass upon every question essential to such a determination, although local legislation and questions of state authorization may be involved. Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39, 56; 220 U. S. 1, 28. A decision in the present instance by the state court would not determine the controversy here." 281 U. S. at 176, 177.

In reaching this conclusion the Chief Justice could hardly avoid analogizing the situation to that where a question is raised whether a State has impaired the obligation of a contract. "It has frequently been held that when a question is suitably raised whether the law of a State has impaired the obligation of a contract, in violation of the constitutional provision, this Court must determine for itself whether a contract exists, what are its obligations, and whether they have been impaired by the legislation of the State. While this Court always examines with appropriate respect the decisions of state courts bearing upon such questions, such decisions do not detract from the responsibility of this Court in reaching its own conclusions as to the contract, its obligations and impairment, for otherwise the constitutional guaranty could not properly be enforced. Larson v. South Dakota, 278 U. S. 429, 433, and cases there cited." 281 U. S. at 176.

Hinderlider v. La Plata River & C. Creek Ditch Co., 304 U. S. 92, supra, is the second of these cases. It also makes clear, if authority be needed, that the fact the compact questions reach us on a writ of certiorari rather than by way of an original action brought by a State does not affect the power of this Court. In the Hinderlider Case, an action was brought in the Colorado courts to enjoin performance of a compact between Colorado and New Mexico concerning water rights in the La Plata River. The State court held that the compact was invalid because it affected appropriation rights guaranteed by the Colorado State Constitution. 101 Colo. 73, 70 P. 2d 849; see also 93 Colo. 128, 25 P. 2d 187. Mr. Justice Brandeis, speaking for a unanimous Court, held that the relative claims of New Mexico and Colorado citizens could be determined by compact and reversed the decision of the State court.

The issue in the Hinderlider Case was whether the Colorado legislature had authority, under the State Constitution, to enter into a compact which affected the water rights of her citizens. The issue before us is whether the West Virginia legislature had authority, under her constitution, to enter into a compact which involves delegation of power to an interstate agency and an agreement to appropriate funds for the administrative expenses of the agency.

That a legislature may delegate to an administrative body the power to make rules and decide particular cases is one of the axioms of modern government. The West Virginia court does not challenge the general proposition but objects to the delegation here involved because it is to a body outside the State and because its legislature may not be free, at any time, to withdraw the power delegated. We are not here concerned, and so need not deal, with specific language in a State Constitution requiring that the State settle its problems with other States without delegating power to an interstate agency. What is involved is the conventional grant of legislative power. We find nothing in that to indicate that West Virginia may not solve a problem such as the control of river pollution by compact and by the delegation, if such it be, necessary to effectuate such solution by compact. If this Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, were to enter a decree requiring West Virginia to abate pollution of interstate streams, that decree would bind the State. The West Virginia Legislature would have no part in determining the State's obligation. The State Legislature could not alter it; it could not disregard it, as West Virginia on another occasion so creditably recognized. The obligation would be fixed by this Court on the basis of a master's report. Here, the State has bound itself to control pollution by the more effective means of an agreement with other States. The Compact involves a reasonable and carefully limited delegation of power to an interstate agency. Nothing in its Constitution suggests that, in dealing with the problem dealt with by the Compact, West Virginia must wait for the answer to be dictated by this Court after harassing and unsatisfactory litigation. * * *

The State court also held that the Compact is in conflict with Art. 10, § 4, of the State Constitution and for that reason is not binding in West Virginia. This section provides:

"No debt shall be contracted by this State, except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion or defend the State in time of war; but the payment of any liability other than that for the ordinary expenses of the State, shall be equally distributed over a period of at least twenty years."

The Compact was evidently drawn with great care to meet the problem of debt limitation in light of this section and similar restrictive provisions in the constitutions of other States. Although, under Art. X, of the Compact, the States agree to appropriate funds for administrative expenses the annual budget must be approved by the Governors of the signatory States. In addition, Article V provides: "The Commission shall not incur any obligations of any kind prior to the making of appropriations adequate to meet the same; nor shall the Commission pledge the credit of any of the signatory States, except by and with the authority of the legislature thereof." In view of these provisions, we conclude that the obligation of the State under the Compact is not in conflict with Art. 10, § 4 of the State Constitution.

Reversed and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK concurs in the result.

MR. JUSTICE REED, concurring.

MR. JUSTICE REED concurs in the judgment of the Court but disagrees with the assertion of power by this Court to interpret the meaning of the West Virginia Constitution. This Court must accept the State court's interpretation of its own Constitution unless it is prepared to say that the interpretation is a palpable evasion to avoid a federal rule.

There is no problem concerning the binding effect upon this Court of state court interpretation of state law, under the Compact Clause such as there is under the clause against impairing the Obligation of Contracts. Under the latter clause, this Court, in order to determine whether the subsequent state law, constitutional or statutory, impairs the federal prohibition against impairment of contracts, has asserted power to construe for itself the disputed agreement, to decide whether it is a contract, and to interpret the subsequent state statute to decide whether it impairs that contract. Even then we accept state court conclusions unless "manifestly wrong." Examination here, under the Contract Clause, is to enforce the federal provision against impairment and is made only to decide whether under the Contract Clause there is a contract and whether it is impaired. This Court thus adjudges whether state action has violated the Federal Contract Clause. It does not decide the meaning of a state statute as applied to a state appropriation.

Under the Compact Clause, however, the federal questions are the execution, validity and meaning of federally approved state compacts. The interpretation of the meaning of the compact controls over a state's application of its own law through the Supremacy Clause and not by any implied federal power to construe state law.

West Virginia adjudges her execution of the compact is invalid as a delegation of state police power and as a creation of debt beyond her constitutional powers. Since the Constitution provided the compact for adjusting interstate relations, compacts may be enforced despite otherwise valid state restrictions on state action.

This, I think, was the basis of our holding in Hinderlider v. La Plata River & C. Creek Ditch Co. 304 U. S. 92. * * *

I would uphold the validity of the compact and reverse the judgment of West Virginia refusing mandamus, with direction to that court to enter a judgment not inconsistent with an opinion based upon the Supremacy Clause.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, concurring.

West Virginia officials induced sister States to contract with her and Congress to consent to the Compact. She now attempts to read herself out of this interstate Compact by reading into her Constitution a limitation upon the powers of her Governor and Legislature to contract.

West Virginia, for internal affairs, is free to interpret her own Constitution as she will. But if the compact system is to have vitality and integrity, she may not raise an issue of ultra vires, decide it, and release herself from an interstate obligation. The legal consequences which flow from the formal participation in a compact consented to by Congress is a federal question for this Court.

West Virginia points to no provision of her Constitution which we can say was clear notice or fair warning to Congress or other States of any defect in her authority to enter into this Compact. * * *

Estoppel is not often to be invoked against a government. But West Virginia assumed a contractual obligation with equals by permission of another government that is sovereign in the field. After Congress and sister States had been induced to alter their positions and bind themselves to terms of a covenant, West Virginia should be estopped from repudiating her act. For this reason, I consider that whatever interpretation she may put on the generalities of her Constitution, she is bound by the Compact, and on that basis I concur in the judgment.

NOTES

1. The Constitution provides that "no state shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation" (Art. I, § 10, cl. 1) and that "no state shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power" (Art. I, § 10, cl. 3). The required consent of Congress to interstate agreements need not be given in express terms or with any particular formalities; it is sufficient if Congress by some positive act indicate its assent. For example, the admission by Congress of Kentucky as a state amounted to an assent to an agreement between Kentucky and Virginia by which the former was detached from the territory of the latter. Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 1, 85, 5 L. ed. 547 (1823). The compact clause permits agreements between states which do not have a substantial tendency to increase the political power or influence of one or more of the states involved. Thus the clause prevents a compact by which the territory of one state is substantially increased, but does not prevent an agreement in good faith entered into in order to settle a boundary dispute. Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U. S. 503, 37 L. ed. 537, 13 Sup. Ct. 728 (1893). Other examples of permissible compacts between states are those relating to the control and improvement of navigation, apportionment of water rights in interstate rivers and conservation of natural resources, and the regulation of public utilities. An especially noteworthy recent instance of this form of "cooperative federalism" is the compact entered into in 1921 between New York and New Jersey creating the Port of New York District and establishing the Port of New York Authority, for the comprehensive development and governance of the port.

2. For discussions of the compact clause see Frankfurter and Landis, The Compact Clause of the Constitution—A Study in Interstate Adjustments, 34 Yale L. J. 685 (1925), 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 1606; Note, Regional Education: A New Use of the Interstate Compact?, 34 Va. L. Rev. 64 (1948). The principal case is discussed in Comment, 4 Stanf. L. Rev. 138 (1951).

3. Another important provision of the Constitution dealing with relations between the states is the full faith and credit clause (Art. IV, § 1) which provides: "Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." Since cases arising under this clause are customarily dealt with in the course on Conflict of Laws, the subject is omitted from consideration in this case-book. The importance of the role of the Supreme Court as the arbiter of controversies among two or more states which are susceptible of judicial determination (Art. III, § 2, cl. 1) is exemplified by the opinion in Kansas v. Colorado, supra.

CHAPTER IV

NATIONALITY AND CITIZENSHIP

Section 1.—Citizenship by Birth and Naturalization.

UNITED STATES v. WONG KIM ARK.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1898.
169 U. S. 649, 42 L. ed. 890, 18 Sup. Ct. 456.

[Wong Kim Ark was born in San Francisco in 1873 of Chinese parents who were subjects of the Emperor of China but were permanently domiciled in the United States. He went to China in 1894 and upon his return in 1895 the collector of customs in San Francisco refused him permission to enter on the ground that he was a Chinese laborer, not a citizen, and not within any of the privileged classes named in the Chinese Exclusion Acts then in force in the United States. Being restrained of his liberty for the purpose of deportation, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus, claiming American citizenship on the ground of birth. The United States district court ordered Wong Kim Ark to be discharged and the United States appealed.]

MR. JUSTICE GRAY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The question presented by the record is whether a child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who, at the time of his birth, are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicil and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States, by virtue of the first clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

I. In construing any act of legislation, whether a statute enacted by the legislature, or a Constitution established by the people as the supreme law of the land, regard is to be had not only to all parts of the act itself, and of any former act of the same law-making power, of which the act in question is an amendment; but also to the condition, and to the history, of the law as previously existing, and in the light of which the new act must be read and interpreted.

The Constitution of the United States, as originally adopted, uses the words "citizen of the United States," and "natural-born citizen of the United States." * * *

The Constitution nowhere defines the meaning of these words, either by way of inclusion or of exclusion, except in so far as this is done by the affirmative declaration that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." In this, as in other respects, it must be interpreted in the light of the common law, the principles and history of which were familiarly known to the framers of the Constitution. Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 422; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 624, 625; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465. The language of the Constitution, as has been well said, could not be understood without reference to the common law. 1 Kent Com. 336; Bradley, J., in Moore v. United States, 91 U. S. 270, 274. * * *

II. The fundamental principle of the common law with regard to English nationality was birth within the allegiance, also called "ligealty," "obedience," "faith" or "power," of the King. The principle embraced all persons born within the King's allegiance and subject to his protection. Such allegiance and protection were mutual—as expressed in the maxim, protectio trahit subjectionem, subjectio protectionem—and were not restricted to natural-born subjects and naturalized subjects, or to those who had taken an oath of allegiance; but were predicable of aliens in amity, so long as they were within the Kingdom. Children, born in England, of such aliens, were therefore natural-born subjects. But the children, born within the realm, of foreign ambassadors, or the children of alien enemies, born during and within their hostile occupation of part of the King's domains, were not natural-born subjects, because not born within the allegiance, the obedience, or the power, or, as would be said at this day, within the jurisdiction of the King.

It thus clearly appears that by the law of England for the last three centuries, beginning before the settlement of this country, and continuing to the present day, aliens, while residing in the dominions possessed by the Crown of England, were within the allegiance, the obedience, the faith or loyalty, the protection, the power, the jurisdiction of the English sovereign; and therefore every child born in England of alien parents was a natural-born subject, unless the child of an ambassador or other diplomatic agent of a foreign State, or of an alien enemy in hostile occupation of the place where the child was born.

III. The same rule was in force in all the English colonies upon this continent down to the time of the Declaration of Independence, and in the United States afterwards, and continued to prevail under the Constitution as originally established. * * *

IV. It was contended by one of the learned counsel for the United States that the rule of the Roman law, by which the citizenship of the child followed that of the parent, was the true rule of international law as now recognized in most civilized countries, and had superseded the rule of the common law, depending on birth within the realm, originally founded on feudal considerations. * * * [The Court here considered the laws of several European countries with respect to citizenship and found that they materially differed.]

There is, therefore, little ground for the theory that, at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, there was any settled or definite rule of international law, generally recognized by civilized nations, inconsistent with the ancient rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion.

Nor can it be doubted that it is the inherent right of every independent nation to determine for itself, and according to its own constitution and laws, what classes of persons shall be entitled to its citizenship. * * *

Passing by questions once earnestly controverted, but finally put at rest by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, it is beyond doubt that, before the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, or the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment, all white persons, at least, born within the sovereignty of the United States, whether children of citizens or of foreigners, excepting only children of ambassadors or public ministers of a foreign government, were native-born citizens of the United States.

V. In the forefront, both of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, and of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, the fundamental principle of citizenship by birth within the dominion was reaffirmed in the most explicit and comprehensive terms. * * *

The first section of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution begins with the words, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." As appears upon the face of the Amendment, as well as from the history of the times, this was not intended to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship, or to prevent any persons from becoming citizens by the fact of birth within the United States, who would thereby have become citizens according to the law existing before its adoption. It is declaratory in form, and enabling and extending in effect. Its main purpose doubtless was, as has been often recognized by this Court, to establish the citizenship of free negroes which had been denied in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Taney in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 19 How. 393; and to put it beyond doubt that all blacks, as well as whites, born or naturalized within the jurisdiction of the United States, are citizens of the United States. Slaughter-House Cases (1873), 16 Wall. 36, 73; Strauder v. West Virginia (1879), 100 U. S. 303, 306; Ex parte Virginia (1879), 100 U. S. 339, 345; Neal v. Delaware (1880), 103 U. S. 370, 386; Elk v. Wilkins (1884), 112 U. S. 94, 101. But the opening words, "All persons born," are general, not to say universal, restricted only by place and jurisdiction, and not by color or race—as was clearly recognized in all the opinions delivered in the Slaughter-House Cases, above cited. * * *

The real object of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, in qualifying the words, "All persons born in the United States," by the addition, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," would appear to have been to exclude, by the fewest and fittest words (besides children of members of the Indian tribes, standing in a peculiar relation to the national government, unknown to the common law), the two classes of cases—children born of alien enemies in hostile occupation, and children of diplomatic representatives of a foreign state—both of which, as has already been shown, by the law of England, and by our own law, from the time of the first settlement of the English colonies in America, had been recognized exceptions to the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the country. * * *

These considerations confirm the view, already expressed in this opinion, that the opening sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment is throughout affirmative and declaratory, intended to allay doubts and to settle controversies which had arisen, and not to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship. * * *

This sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment is declaratory of existing rights, and affirmative of existing law, as to each of the qualifications therein expressed—"born in the United States," "naturalized in the United States," and "subject to the jurisdiction thereof"—in short, as to everything relating to the acquisition of citizenship by facts occurring within the limits of the United States. But it has not touched the acquisition of citizenship by being born abroad of American parents; and has left that subject to be regulated, as it had always been, by Congress, in the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. * * *

The foregoing considerations and authorities irresistibly lead us to these conclusions: The Fourteenth Amendment affirms the ancient and fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the territory, in the allegiance and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, with the exceptions or qualifications (as old as the rule itself) of children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on foreign public ships, or of enemies within and during hostile occupation of part of our territory, and with the single additional exception of children of members of the Indian tribes owing direct allegiance to their several tribes. The Amendment, in clear words and in manifest intent, includes the children born within the territory of the United States, of all other persons, of whatever race or color, domiciled within the United States. Every citizen or subject of another country, while domiciled here, is within the allegiance and protection, and consequently subject to the jurisdiction, of the United States.

VI. Whatever considerations, in the absence of a controlling provision of the Constitution, might influence the legislative or the executive branch of the government to decline to admit persons of the Chinese race to the status of citizens of the United States, there are none that can restrain or permit the judiciary to refuse to give full effect to the peremptory and explicit language of the Fourteenth Amendment, which declares and ordains that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States."

Chinese persons, born out of the United States, remaining subjects of the Emperor of China, and not having become citizens of the United States, are entitled to the protection of and owe allegiance to the United States, so long as they are permitted by the United States to reside here; and are "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the same sense as all other aliens residing in the United States. * * *

The Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, in the declaration that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside," contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two only: birth and naturalization. Citizenship by naturalization can only be acquired by naturalization under the authority and in the forms of law. But citizenship by birth is established by the mere fact of birth under the circumstances defined in the Constitution. Every person born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, becomes at once a citizen of the United States, and needs no naturalization. A person born out of the jurisdiction of the United States can only become a citizen by being naturalized, either by treaty, as in the case of the annexation of foreign territory; or by authority of Congress, exercised either by declaring certain classes of persons to be citizens, as in the enactments conferring citizenship upon foreign-born children of citizens, or by enabling foreigners individually to become citizens by proceedings in the judicial tribunals, as in the ordinary provisions of the naturalization acts.

The power of naturalization, vested in Congress by the Constitution, is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away. "A naturalized citizen," said Chief Justice Marshall, "becomes a member of the society, possessing all the rights of a native citizen, and standing, in the view of the Constitution, on the footing of a native. The Constitution does not authorize Congress to enlarge or abridge those rights. The simple power of the national legislature is to prescribe a uniform rule of naturalization, and the exercise of this power exhausts it, so far as respects the individual. The Constitution then takes him up, and, among other rights, extends to him the capacity of suing in the courts of the United States, precisely under the same circumstances under which a native might sue." Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, 827. Congress having no power to abridge the rights conferred by the Constitution upon those who have become naturalized citizens by virtue of acts of Congress, a fortiori no act or omission of Congress, as to providing for the naturalization of parents or children of a particular race, can affect citizenship acquired as a birthright, by virtue of the Constitution itself, without any aid of legislation. The Fourteenth Amendment, while it leaves the power where it was before, in Congress, to regulate naturalization, has conferred no authority upon Congress to restrict the effect of birth, declared by the Constitution to constitute a sufficient and complete right to citizenship.

No one doubts that the Amendment, as soon as it was promulgated, applied to persons of African descent born in the United States, wherever the birthplace of their parents might have been; and yet, for two years afterwards, there was no statute authorizing persons of that race to be naturalized. If the omission or the refusal of Congress to permit certain classes of persons to be made citizens by naturalization could be allowed the effect of correspondingly restricting the classes of persons who should become citizens by birth, it would be in the power of Congress, at any time, by striking negroes out of the naturalization laws, and limiting those laws, as they were formerly limited, to white persons only, to defeat the main purpose of the constitutional amendment.

The fact, therefore, that acts of Congress or treaties have not permitted Chinese persons born out of this country to become citizens by naturalization, cannot exclude Chinese persons born in this country from the operation of the broad and clear words of the Constitution, "All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." * * *

The evident intention, and the necessary effect, of the submission of this case to the decision of the court upon the facts agreed by the parties, were to present for determination the single question, stated at the beginning of this opinion, namely, whether a child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who, at the time of his birth, are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicile and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States. For the reasons above stated, this court is of opinion that the question must be answered in the affirmative.

Order affirmed.

[MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER, with whom concurred MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, dissented in an opinion which is omitted.]

NOTES

1. Modern systems of law recognize the concepts of "nationality" and "alienage." The term "nationals" applies to persons who owe permanent allegiance to a country but who nevertheless may not be citizens thereof. In the law of the United States, nationals are divided into two classes: (1) citizen-nationals, and (2) non-citizen-nationals. Thus, while not all nationals of the United States are citizens thereof, all citizens of the United States are its nationals. An alien, on the other hand, is a person who is not a national.

In Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393, 15 L. ed. 691 (1857), Chief Justice Taney in a dictum concurred in by Justices Wayne and Daniel declared that free Negroes born in the United States were not citizens of the United States, although he said they owed allegiance to the United States. Justice Curtis thought that a Negro born in a state by the law of which he was a state citizen was also a citizen of the United States, but he admitted that Negroes born in states of the Union by the laws of which they were not state citizens were not citizens of the United States. Together these four justices thought that all or some Negroes born in the United States were not citizens thereof. If they owed allegiance but were not citizens, their status must have been that of non-citizen nationals.

In Elk v. Wilkin, 112 U. S. 94, 28 L. ed. 643, 5 Sup. Ct. 41 (1884), the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not confer citizenship upon Indians born in the United States whose parents were members of any Indian tribe which still existed as a tribe, since the Indians were not born "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States. (The decision was subsequently nullified by legislation conferring national citizenship on all Indians born within the United States.) Although the court did not say that such Indians were not aliens, the preponderating opinion seems to be that they were not. If they were not aliens, they necessarily were nationals; and if not citizens, they were non-citizen nationals.

2. In Gonzales v. Williams, 192 U. S. 1, 48 L. ed. 317, 24 Sup. Ct. 177 (1904) it was held that a native-born Porto Rican was not an alien. Congress has by statute conferred United States citizenship on the inhabitants of Porto Rico, the Canal Zone, Alaska, Hawaii, the Virgin Islands and Guam. See 8 U. S. C. §§ 1402-1407; F. C. A. 8 §§ 1402-1407. For a listing of those persons who are nationals but not citizens of the United States at birth, see 8 U. S. C. § 1408; F. C. A. 8 § 1408.

3. The Constitution (Art. I, § 8, cl. 4) gives to Congress the power "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." The statutes relating to naturalization are important but form no part of a course in constitutional law. Because of its nature the power is an exclusive federal power. Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. 259, 4 L. ed. 234 (1817). State courts, however, may be authorized by Congress to administer federal naturalization statutes. Holmgren v. United States, 217 U. S. 509, 54 L. ed. 861, 30 Sup. Ct. 588, 19 Ann. Cas. 778 (1910).

4. In United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U. S. 644, 73 L. ed. 889, 49 Sup. Ct. 448 (1929) the Supreme Court (Justices Holmes, Brandeis and Sanford dissenting) denied naturalization to a 49 year old Hungarian woman who made no objection to taking the oath of loyalty but would not promise to bear arms personally in the event of war. United States v. Macintosh, 283 U. S. 605, 75 L. ed. 1302, 51 Sup. Ct. 570 (1931) affirmed a decree of a district court (which had been reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals) denying naturalization to a minister and professor in the Yale University Divinity School, born in Canada, who testified that he would have to believe that a war was "morally justified" before he would take up arms in it. Chief Justice Hughes dissented, joined by Justices Holmes, Brandeis and Stone. In United States v. Bland, 283 U. S. 636, 75 L. ed. 1319, 51 Sup. Ct. 569 (1931) the petitioner, a native of Canada who had been a nurse on the battlefields of France, was likewise denied citizenship because she was unwilling to bear arms. She refused to take the oath of allegiance except with the written interpolation of the words, "as far as my conscience as a Christian will allow." The same four justices dissented. These three cases were overruled in Girouard v. United States, 328 U. S. 61, 90 L. ed. 1084, 66 Sup. Ct. 826 (1946). Girouard, a native of Canada, was a Seventh Day Adventist who was willing to take the oath of allegiance and to serve in a non-combatant position in the Army, but not to bear arms. He said: "It is purely a religious matter with me, I have no political or personal reasons other than that." The court held that he was entitled to be naturalized. Chief Justice Stone, joined by Justices Reed and Frankfurter, dissented on the ground that Congress, by failing to amend the naturalization statute following the earlier decisions, had in effect adopted the views therein expressed. The dissent said: "It is not the function of this Court to disregard the will of Congress in the exercise of its Constitutional power."

5. Detailed rules governing the acquisition of citizenship in the United States are set forth in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 (popularly known as the McCarran-Walter Act), 8 U. S. C. § 1101 et seq.; F. C. A. 8 § 1101 et seq., which represents a revision, recodification, and consolidation of the many provisions on immigration, naturalization, etc., contained in several prior independent acts, all of which were repealed and superseded by the 1952 law.

6. The Supreme Court has held that a statute under which a native-born woman citizen of the United States acquired upon marriage the citizenship of her husband was valid, even as applied to a woman who married a resident alien and continued to reside within the United States. Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U. S. 299, 60 L. ed. 297, 36 Sup. Ct. 106, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 645 (1915). The statute was subsequently repealed. Statutory rules governing the loss of nationality are set out in 8 U. S. C. §§ 1481-1489; F. C. A. 8 §§ 1481-1489.

7. The order admitting a naturalized person to citizenship and the certificate of naturalization may be set aside and canceled in a proceeding for this purpose brought by the United States in the federal courts on the ground that such order and certificate were procured by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation. 8 U. S. C. § 1451; F. C. A. 8 § 1451. The case which follows was a proceeding brought under this statute.

KNAUER v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.
328 U. S. 654, 90 L. ed. 1500, 66 Sup. Ct. 1304.

Knauer is a native of Germany. He arrived in this country in 1925 at the age of 30. He had served in the German army during World War I and was decorated. He had studied law and economics in Germany. He settled in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and conducted an insurance business there. He filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen in 1929 and his petition for naturalization in 1936. He took his oath of allegiance and was admitted to citizenship on April 13, 1937. In 1943 the United States instituted proceedings under § 338(a) of the Nationality Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 1137, 1158, 8 U. S. C. § 738(a) [F. C. A. 8 § 738(a)], to cancel his certificate of naturalization on the ground that it had been secured by fraud in that (1) he had falsely and fraudulently represented in his petition that he was attached to the principles of the Constitution and (2) he had taken a false oath of allegiance. The District Court was satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Knauer practiced fraud when he obtained his certificate of naturalization. It found that he had not been and is not attached to the principles of the Constitution and that he took a false oath of allegiance. It accordingly entered an order cancelling his certificate and revoking the order admitting him to citizenship. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The case is here on a petition for a writ of certiorari which we granted to examine that ruling in light of our decisions in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, and Baumgartner v. United States, 322 U. S. 665.

In the oath of allegiance which Knauer took he swore that he would "absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and particularly to the German Reich," that he would support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic"; that he would "bear true faith and allegiance to the same" and that he took "this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion." The first and crucial issue in the case is whether Knauer swore falsely and committed a fraud when he promised under oath to forswear allegiance to the German Reich and to transfer his allegiance to this nation.

Fraud connotes perjury, falsification, concealment, misrepresentation. When denaturalization is sought on this (Baumgartner v. United States, supra) as well as on other grounds (Schneiderman v. United States, supra), the standard of proof required is strict. We do not accept even concurrent findings of two lower courts as conclusive. Baumgartner v. United States, supra, 322 U. S. at pages 670, 671. We reexamine the facts to determine whether the United States has carried its burden of proving by "clear, unequivocal, and convincing" evidence, which does not leave "the issue in doubt," that the citizen who is sought to be restored to the status of an alien obtained his naturalization certificate illegally. Schneiderman v. United States, supra, 320 U. S. at page 158.

That strict test is necessary for several reasons. Citizenship obtained through naturalization is not a second-class citizenship. It has been said that citizenship carries with it all of the rights and prerogatives of citizenship obtained by birth in this country "save that of eligibility to the Presidency." Luria v. United States, 231 U. S. 9, 22. There are other exceptions of a limited character. But it is plain that citizenship obtained through naturalization carries with it the privilege of full participation in the affairs of our society, including the right to speak freely, to criticize officials and administrators, and to promote changes in our laws including the very Charter of our Government. Great tolerance and caution are necessary lest good faith exercise of the rights of citizenship be turned against the naturalized citizen and be used to deprive him of the cherished status. Ill-tempered expressions, extreme views, even the promotion of ideas which run counter to our American ideals, are not to be given disloyal connotations in absence of solid, convincing evidence that that is their significance. Any other course would run counter to our traditions and make denaturalization proceedings the ready instrument for political persecutions. As stated in Schneiderman v. United States, supra, 320 U. S. at page 159, "Were the law otherwise, valuable rights would rest upon a slender reed, and the security of the status of our naturalized citizens might depend in considerable degree upon the political temper of majority thought and the stresses of the times."

These are extremely serious problems. They involve not only fundamental principles of our political system designed for the protection of minorities and majorities alike. They also involve tremendously high stakes for the individual. For denaturalization, like deportation, may result in the loss "of all that makes life worth living." Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U. S. 276, 284. Hence, where the fate of a human being is at stake, we must not leave the presence of his evil purpose to conjecture. Cf. Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U. S. 135, 149. Furthermore, we are dealing in cases of this kind with questions of intent. Here it is whether Knauer swore falsely on April 13, 1937. Intent is a subjective state, illusory and difficult to establish in absence of voluntary confession. What may appear objectively to be false may still fall short of establishing an intentional misrepresentation which is necessary in order to prove that the oath was perjurious. And as Baumgartner v. United States, supra, indicates, utterances made in years subsequent to the oath are not readily to be charged against the state of mind existing when the oath was administered. 322 U. S. at page 675. Troubled times and the emotions of the hour may elicit expressions of sympathy for old acquaintances and relatives across the waters. "Forswearing past political allegiance without reservation and full assumption of the obligations of American citizenship are not at all inconsistent with cultural feelings imbedded in childhood and youth." Baumgartner v. United States, supra, 322 U. S. at page 674. Human ties are not easily broken. Old social or cultural loyalties may still exist, though basic allegiance is transferred here. The fundamental question is whether the new citizen still takes his orders from, or owes his allegiance to, a foreign chancellory. Far more is required to establish that fact than a showing that social and cultural ties remain. And even political utterances, which might be some evidence of a false oath if they clustered around the date of naturalization, are more and more unreliable as evidence of the perjurious falsity of the oath the further they are removed from the date of naturalization.

We have read with care the voluminous record in this case. We have considered the evidence which antedates Knauer's naturalization, (April 13, 1937), the evidence which clusters around that date, and that which follows it. We have considered Knauer's versions of the various episodes and the versions advanced by the several witnesses for the United States. We have considered the testimony and other evidence offered by each in corroboration or impeachment of the other's case. We have considered the appraisal of the veracity of the witnesses by the judge who saw and heard them and have given it that "due regard" required by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, rule 52(a). We conclude with the District Court and the Circuit Court of Appeals that there is solid, convincing evidence that Knauer before the date of his naturalization, at that time, and subsequent was a thorough-going Nazi and a faithful follower of Adolph Hitler. The conclusion is irresistible, therefore, that when he forswore allegiance to the German Reich he swore falsely. The character of the evidence, the veracity of the witnesses against Knauer as determined by the District Court, the corroboration of challenged evidence presented by the government, the consistent pattern of Knauer's conduct before and after naturalization convince us that the two lower courts were correct in their conclusions. The standard of proof, not satisfied in either the Schneiderman or Baumgartner cases, is therefore plainly met here.

We will review briefly what we, as well as the two lower courts, accept as the true version of the facts. [The Court's review of the facts is omitted.]

We have given merely the highlights of the evidence. Much corroborative detail could be added. But what we have related presents the gist of the case against Knauer. If isolated parts of the evidence against Knauer were separately considered, they might well carry different inferences. His alertness to rise to the defense of Germans or of Americans of German descent could well reflect, if standing as isolated instances, attempts to protect a minority against what he deemed oppressive practices. Social and cultural ties might be complete and adequate explanations. Even utterances of a political nature which reflected tolerance or approval of the Nazi program in Germany might carry no sinister connotation, if they were considered by themselves. For many native-borns in this country did not awaken to the full implications of the Nazi program until war came to us. * * *

But we have here much more than political utterances, much more than a crusade for the protection of minorities. This record portrays a program of action to further Hitler's cause in this nation—a program of infiltration which conforms to the pattern adopted by the Nazis in country after country. The ties with the German Reich were too intimate, the pattern of conduct too consistent, the overt acts too plain for us to conclude that Knauer was merely exercising his right of free speech either to spread tolerance in this country or to advocate changes here.

Moreover, the case against Knauer is not constructed solely from his activities subsequent to April 13, 1937—the date of his naturalization. The evidence prior to his naturalization, that which clusters around that date, and that which follows in the next few years is completely consistent. It conforms to the same pattern. We do not have to guess whether subsequent to naturalization he had a change of heart and threw himself wholeheartedly into a new cause. We have clear, convincing, and solid evidence that at all relevant times he was a thorough-going Nazi bent on sponsoring Hitler's cause here. And this case, unlike the Baumgartner case, is not complicated by the fact that when the alien took his oath Hitler was not in power. On April 13, 1937, Hitler was in full command. The evidence is most convincing that at that time, as well as later, Knauer's loyalty ran to him, not to this country.

The District Court properly ruled that membership in the Bund was not in itself sufficient to prove fraud which would warrant revocation of a decree of naturalization. Otherwise, guilt would rest on implication, contrary to the rule of the Schneiderman and Baumgartner cases. But we have here much more than that. We have a clear course of conduct, of which membership in the Bund was a manifestation, designed to promote the Nazi cause in this country. This is not a case of an underling caught up in the enthusiasm of a movement, driven by ties of blood and old associations to extreme attitudes, and perhaps unaware of the conflict of allegiance implicit in his actions. Knauer is an astute person. He is a leader—the dominating figure in the cause he sponsored, a leading voice in the councils of the Bund, the spokesman in the program for systematic agitation of Nazi views. His activities portray a shrewd, calculating, and vigilant promotion of an alien cause. The conclusion seems to us plain that when Knauer forswore allegiance to Hitler and the German Reich he swore falsely.

Moreover, when an alien takes the oath with reservations or does not in good faith forswear loyalty and allegiance to the old country, the decree of naturalization is obtained by deceit. The proceeding itself is then founded on fraud. A fraud is perpetrated on the naturalization court. We have recently considered the broad powers of equity to set aside a decree for fraud practiced on the court which granted it. Hazel-Atlas Glass Co. v. Hartford-Empire Co., 322 U. S. 238. The present suit is an equity suit. Luria v. United States, supra, 231 U. S. at pages 27, 28. But we need not consider in this case what the historic powers of equity might be in this situation. For Congress has provided that fraud is a basis for cancellation of certificates of naturalization in proceedings instituted by the United States. The legislative history of that enactment shows that false swearing was one of the evils included in the statutory grounds for denaturalization. That power was granted to give added protection against fraud committed on the naturalization courts. United States v. Ness, 245 U. S. 319, 324, 327. Cancellation of a certificate on the grounds of fraud includes cancellation for falsely swearing that the applicant forswore allegiance to his native country. Though the making of a false oath be called intrinsic fraud (see United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, supra), it is within the reach of the statute.

We have no doubt of the power of Congress to provide for denaturalization on the grounds of fraud. The Constitution grants Congress power "To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization." Article I, § 8. The power of denaturalization comes from that provision and the "necessary and proper" clause in Article I, § 8. See Tutun v. United States, 270 U. S. 568, 578. We do not have here a case where, after an alien has been naturalized, Congress provides new grounds which are invoked for cancellation of his certificate. Fraud—the basis of revocation with which we are now concerned—was a statutory ground for denaturalization when Knauer took his oath. Moreover, we are not faced with the question of what limits there may be to conditions for denaturalization which Congress may provide. A certificate obtained by fraud is clearly within the reach of Congressional power. * * * To hold otherwise would be an anomaly. It would in effect mean that where a person through concealment, misrepresentation or deceit perpetrated a fraud on the naturalization court, the United States would be remediless to correct the wrong. That would indeed put a premium on the successful perpetration of frauds against the nation. We cannot conclude that Congress, which may withhold the right of naturalization (Tutun v. United States, supra, 270 U. S. at page 578), is so powerless. We adhere to the prior rulings of this Court that Congress may provide for the cancellation of certificates of naturalization on the grounds of fraud in their procurement and thus protect the courts and the nation against practices of aliens who by deceitful methods obtain the cherished status of citizenship here, the better to serve a foreign master. * * *

Affirmed.

[MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case. MR. JUSTICE BLACK concurred specially. MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE, joined by MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, wrote a dissenting opinion which contained the following statement: "In my opinion the power to naturalize is not the power to denaturalize. The act of admission must be taken as final, for any cause which may have existed at that time. Otherwise there cannot but be two classes of citizens, one free and secure except for acts amounting to forfeiture within our tradition; the other conditional, timorous and insecure because blanketed with the threat that some act or conduct, not amounting to forfeiture for others, will be taken retrospectively to show that some prescribed condition had not been fulfilled and be so adjudged. I do not think such a difference was contemplated when Congress was authorized to provide for naturalization and the terms on which it should be granted."]

NOTES

1. The opinion in the Knauer case refers to Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 87 L. ed. 1796, 63 Sup. Ct. 1333 (1943) and Baumgartner v. United States, 322 U. S. 665, 88 L. ed. 1525, 64 Sup. Ct. 1240 (1944). In the Schneiderman case the United States brought suit in 1939 to cancel a certificate of citizenship awarded to defendant in 1927 on the ground of illegal procurement. Evidence was introduced to show that at the time of naturalization and for five years preceding, defendant was not attached to the principles of the Constitution in that he was a member of, and supported the doctrines of, the Communist Party and advocated the overthrow of the government by force and violence. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the lower court, which had set aside the certificate, on the ground that the government had failed to sustain the burden of proof by introducing "clear, unequivocal and convincing" evidence justifying such action. Chief Justice Stone, joined by Justices Roberts and Frankfurter, dissented. In the Baumgartner case the government sought in 1942 to set aside the naturalization decree granted to defendant, a native of Germany, in 1932. Evidence was adduced to show Baumgartner's admiration for the principles of Nazism and his devotion to Hitler. When defendant had renounced his allegiance to Germany it was still a republic; Hitler's later acquisition of power was greeted by defendant with enthusiasm. The Supreme Court, by a unanimous vote, reversed the judgment of the lower court on the ground of insufficiency of evidence. The opinion pointed out that evidence as to Baumgartner's attitude after 1932 afforded insufficient proof that in that year he had knowing reservations in forswearing his allegiance to the Weimar Republic and embracing allegiance to this country.

2. For a case in which the Supreme Court held that a judgment by default rendered against petitioner in a denaturalization proceeding should be reopened and a hearing on the merits granted, see Klapprott v. United States, 335 U. S. 601, 93 L. ed. 266, 69 Sup. Ct. 384 (1949).

3. In Blackmer v. United States, 284 U. S. 421, 76 L. ed. 375, 52 Sup. Ct. 252 (1932) the Supreme Court affirmed a decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia adjudging Blackmer, a citizen of the United States resident in France, guilty of contempt of that court for failure to respond to subpoenas served upon him in France and requiring him to appear as a witness on behalf of the United States at a criminal trial. The proceedings before the Supreme Court involved the satisfaction of a fine and costs out of property of Blackmer seized within the United States by order of the court. The court, through Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, said: "While it appears that the petitioner removed his residence to France in the year 1924, it is undisputed that he was, and continued to be, a citizen of the United States. He continued to owe allegiance to the United States. By virtue of his obligations of citizenship, the United States retained its authority over him, and he was bound by its laws made applicable to him in a foreign country. Thus, although resident abroad, the petitioner remained subject to the taxing power of the United States. Cook v. Tait, 265 U. S. 47, 54, 56. For disobedience to its laws through conduct abroad he was subject to punishment in the courts of the United States. United States v. Bowman, 260 U. S. 94, 102. With respect to such an exercise of authority, there is no question of international law, but solely of the purport of the municipal law which establishes the duties of the citizen in relation to his own government. While the legislation of the Congress, unless the contrary intent appears, is construed to apply only within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, the question of its application, so far as citizens of the United States in foreign countries are concerned, is one of construction, not of legislative power."

Section 2.—The Power Over Aliens.

FONG YUE TING v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1893.
149 U. S. 698, 37 L. ed. 905, 13 Sup. Ct. 1016.

[Appeals from the Circuit Court of the United States for the southern district of New York. A federal statute of May 5, 1892 required Chinese laborers within the limits of the United States at the time of the passage of the act to take out certificates of residence. Those who neglected to do so within one year without good cause were made liable to deportation, after proceedings before certain executive officers. These were three writs of habeas corpus granted by the Circuit Court, upon petition of Fong Yue Ting and two others, arrested and held by the marshal of the district for not having complied with the provisions of the act. In each case the court, after a hearing upon the writ of habeas corpus and the return of the marshal, dismissed the writ and allowed an appeal of the petitioner to the Supreme Court, admitting him to bail pending the appeal.]

MR. JUSTICE GRAY, after stating the facts, delivered the opinion of the Court.

The general principles of public law which lie at the foundation of these cases are clearly established by previous judgments of this Court, and by the authorities therein referred to.

In the recent case of Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U. S. 651, 659, the Court, in sustaining the action of the executive department, putting in force an act of Congress for the exclusion of aliens, said: "It is an accepted maxim of international law, that every sovereign nation has the power, as inherent in sovereignty, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe. In the United States, this power is vested in the national government, to which the Constitution has committed the entire control of international relations, in peace as well as in war. It belongs to the political department of the government, and may be exercised either through treaties made by the President and Senate, or through statutes enacted by Congress."

The same views were more fully expounded in the earlier case of Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U. S. 581, in which the validity of a former act of Congress, excluding Chinese laborers from the United States, under the circumstances therein stated, was affirmed.

In the elaborate opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Field, in behalf of the Court, it was said: "Those laborers are not citizens of the United States; they are aliens. That the government of the United States, through the action of the legislative department, can exclude aliens from its territory is a proposition which we do not think open to controversy. Jurisdiction over its own territory to that extent is an incident of every independent nation. It is a part of its independence. If it could not exclude aliens, it would be to that extent subject to the control of another power." "The United States, in their relation to foreign countries and their subjects or citizens, are one nation, invested with powers which belong to independent nations, the exercise of which can be invoked for the maintenance of its absolute independence and security throughout its entire territory." 130 U. S. 603, 604.

It was also said, repeating the language of Mr. Justice Bradley in Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. 457, 555: "The United States is not only a government, but it is a national government, and the only government in this country that has the character of nationality. It is invested with power over all the foreign relations of the country, war, peace, and negotiations and intercourse with other nations; all of which are forbidden to the State governments." 130 U. S. 605. And it was added: "For local interests the several States of the Union exist; but for international purposes, embracing our relations with foreign nations, we are but one people, one nation, one power." 130 U. S. 606.

The Court then went on to say: "To preserve its independence, and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment, is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated. It matters not in what form such aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character, or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. The government, possessing the powers which are to be exercised for protection and security, is clothed with authority to determine the occasion on which the powers shall be called forth; and its determination, so far as the subjects affected are concerned, is necessarily conclusive upon all its departments and officers.

The right of a nation to expel or deport foreigners, who have not been naturalized or taken any steps towards becoming citizens of the country, rests upon the same grounds, and is as absolute and unqualified as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country. * * *

The United States are a sovereign and independent nation, and are vested by the Constitution with the entire control of international relations, and with all the powers of government necessary to maintain that control and to make it effective. The only government of this country, which other nations recognize or treat with, is the government of the Union; and the only American flag known throughout the world is the flag of the United States. * * *

The power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the government, and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of Congress, and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute, or is required by the paramount law of the Constitution, to intervene. * * *

The power of Congress, therefore, to expel, like the power to exclude aliens, or any specified class of aliens, from the country, may be exercised entirely through executive officers; or Congress may call in the aid of the judiciary to ascertain any contested facts on which the alien's right to be in the country has been made by Congress to depend.

Congress, having the right, as it may see fit, to expel aliens of a particular class, or to permit them to remain, has undoubtedly the right to provide a system of registration and identification of the members of that class within the country, and to take all proper means to carry out the system which it provides. * * *

Sections 6 and 7 of the act of 1892 are the only sections which have any bearing on the cases before us, and the only ones, therefore, the construction or effect of which need now to be considered. The manifest objects of these sections are to provide a system of registration and identification of such Chinese laborers, to require them to obtain certificates of residence, and if they do not do so within a year, to have them deported from the United States. * * *

For the reasons stated in the earlier part of this opinion, Congress, under the power to exclude or expel aliens, might have directed any Chinese laborer, found in the United States without a certificate of residence, to be removed out of the country by executive officers, without judicial trial or examination, just as it might have authorized such officers absolutely to prevent his entrance into the country. But Congress has not undertaken to do this.

The effect of the provisions of section 6 of the act of 1892 is that, if a Chinese laborer, after an opportunity afforded him to obtain a certificate of residence within a year, at a convenient place, and without cost, is found without such a certificate, he shall be so far presumed to be not entitled to remain within the United States, that an officer of the customs, or a collector of internal revenue, or a marshal, or a deputy of either, may arrest him, not with a view to imprisonment or punishment, or to his immediate deportation without further inquiry, but in order to take him before a judge, for the purpose of a judicial hearing and determination of the only facts which, under the act of Congress, can have a material bearing upon the question whether he shall be sent out of the country, or be permitted to remain. * * *

The proceeding before a United States judge, as provided for in section 6 of the act of 1892, is in no proper sense a trial and sentence for a crime or offense. It is simply the ascertainment, by appropriate and lawful means, of the fact whether the conditions exist upon which Congress has enacted that an alien of this class may remain within the country. The order of deportation is not a punishment for crime. It is not a banishment, in the sense in which that word is often applied to the expulsion of a citizen from his country by way of punishment. It is but a method of enforcing the return to his own country of an alien who has not complied with the conditions upon the performance of which the government of the nation, acting within its constitutional authority and through the proper departments, has determined that his continuing to reside here shall depend. He has not, therefore, been deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; and the provisions of the Constitution securing the right of trial by jury, and prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures, and cruel and unusual punishments, have no application.

Upon careful consideration of the subject, the only conclusion which appears to us to be consistent with the principles of international law, with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and with the previous decisions of this Court, is that in each of these cases the judgment of the Circuit Court, dismissing the writ of habeas corpus, is right and must be. Affirmed.

[MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER and JUSTICES BREWER and FIELD each delivered a dissenting opinion.]

NOTES

1. A federal statute enacted in 1907 made it a felony to harbor for any immoral purpose any alien woman within three years after her entry into the United States, and provided for the deportation of any alien woman found practicing prostitution within this period. Defendant, an operator of a house of prostitution, was indicted and convicted for violation of this statute. In Keller v. United States, 213 U. S. 138, 53 L. ed. 737, 29 Sup. Ct. 470, 16 Ann. Cas. 1066 (1909), defendant's conviction was reversed and the statute held invalid, the court saying: "But can it be within the power of Congress to control all the dealings of our citizens with resident aliens? If this be possible, the door is open to the assumption by the national government of an almost unlimited body of legislation." Justice Holmes, with the concurrence of Justices Harlan and Moody, dissented on the ground that if Congress can forbid the entry and order the subsequent deportation of professional prostitutes, it can punish not only those who cooperate in their fraudulent entry but also those who cooperate in an equally unlawful stay.

2. In Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U. S. 52, 85 L. ed. 581, 61 Sup. Ct. 399 (1941) it was held that the federal Alien Registration Act of 1940 rendered a nonconflicting state alien registration law inoperative, three justices dissenting. Mr. Justice Black, speaking for the court, said that when Congress enacted this law "it plainly manifested a purpose to do so in such a way as to protect the personal liberties of law-abiding aliens through one uniform national registration system, and to leave them free from the possibility of inquisitorial practices and police surveillance that might not only affect our international relations but might also generate the very disloyalty which the law has intended guarding against."

SHAUGHNESSY v. UNITED STATES EX REL. MEZEL

Supreme Court of the United States, 1953.
345 U. S. 206, 97 L. ed. 956, 73 Sup. Ct. 625.

MR. JUSTICE CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case concerns an alien immigrant permanently excluded from the United States on security grounds but stranded in his temporary haven on Ellis Island because other countries will not take him back. The issue is whether the Attorney General's continued exclusion of respondent without a hearing amounts to an unlawful detention, so that courts may admit him temporarily to the United States on bond until arrangements are made for his departure abroad. After a hearing on respondent's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the District Court so held and authorized his temporary admission on $5,000 bond.

The Court of Appeals affirmed that action, but directed reconsideration of the terms of the parole. Accordingly, the District Court entered a modified order reducing bond to $3,000 and permitting respondent to travel and reside in Buffalo, New York. Bond was posted and respondent released. Because of resultant serious problems in the enforcement of the immigration laws, we granted certiorari. 344 U. S. 809.

Respondent's present dilemma springs from these circumstances: Though, as the District Court observed, "[t]here is a certain vagueness about [his] history," respondent seemingly was born in Gibraltar of Hungarian or Rumanian parents and lived in the United States from 1923 to 1948. In May of that year he sailed for Europe, apparently to visit his dying mother in Rumania. Denied entry there, he remained in Hungary for some 19 months, due to "difficulty in securing an exit permit." Finally, armed with a quota immigration visa issued by the American Consul in Budapest, he proceeded to France and boarded the Ile de France in Le Havre bound for New York. Upon arrival on February 9, 1950, he was temporarily excluded from the United States by an immigration inspector acting pursuant to the Passport Act as amended and regulations thereunder. Pending disposition of his case he was received at Ellis Island. After reviewing the evidence, the Attorney General on May 10, 1950, ordered the temporary exclusion to be made permanent without a hearing before a board of special inquiry, on the "basis of information of a confidential nature, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interest." That determination rested on a finding that respondent's entry would be prejudicial to the public interest for security reasons. But thus far all attempts to effect respondent's departure have failed: Twice he shipped out to return whence he came; France and Great Britain refused him permission to land. The State Department has unsuccessfully negotiated with Hungary for his readmission. Respondent personally applied for entry to about a dozen Latin American countries but all turned him down. So in June 1951 respondent advised the Immigration and Naturalization Service that he would exert no further efforts to depart. In short, respondent sat on Ellis Island because this country shut him out and others were unwilling to take him in.

Asserting unlawful confinement on Ellis Island, he sought relief through a series of habeas corpus proceedings. After four unsuccessful efforts on respondent's part, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York on November 9, 1951, sustained the writ. The District Judge, vexed by the problem of "an alien who has no place to go," did not question the validity of the exclusion order but deemed further "detention" after 21 months excessive and justifiable only by affirmative proof of respondent's danger to the public safety. When the Government declined to divulge such evidence, even in camera, the District Court directed respondent's conditional parole on bond. By a divided vote, the Court of Appeals affirmed. Postulating that the power to hold could never be broader than the power to remove or shut out and that to "continue an alien's confinement beyond that moment when deportation becomes patently impossible is to deprive him of his liberty," the court found respondent's "confinement" no longer justifiable as a means of removal elsewhere, thus not authorized by statute, and in violation of due process. Judge Learned Hand, dissenting, took a different view. The Attorney General's order was one of "exclusion" and not "deportation"; respondent's transfer from ship to shore on Ellis Island conferred no additional rights; in fact, no alien so situated "can force us to admit him at all."

Courts have long recognized the power to expel or exclude aliens as a fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government's political departments largely immune from judicial control. The Chinese Exclusion Case (Chae Chan Ping v. United States), 130 U. S. 581; Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698; United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U. S. 537; Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U. S. 580. In the exercise of these powers, Congress expressly authorized the President to impose additional restrictions on aliens entering or leaving the United States during periods of international tension and strife. That authorization, originally enacted in the Passport Act of 1918, continues in effect during the present emergency. Under it, the Attorney General, acting for the President, may shut out aliens whose "entry would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States." And he may exclude without a hearing when the exclusion is based on confidential information the disclosure of which may be prejudicial to the public interest. The Attorney General in this case proceeded in accord with these provisions; he made the necessary determinations and barred the alien from entering the United States.

It is true that aliens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law. The Japanese Immigrant Case (Kaoru Yamataya v. Fisher), 189 U. S. 86, 100-101; Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U. S. 33, 49-50; Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, 344 U. S. 590, 598. But an alien on the threshold of initial entry stands on a different footing: "Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned." United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, supra, 338 U. S. at page 544; Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U. S. 651, 660. And because the action of the executive officer under such authority is final and conclusive, the Attorney General cannot be compelled to disclose the evidence underlying his determinations in an exclusion case; "it is not within the province of any court, unless expressly authorized by law, to review the determination of the political branch of the Government." United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, supra, 338 U. S. at page 543; Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, supra, 142 U. S. at page 660. In a case such as this, courts cannot retry the determination of the Attorney General. United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, supra, 338 U. S. at page 546; Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U. S. 160, 171-172.

Neither respondent's harborage on Ellis Island nor his prior residence here transforms this into something other than an exclusion proceeding. Concededly, his movements are restrained by authority of the United States, and he may by habeas corpus test the validity of his exclusion. But that is true whether he enjoys temporary refuge on land, Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, supra, or remains continuously aboard ship. United States v. Jung Ah Lung, 124 U. S. 621, 626; Chin Yow v. United States, 208 U. S. 8, 12. In sum, harborage at Ellis Island is not an entry into the United States. * * * For purposes of the immigration laws, moreover, the legal incidents of an alien's entry remain unaltered whether he has been here once before or not. He is an entering alien just the same, and may be excluded if unqualified for admission under existing immigration laws. * * *

To be sure, a lawful resident alien may not captiously be deprived of his constitutional rights to procedural due process. Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, 344 U. S. 590, 601; Cf. Delgadillo v. Carmichael, 332 U. S. 388. Only the other day we held that under some circumstances temporary absence from our shores cannot constitutionally deprive a returning lawfully resident alien of his right to be heard. Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, supra. Chew, an alien seaman admitted by an Act of Congress to permanent residence in the United States, signed articles of maritime employment as chief steward on a vessel of American registry with home port in New York City. Though cleared by the Coast Guard for his voyage, on his return from four months at sea he was "excluded" without a hearing on security grounds. On the facts of that case, including reference to § 307(d) (2) of the Nationality Act of 1940, 8 U. S. C. § 707(d) (2) [F. C. A. § 707(d) (2)], we felt justified in "assimilating" his status for constitutional purposes to that of continuously present alien residents entitled to hearings at least before an executive or administrative tribunal. Id., 344 U. S. at pages 596, 599-601. Accordingly, to escape constitutional conflict we held the administrative regulations authorizing exclusion without hearing in certain security cases inapplicable to aliens so protected by the Fifth Amendment. Id., 344 U. S. at page 600.

But respondent's history here drastically differs from that disclosed in Chew's case. Unlike Chew who with full security clearance and documentation pursued his vocation for four months aboard an American ship, respondent, apparently without authorization or reentry papers, simply left the United States and remained behind the Iron Curtain for 19 months. Moreover, while § 307 of the 1940 Nationality Act regards maritime service such as Chew's to be continuous residence for naturalization purposes, that section deems protracted absence such as respondent's a clear break in an alien's continuous residence here. In such circumstances, we have no difficulty in holding respondent an entrant alien or "assimilated to [that] status" for constitutional purposes. Id., 344 U. S. at page 599. That being so, the Attorney General may lawfully exclude respondent without a hearing as authorized by the emergency regulations promulgated pursuant to the Passport Act. Nor need he disclose the evidence upon which that determination rests. United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U. S. 537.

There remains the issue of respondent's continued exclusion on Ellis Island. Aliens seeking entry from contiguous lands obviously can be turned back at the border without more. United States ex rel. Polymeris v. Trudell, 284 U. S. 279. While the Government might keep entrants by sea aboard the vessel pending determination of their admissibility, resulting hardships to the alien and inconvenience to the carrier persuaded Congress to adopt a more generous course. By statute it authorized, in cases such as this, aliens' temporary removal from ship to shore. But such temporary harborage, an act of legislative grace, bestows no additional rights. Congress meticulously specified that such shelter ashore "shall not be considered a landing" nor relieve the vessel of the duty to transport back the alien if ultimately excluded. And this Court has long considered such temporary arrangements as not affecting an alien's status; he is treated as if stopped at the border. * * *

Thus we do not think that respondent's continued exclusion deprives him of any statutory or constitutional right. It is true that resident aliens temporarily detained pending expeditious consummation of deportation proceedings may be released on bond by the Attorney General whose discretion is subject to judicial review. Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524. By that procedure aliens uprooted from our midst may rejoin the community until the Government effects their leave. An exclusion proceeding grounded on danger to the national security, however, presents different considerations; neither the rationale nor the statutory authority for such release exists. Ordinarily to admit an alien barred from entry on security grounds nullifies the very purpose of the exclusion proceeding; Congress in 1950 declined to include such authority in the statute. That exclusion by the United States plus other nations' inhospitality results in present hardship cannot be ignored. But, the times being what they are, Congress may well have felt that other countries ought not shift the onus to us; that an alien in respondent's position is no more ours than theirs. Whatever our individual estimate of that policy and the fears on which it rests, respondent's right to enter the United States depends on the congressional will, and courts cannot substitute their judgment for the legislative mandate. Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U. S. 580, 590-591.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS concurs, dissenting. * * *

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON forcefully points out the danger in the Court's holding that Mezei's liberty is completely at the mercy of the unreviewable discretion of the Attorney General. I join MR. JUSTICE JACKSON in the belief that Mezei's continued imprisonment without a hearing violates due process of law.

No society is free where government makes one person's liberty depend upon the arbitrary will of another. Dictatorships have done this since time immemorial. They do now. Russian laws of 1934 authorized the People's Commissariat to imprison, banish and exile Russian citizens as well as "foreign subjects who are socially dangerous." Hitler's secret police were given like powers. German courts were forbidden to make any inquiry whatever as to the information on which the police acted. Our Bill of Rights was written to prevent such oppressive practices. Under it this Nation has fostered and protected individual freedom. The Founders abhorred arbitrary one-man imprisonments. Their belief was—our constitutional principles are—that no person of any faith, rich or poor, high or low, native or foreigner, white or colored, can have his life, liberty or property taken "without due process of law." This means to me that neither the federal police nor federal prosecutors nor any other governmental official, whatever his title, can put or keep people in prison without accountability to courts of justice. It means that individual liberty is too highly prized in this country to allow executive officials to imprison and hold people on the basis of information kept secret from courts. It means that Mezei should not be deprived of his liberty indefinitely except as the result of a fair open court hearing in which evidence is appraised by the court, not by the prosecutor.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, whom MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER joins, dissenting.

Fortunately it still is startling, in this country, to find a person held indefinitely in executive custody without accusation of crime or judicial trial. Executive imprisonment has been considered oppressive and lawless since John, at Runnymede, pledged that no free man should be imprisoned, dispossessed, outlawed, or exiled save by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land. The judges of England developed the writ of habeas corpus largely to preserve these immunities from executive restraint. Under the best tradition of Anglo-American law, courts will not deny hearing to an unconvicted prisoner just because he is an alien whose keep, in legal theory, is just outside our gates. Lord Mansfield, in the celebrated case holding that slavery was unknown to the common law of England, ran his writ of habeas corpus in favor of an alien, an African Negro slave, and against the master of a ship at anchor in the Thames. * * *

Our law may, and rightly does, place more restrictions on the alien than on the citizen. But basic fairness in hearing procedures does not vary with the status of the accused. If the procedures used to judge this alien are fair and just, no good reason can be given why they should not be extended to simplify the condemnation of citizens. If they would be unfair to citizens, we cannot defend the fairness of them when applied to the more helpless and handicapped alien. This is at the root of our holdings that the resident alien must be given a fair hearing to test an official claim that he is one of a deportable class. Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U. S. 33.

The most scrupulous observance of due process, including the right to know a charge, to be confronted with the accuser, to cross-examine informers and to produce evidence in one's behalf, is especially necessary where the occasion of detention is fear of future misconduct, rather than crimes committed. Both the old proceeding by which one may be bound to keep the peace and the newer British "preventive detention" are safeguarded with full rights to judicial hearings for the accused. On the contrary, the Nazi regime in Germany installed a system of "protective custody" by which the arrested could claim no judicial or other hearing process, and as a result the concentration camps were populated with victims of summary executive detention for secret reasons. That is what renders Communist justice such a travesty. There are other differences, to be sure, between authoritarian procedure and common law, but differences in the process of administration make all the difference between a reign of terror and one of law. Quite unconsciously, I am sure, the Government's theory of custody for "safekeeping" without disclosure to the victim of charges, evidence, informers or reasons, even in an administrative proceeding, has unmistakable overtones of the "protective custody" of the Nazis more than of any detaining procedure known to the common law. Such a practice, once established with the best of intentions, will drift into oppression of the disadvantaged in this country as surely as it has elsewhere. That these apprehensive surmises are not "such stuff as dreams are made on" appears from testimony of a top immigration official concerning an applicant that "He has no rights."

Because the respondent has no right of entry, does it follow that he has no rights at all? Does the power to exclude mean that exclusion may be continued or effectuated by any means which happen to seem appropriate to the authorities? It would effectuate his exclusion to eject him bodily into the sea or to set him adrift in a rowboat. Would not such measures be condemned judicially as a deprivation of life without due process of law? Suppose the authorities decide to disable an alien from entry by confiscating his valuables and money. Would we not hold this a taking of property without due process of law? Here we have a case that lies between the taking of life and the taking of property; it is the taking of liberty. It seems to me that this, occurring within the United States or its territorial waters, may be done only by proceedings which meet the test of due process of law.

Exclusion of an alien without judicial hearing, of course, does not deny due process when it can be accomplished merely by turning him back on land or returning him by sea. But when indefinite confinement becomes the means of enforcing exclusion, it seems to me that due process requires that the alien be informed of its grounds and have a fair chance to overcome them. This is the more due him when he is entrapped into leaving the other shore by reliance on a visa which the Attorney General refuses to honor. * * *

The Communist conspiratorial technique of infiltration poses a problem which sorely tempts the Government to resort to confinement of suspects on secret information secretly judged. I have not been one to discount the Communist evil. But my apprehensions about the security of our form of government are about equally aroused by those who refuse to recognize the dangers of Communism and those who will not see danger in anything else. * * *

It is inconceivable to me that this measure of simple justice and fair dealing would menace the security of this country. No one can make me believe that we are that far gone.

NOTES

1. An American veteran of World War II, a naturalized citizen, married, with the approval of the commanding general in Germany, a German-born woman who was a civilian employee of the War Department in Germany. When she sought to enter the United States under the War Brides Act, the Attorney-General, under the authority of wartime security regulations, excluded her without a hearing upon the finding that her admission would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States and that disclosure of the confidential information on which such finding was based would likewise endanger the public security. The Supreme Court held that the determination of the Attorney-General was not reviewable by the courts, and that the pertinent regulations were not invalid as an undue delegation of legislative power or violation of due process of law, since an alien seeking admission to this country may not do so under any claim of right, and the power to exclude him stems not alone from legislative power but is inherent in the executive power to control the foreign affairs of the nation. Justices Frankfurter, Jackson and Black dissented; Justices Douglas and Clark did not participate. United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U. S. 537, 94 L. ed. 317, 70 Sup. Ct. 309 (1950).

2. Certain aliens, former members of the Communist Party, were ordered deported on the ground that, after entering the United States, they had become members while this party advocated overthrow of the government by force or violence. The deportation orders were based on a provision of the Alien Registration Act of 1940 which requires deportation of any alien who was at the time of entering the United States or has been "at any time thereafter" a member of an organization advocating the unlawful overthrow of the government. Attacks upon the validity of this provision were rejected by the Supreme Court in Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U. S. 580, 96 L. ed. 586, 72 Sup. Ct. 512 (1952). It was held that the United States had power to expel an alien, notwithstanding his long residence in this country, that the exercise of this power by the challenged statute violated neither due process nor the right of free speech, that the provision for deportation because of membership prior to the effective date of the statute did not constitute an ex post facto law, and that, in any event, this prohibition was not applicable to the deportation of aliens. Justices Douglas and Black dissented.

3. In Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U. S. 135, 89 L. ed. 2103, 65 Sup. Ct. 1443 (1945) one of the grounds for the Supreme Court's reversal of an order for the deportation of Bridges was that the administrative proceedings had been unfair in that certain evidence had been improperly received. The government's case was based upon allegations that Bridges was deportable because of membership in, or affiliation with, the Communist Party. On this point the court held that the evidence, while establishing cooperation with the Communist Party, did not show membership or affiliation within the meaning of the statute. Chief Justice Stone and Justices Roberts and Frankfurter dissented.

4. A naturalized American citizen was convicted of a conspiracy to violate the Espionage Act of 1917. Subsequently his citizenship was revoked and his certificate of naturalization canceled on the ground of fraud in the procurement thereof. After the required hearings, his deportation was ordered by the Attorney-General under an act of Congress permitting the deportation of "aliens" so convicted. The Supreme Court held that the act applied to denaturalized persons, regardless of whether their citizenship was canceled before or after conviction. Justices Frankfurter, Black and Jackson dissented on the ground that the statute should be read to apply only to one who was an alien when convicted. United States ex rel. Eichenlaub v. Shaughnessy, 338 U. S. 521, 94 L. ed. 307, 70 Sup. Ct. 329 (1950).

5. An alien may be deported for membership in the Communist Party without proof that he knew the party advocates the violent overthrow of the government and even though his membership was terminated before passage of the Internal Security Act of 1950 and before there were any legal sanctions against such membership. Petitioner, an alien of Mexican birth who had been living in the United States for thirty-six years and was a member of the party from 1944 to 1946, was ordered deported on that specific ground by a hearing officer for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. The court sustained the act (Justices Black and Douglas dissenting) against the petitioner's allegation of its invalidity as applied to him. In an opinion by Mr. Justice Frankfurter it was held that support, or even demonstrated knowledge, of the party's advocacy of violence was not a prerequisite to deportation under the Act. The court met the due process argument by citing the congressional finding, expressed in the Act, that the Communist movement is a world-wide conspiracy of revolution and terrorism, and it relied upon the broad power of Congress over the admission of aliens and their right to remain, touching as it does basic aspects of national sovereignty. Galvan v. Press, 347 U. S. 522, 98 L. ed. 911, 74 Sup. Ct. 737 (1954).

6. In Barber v. Gonzales, 347 U. S. 637, 98 L. ed. 1009, 74 Sup. Ct. 822 (1954) it was held that a Filipino, born a national of the United States in the Philippine Islands, who entered the continental United States prior to the passage of the Philippine Independence Act of 1934, and who was sentenced to imprisonment thereafter for crimes involving moral turpitude, could not be deported as an alien who "after entry" committed such crimes. The court reasoned that Gonzales had not made an "entry" into the United States within the meaning of the applicable statute, since his arrival was as a national moving from one of our insular possessions to the mainland. Justices Minton, Reed and Burton dissented.

Section 3.—The Privileges and Immunities of United States Citizens.

SLAUGHTER-HOUSE CASES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1873.
16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394.

MR. JUSTICE MILLER now, April 14, 1873, delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases are brought here by writs of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. They arise out of the efforts of the butchers of New Orleans to resist the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company in the exercise of certain powers conferred by the charter which created it, and which was granted by the legislature of that state. * * *

The records show that the plaintiffs in error relied upon, and asserted throughout the entire course of the litigation in the state courts, that the grant of privileges in the charter of defendant, which they were contesting, was a violation of the most important provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth articles of amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The jurisdiction and the duty of this court to review the judgment of the state court on those questions is clear and is imperative.

The statute thus assailed as unconstitutional was passed March 8, 1869, and is entitled "An Act to protect the health of the City of New Orleans, to locate the stock-landings and slaughter-houses, and to incorporate the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company." * * *

It declares that the company, after it shall have prepared all the necessary buildings, yards, and other conveniences for that purpose, shall have the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on the live-stock landing and slaughter-house business within the limits and privilege granted by the Act, and that all such animals shall be landed at the stock-landings and slaughtered at the slaughter-houses of the company, and nowhere else. Penalties are enacted for infractions of this provision, and prices fixed for the maximum charges of the company for each steamboat and for each animal landed.

Section five orders the closing up of all other stock-landing and slaughter-houses after the first day of June, in the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and St. Bernard, and makes it the duty of the company to permit any person to slaughter animals in their slaughter-houses under a heavy penalty for each refusal. Another section fixes a limit to the charges to be made by the company for each animal so slaughtered in their building, and another provides for an inspection of all animals intended to be so slaughtered, by an officer appointed by the governor of the state for that purpose. * * *

The Act divides itself into two main grants of privilege,—the one in reference to stock-landings and stock-yards, and the other to slaughter-houses. That the landing of live-stock in large droves, from steamboats on the bank of the river, and from railroad trains, should, for the safety and comfort of the people and the care of the animals, be limited to proper places, and those not numerous, it needs no argument to prove. Nor can it be injurious to the general community that while the duty of making ample preparation for this is imposed upon a few men, or a corporation, they should, to enable them to do it successfully, have the exclusive right of providing such landing-places, and receiving a fair compensation for the service.

It is, however, the slaughter-house privilege, which is mainly relied on to justify the charges of gross injustice to the public, and invasion of private right.

It is not, and cannot be successfully controverted, that it is both the right and the duty of the legislative body—the supreme power of the state or municipality—to prescribe and determine the localities where the business of slaughtering for a great city may be conducted. To do this effectively it is indispensable that all persons who slaughter animals for food shall do it in those places and nowhere else.

The statute under consideration defines these localities and forbids slaughtering in any other. It does not, as has been asserted, prevent the butcher from doing his own slaughtering. On the contrary, the Slaughter-House Company is required, under a heavy penalty, to permit any person who wishes to do so, to slaughter in their houses; and they are bound to make ample provision for the convenience of all the slaughtering for the entire city. The butcher then is still permitted to slaughter, to prepare, and to sell his own meats; but he is required to slaughter at a specified place and to pay a reasonable compensation for the use of the accommodations furnished him at that place.

The wisdom of the monopoly granted by the legislature may be open to question, but it is difficult to see a justification for the assertion that the butchers are deprived of the right to labor in their occupation, or the people of their daily service in preparing food, or how this statute, with the duties and guards imposed upon the company, can be said to destroy the business of the butcher, or seriously interfere with its pursuit.

The power here exercised by the legislature of Louisiana is, in its essential nature, one which has been, up to the present period in the constitutional history of this country, always conceded to belong to the states, however it may now be questioned in some of its details. * * *

It may, therefore, be considered as established, that the authority of the legislature of Louisiana to pass the present statute is ample, unless some restraint in the exercise of that power be found in the constitution of that state or in the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, adopted since the date of the decisions we have already cited.

If any such restraint is supposed to exist in the constitution of the state, the Supreme Court of Louisiana having necessarily passed on that question, it would not be open to review in this court.

The plaintiffs in error accepting this issue, allege that the statute is a violation of the Constitution of the United States in these several particulars:—

That it abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; * * *.

The first section of the fourteenth article, to which our attention is more specially invited, opens with a definition of citizenship—not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the states. * * *

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a state, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several states. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a state against the legislative power of his own state, that the word citizen of the state should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the state, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the state as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The first occurrence of the words "privileges and immunities" in our constitutional history, is to be found in the fourth of the Articles of the old Confederation. * * *

In the Constitution of the United States, which superseded the Articles of Confederation, the corresponding provision is found in section two of the fourth article, in the following words: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." * * *

Fortunately we are not without judicial construction of this clause of the Constitution. * * * [Here the Court cites and briefly considers Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 430, and Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 180.]

The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights, which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the states. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the state in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the state governments over the rights of its own citizens.

Its sole purpose was to declare to the several states, that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction.

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority, that up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretence was set up that those rights depended on the federal government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the federal Constitution imposed upon the states—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the states, and without that of the federal government. Was it the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment, by the simple declaration that no state should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned, from the states to the federal government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the states?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by state legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the states, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the states, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the state governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the state and federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people; the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the states which ratified them.

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belong to citizens of the states as such, and that they are left to the state governments for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the federal government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no state can abridge, until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

But lest it should be said that no such privileges and immunities are to be found if those we have been considering are excluded, we venture to suggest some which owe their existence to the federal government, its national character, its Constitution, or its laws.

One of these is well described in the case of Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 36. It is said to be the (a) right of the citizen of this great country, protected by implied guarantees of its Constitution, "to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have upon that government, to transact any business he may have with it, to seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its seaports, through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted, to the sub-treasuries, land offices, and courts of justices in the several states." And quoting from the language of Chief Justice Taney in another case, it is said "that for all the great purposes for which the federal government was established, we are one people, with one common country, we are all citizens of the United States;" and it is, as such citizens, that their rights are supported in this court in Crandall v. Nevada.

Another (b) privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the federal government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Of this there can be no doubt, nor that the right depends upon his character as a citizen of the United States. (c) The right to peaceably assemble and petition for redress of grievances, (d) the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are rights of the citizen guaranteed by the federal Constitution. (e) The right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several states, (f) all rights secured to our citizens by treaties with foreign nations, are dependent upon citizenship of the United States, and not citizenship of a state. One of these privileges is conferred by the very article under consideration. (g) It is that a citizen of the United States can, of his own volition, become a citizen of any state of the Union by a bona fide residence therein, with the same rights as other citizens of that state. To these may be added the rights secured by the (h) Thirteenth and (i) Fifteenth articles of amendment, and (j) by the other clause of the Fourteenth, next to be considered.

But it is useless to pursue this branch of the inquiry, since we are of opinion that the rights claimed by these plaintiffs in error, if they have any existence, are not privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States within the meaning of the clause of the Fourteenth Amendment under consideration. * * *

The argument has not been much pressed in these cases that the defendant's charter deprives the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law, or that it denies to them the equal protection of the law. The first of these paragraphs has been in the Constitution since the adoption of the Fifth Amendment, as a restraint upon the federal power. It is also to be found in some form of expression in the constitutions of nearly all the states, as a restraint upon the power of the states. This law, then, has practically been the same as it now is during the existence of the government, except so far as the present amendment may place the restraining power over the states in this matter in the hands of the federal government.

We are not without judicial interpretation, therefore, both state and national, of the meaning of this clause. And it is sufficient to say that under no construction of that provision that we have ever seen, or any that we deem admissible, can the restraint imposed by the State of Louisiana upon the exercise of their trade by the butchers of New Orleans be held to be a deprivation of property within the meaning of that provision.

"Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

In the light of the history of these amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the states where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

If, however, the states did not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation. We doubt very much whether any action of a state not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision. It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other. But as it is a state that is to be dealt with, and not alone the validity of its laws, we may safely leave that matter until Congress shall have exercised its power, or some case of state oppression, by denial of equal justice in its courts, shall have claimed a decision at our hands. We find no such case in the one before us, and do not deem it necessary to go over the argument again, as it may have relation to this particular clause of the amendment.

In the early history of the organization of the government, its statesmen seem to have divided on the line which should separate the powers of the national government from those of the state governments, and though this line has never been very well defined in public opinion, such a division has continued from that day to this.

The adoption of the first eleven amendments to the Constitution so soon after the original instrument was accepted, shows a prevailing sense of danger at that time from the federal power. And it cannot be denied that such a jealousy continued to exist with many patriotic men until the breaking out of the late Civil War. It was then discovered that the true danger to the perpetuity of the Union was in the capacity of the state organizations to combine and concentrate all the powers of the state, and of contiguous states, for a determined resistance to the general government.

Unquestionably this has given great force to the argument, and added largely to the number, of those who believe in the necessity of a strong national government.

But, however pervading this sentiment, and however it may have contributed to the adoption of the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the states with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the states, and to confer additional power on that of the nation.

But whatever fluctuations may be seen in the history of public opinion on this subject during the period of our national existence, we think it will be found that this court, so far as its functions required, has always held with a steady and an even hand the balance between state and federal power, and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution, or of any of its parts.

The judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases are Affirmed.

[MR. CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE AND JUSTICES FIELD, SWAYNE AND BRADLEY dissented, the last three delivering dissenting opinions. In summary their view was, that the restrictive definition given by the majority rendered the clause nugatory, that with nation-conferred privileges and immunities "no state could ever have interfered by its laws, and no new constitutional provision was required to inhibit such interference. The supremacy of the Constitution and the laws of the United States always controlled any state legislation of that character;" that rightly understood the privileges and immunities meant were the traditionally recognized rights of free men such as were enumerated in the Declaration of Independence and by Justice Washington in Corfield v. Coryell, the rights to life, liberty and property, including rights to engage in the common callings, professions and trades except as these might be regulated for the public welfare and by uniform regulations applicable to all persons; that the portion of the act which entirely prohibited all but the favored corporation from owning slaughter-houses in so large an area was not reasonably necessary to the protection of the health of the community.]

MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY said: "The granting of monopolies, or exclusive privileges to individuals or corporations, is an invasion of the rights of others to choose a lawful calling, and an infringement of personal liberty. * * * Admitting, therefore, that formerly the states were not prohibited from infringing any of the fundamental privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, except in a few specified cases, that cannot be said now, since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. In my judgment it was the intention of the people of this country in adopting that amendment to provide National security against violation by the states of the fundamental rights of the citizen."

NOTES

1. The Slaughter-House Cases gave rise to one of the most prolonged periods of indecision that the Supreme Court has ever experienced. The membership of the Court had completely changed since the decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393, 15 L. ed. 691 (1857). The Fourteenth Amendment, the second of the reconstruction Amendments, became operative July 28, 1868, and was now before the Court for its first interpretation. The records in the cases were filed in the Supreme Court in 1870. The cases were argued in January, 1872, and reargued in February, 1873, and in April were decided by a five-to-four majority. See 3 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), ch. 32.

2. The decision in the Slaughter-House Cases had the practical effect of rendering the privileges or immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment a dead letter. In the language of Mr. Justice Field's dissent, it became "a vain and idle enactment, which accomplished nothing, and most unnecessarily excited Congress and the people on its passage." The effect of the decision was to forbid the states from abridging any privilege or immunity granted to citizens of the United States by the federal Constitution or by federal statutes or treaties. This result, of course, had already been achieved by the "supremacy clause" of Article VI. As a matter of fact, the supremacy clause is considerably broader in scope because it serves to protect the alien, as well as the citizen, and not merely from state legislation but from state action of any kind which infringes upon any right conferred by federal law.

Until 1935, the Supreme Court repeatedly refused to modify the position taken in the Slaughter-House Cases. During this period forty-five cases went to the court in which the argument was advanced by counsel that the challenged state legislation infringed the privileges or immunities clause. In none of them was the contention upheld. But in Colgate v. Harvey, 296 U. S. 404, 80 L. ed. 299, 56 Sup. Ct. 252, 102 A. L. R. 54 (1935) the court held that an income tax law of Vermont which subjected to a 4 per cent tax interest derived from money loans, except loans made within the state where the rate of interest was not more than 5 per cent, was invalid as an abridgement of a privilege of federal citizenship: the right to lend money in a state other than that in which the citizen resides, free from discriminatory taxation by the latter state. Justice Stone wrote a dissenting opinion concurred in by Justices Brandeis and Cardozo. Five years later, in Madden v. Kentucky, 309 U. S. 83, 84 L. ed. 590, 60 Sup. Ct. 406, 125 A. L. R. 1383 (1940) a similar law of Kentucky was held valid and Colgate v. Harvey was expressly overruled.

In Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160, 86 L. ed. 119, 62 Sup. Ct. 164 (1941) defendant was convicted of violating a California statute which forbade bringing into the state any non-resident indigent person. The court unanimously held the statute unconstitutional and set aside the conviction. Five of the justices rested the decision on the commerce clause, reading it as impliedly forbidding states to make such a regulation of interstate commerce. Justice Douglas, in a separate opinion in which Justices Black and Murphy concurred, rested the result on the privileges or immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, expressly leaving open the question whether the commerce clause was violated. Justice Jackson in a separate opinion thought the result sustainable under either clause but preferred to rest it on the privileges or immunities clause. Justice Douglas argued that "the right to move freely from state to state is an incident of national citizenship protected by the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment against state interference." He conceded that this right was not specifically granted by the Constitution but pointed out that "before the Fourteenth Amendment it was recognized as a right fundamental to the national character of our federal government." He cited Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 35, 18 L. ed. 745 (1868), a decision rendered prior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, in which the court held unconstitutional a Nevada tax "upon every person leaving the state" by common carrier, on the ground that the right to move freely throughout the nation was a right of national citizenship. In Justice Douglas' view the fact "that the right was implied did not make it any the less 'guaranteed' by the Constitution."

In Snowden v. Hughes, 321 U. S. 1, 6-7, 88 L. ed. 497, 64 Sup. Ct. 397 (1944) Chief Justice Stone made the following restatement of the meaning of this clause: "The protection extended to citizens of the United States by the privileges and immunities clause includes those rights and privileges which, under the laws and Constitution of the United States, are incident to citizenship of the United States, but does not include rights pertaining to state citizenship and derived solely from the relationship of the citizen and his state established by state law. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 74, 79; Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S. 525, 538; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Cheek, 259 U. S. 530, 539; Madden v. Kentucky, 309 U. S. 83, 90-93. The right to become a candidate for state office, like the right to vote for the election of state officers, Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 170-178; Pope v. Williams, 193 U. S. 621, 632; Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U. S. 277, 283, is a right or privilege of state citizenship, not of national citizenship which alone is protected by the privileges and immunities clause." See also, for an informative discussion of this clause, the opinion of Justice Roberts, concurred in by Justice Black, in Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization, 307 U. S. 496, 83 L. ed. 1423, 59 Sup. Ct. 954 (1939).

3. The student will be interested to note, as he proceeds later with a study of the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (which was passed over lightly in the argument before the court in the principal case and in the opinion of Justice Miller), that the rejected "fundamental rights" doctrine espoused by the minority justices later found its way into the constitutional law of the United States through its adoption by the Supreme Court as a definition of due process of law. Through an increasingly elastic interpretation of the due process and equal protection of the laws guaranties of the Fourteenth Amendment, many rights and immunities have been judicially safeguarded against state action which has been characterized as "arbitrary," "capricious," or "unreasonable." It is probable that some of these rights would have been classified as privileges or immunities of national citizenship if the Slaughter-House Cases had been decided differently. Bull. 219 (1918), 2 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 402; Howard, The Privileges and Immunities of Federal Citizenship and Colgate v. Harvey, 87 U. of Pa. L. ### MINOR v. HAPPERSETT.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1874.

21 Wall. 162, 22 L. ed. 627.

[Error to the Supreme Court of Missouri. Mrs. Minor brought an action in an inferior court of Missouri against a registrar of voters because of his refusal to register her as a voter at a general election in which presidential electors, a member of Congress and other officers were to be chosen. He relied for his refusal upon the constitution of Missouri which gave the privilege of voting only to male citizens of the United States. The Supreme Court of Missouri on appeal had affirmed a judgment for the defendant.]

CHIEF JUSTICE WAITE delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

It is contended that the provisions of the constitution and laws of the State of Missouri which confine the right of suffrage and registration therefor to men, are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. The argument is, that as a woman, born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is a citizen of the United States and of the state in which she resides, she has the right of suffrage as one of the privileges and immunities of her citizenship, which the state cannot by its laws or constitution abridge.

There is no doubt that women may be citizens. They are persons, and by the Fourteenth Amendment "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" are expressly declared to be "citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." But, in our opinion, it did not need this Amendment to give them that position. Before its adoption the Constitution of the United States did not in terms prescribe who should be citizens of the United States or of the several states, yet there were necessarily such citizens without such provision. There cannot be a nation without a people. The very idea of a political community, such as a nation is, implies an association of persons for the promotion of their general welfare. Each one of the persons associated becomes a member of the nation formed by the association. He owes it allegiance and is entitled to its protection. Allegiance and protection are, in this connection, reciprocal obligations. The one is a compensation for the other; allegiance for protection and protection for allegiance. * * *

* * * The Fourteenth Amendment did not affect the citizenship of women any more than it did of men. In this particular, therefore, the rights of Mrs. Minor do not depend upon the Amendment. She has always been a citizen from her birth, and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizenship. The Amendment prohibited the state, of which she is a citizen, from abridging any of her privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States; but it did not confer citizenship on her. That she had before its adoption.

If the right of suffrage is one of the necessary privileges of a citizen of the United States, then the constitution and laws of Missouri confining it to men are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, as amended, and consequently void. The direct question is, therefore, presented whether all citizens are necessarily voters.

The Constitution does not define the privileges and immunities of citizens. For that definition we must look elsewhere. In this case we need not determine what they are, but only whether suffrage is necessarily one of them.

It certainly is nowhere made so in express terms. The United States has no voters in the states, of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by state voters. The members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the states, and the electors in each state must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. Senators are to be chosen by the legislatures of the states, and necessarily the members of the legislature required to make the choice are elected by the voters of the state. Each state must appoint in such manner, as the legislature thereof may direct, the electors to elect the President and Vice-President. * * *

The Amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. It simply furnished an additional guaranty for the protection of such as he already had. * * * This makes it proper to inquire whether suffrage was coextensive with the citizenship of the states at the time of its adoption. If it was, then it may with force be argued that suffrage was one of the rights which belonged to citizenship, and in the enjoyment of which every citizen must be protected. But if it was not, the contrary may with propriety be assumed.

When the federal Constitution was adopted, all the states, with the exception of Rhode Island and Connecticut, had constitutions of their own. These two continued to act under their charters from the Crown. Upon an examination of those constitutions we find that in no state were all citizens permitted to vote. [The various electoral qualifications of male sex, age, property-holding and taxpaying prescribed in those constitutions are here stated.] * * *

As has been seen, all the citizens of the states were not invested with the right of suffrage. * * * Besides this, citizenship has not in all cases been made a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the right of suffrage. Thus, in Missouri, persons of foreign birth, who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, may under certain circumstances vote. The same provision is to be found in the constitutions of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Minnesota, and Texas.

Certainly, if the courts can consider any question settled, this is one. For nearly ninety years the people have acted upon the idea that the Constitution, when it conferred citizenship, did not necessarily confer the right of suffrage. If uniform practice long continued can settle the construction of so important an instrument as the Constitution of the United States confessedly is, most certainly it has been done here.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES

1. The reported case, in so far as it relates to suffrage for women, has of course been superseded by the Nineteenth Amendment, ratified by the required number of states in 1920, which provides: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." The Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, also operates as a prohibition of any denial to citizens of the United States of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The power specifically given to Congress to enforce these Amendments by appropriate legislation is limited to those denials of suffrage which fall within the terms of the Amendments. It should also be borne in mind that, independent of the privileges or immunities clause, Congress and the courts have power to protect both citizens and non-citizens against any denial by the states of the equal protection of the laws. Cases dealing with federal protection of civil rights, including those involving enforcement of the guaranty of equality in suffrage, are included in Chapter IX of this case-book.

2. In several cases the Supreme Court was urged to interpret the privileges or immunities clause as imposing the same restrictions upon the states as the first eight Amendments to the Constitution impose upon the national government. But this construction, which would have resulted in the inclusion of the fundamental guaranties of personal liberty contained in the Bill of Rights among the privileges or immunities of federal citizenship protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, has been rejected. The following cases may be cited as holding (either directly or in effect) that the rights claimed are not privileges or immunities of federal citizenship: Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. ed. 678 (1875) (right of trial by jury in suits at common law, guaranteed by the Seventh Amendment); Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, 29 L. ed. 615, 6 Sup. Ct. 580 (1886) (right to bear arms, guaranteed by the Second Amendment); Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 44 L. ed. 597, 20 Sup. Ct. 448 (1900) (right of trial by jury in criminal prosecutions, guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment); Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. 111 (1884), Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 44 L. ed. 597, 20 Sup. Ct. 448 (1900) (guaranty against prosecution for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, except on indictment of a grand jury, contained in the Fifth Amendment—decision in the Hurtado case under due process clause); West v. Louisiana, 194 U. S. 258, 48 L. ed. 965, 24 Sup. Ct. 650 (1904) (right in a criminal case to be confronted by witnesses, included in the Sixth Amendment—decision under due process clause); Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 53 L. ed. 97, 29 Sup. Ct. 14 (1908), Adamson v. California, 332 U. S. 46, 91 L. ed. 1903, 67 Sup. Ct. 1672, 171 A. L. ## CHAPTER V

THE FISCAL, TAXING AND WAR POWERS OF CONGRESS

Section 1.—The Fiscal Powers.

MCCULLOCH v. MARYLAND.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1819.

4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579.

[Congress by act of April 10, 1816 incorporated "the subscribers to the Bank of the United States" and pursuant to its charter the corporation established a branch bank in Baltimore which issued bank notes, accepted private deposits, discounted promissory notes and carried on all the usual transactions of a local bank operated for the profit of its shareholders. On February 11, 1818 the general assembly of Maryland enacted a statute to impose a tax on all banks or branches thereof in the State of Maryland not chartered by it. This was an action of debt brought on behalf of the state in the county court of Baltimore County against McCulloch as cashier of the branch bank to recover a penalty for carrying on the branch without paying the tax. The case came to the Supreme Court on writ of error to the Court of Appeals of Maryland.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The first question made in the cause is, has Congress power to incorporate a bank?

It has been truly said, that this can scarcely be considered as an open question, entirely unprejudiced by the former proceedings of the nation respecting it. The principle now contested was introduced at a very early period of our history, has been recognized by many successive legislatures, and has been acted upon by the judicial department, in cases of peculiar delicacy, as a law of undoubted obligation.

It will not be denied, that a bold and daring usurpation might be resisted, after an acquiescence still longer and more complete than this. But it is conceived that a doubtful question, one on which human reason may pause, and the human judgment be suspended, in the decision of which the great principles of liberty are not concerned, but the respective powers of those who are equally the representatives of the people, are to be adjusted, if not put at rest by the practice of the government, ought to receive a considerable impression from that practice. An exposition of the Constitution, deliberately established by legislative acts, on the faith of which an immense property has been advanced, ought not to be lightly disregarded.

The power now contested was exercised by the first Congress elected under the present Constitution. The bill for incorporating the Bank of the United States did not steal upon an unsuspecting legislature, and pass unobserved. Its principle was completely understood, and was opposed with equal zeal and ability. After being resisted, first in the fair and open field of debate, and afterwards in the executive cabinet, with as much persevering talent as any measure has ever experienced, and being supported by arguments which convinced minds as pure and as intelligent as this country can boast, it became a law. The original act was permitted to expire; but a short experience of the embarrassments to which the refusal to revive it exposed the government, convinced those who were most prejudiced against the measure of its necessity, and induced the passage of the present law. It would require no ordinary share of intrepidity to assert, that a measure adopted under these circumstances, was a bold and plain usurpation, to which the Constitution gave no countenance.

These observations belong to the cause; but they are not made under the impression that, were the question entirely new, the law would be found irreconcilable with the Constitution.

In discussing this question, the counsel for the State of Maryland have deemed it of some importance, in the construction of the Constitution, to consider that instrument not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent states. The powers of the general government, it has been said, are delegated by the states, who alone are truly sovereign; and must be exercised in subordination to the states, who alone possess supreme dominion.

It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The convention which framed the Constitution was, indeed, elected by the state legislatures. But the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation, or pretensions to it. It was reported to the then existing Congress of the United States, with a request that it might "be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each state, by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its legislature, for their assent and ratification." This mode of proceeding was adopted; and by the convention, by Congress, and by the state legislatures, the instrument was submitted to the people. They acted upon it, in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in convention. It is true, they assembled in their several states; and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the states, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their states. But the measures they adopt do not, on that account, cease to be the measures of the people themselves, or become the measures of the state governments.

From these conventions the Constitution derives its whole authority. The government proceeds directly from the people; is "ordained and established" in the name of the people; and is declared to be ordained, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity." The assent of the states, in their sovereign capacity, is implied in calling a convention, and thus submitting that instrument to the people. But the people were at perfect liberty to accept or reject it; and their act was final. It required not the affirmance, and could not be negated, by the state governments. The Constitution, when thus adopted, was of complete obligation, and bound the state sovereignties.

It has been said, that the people had already surrendered all their powers to the state sovereignties, and had nothing more to give. But, surely, the question whether they may resume and modify the powers granted to government, does not remain to be settled in this country. Much more might the legitimacy of the general government be doubted, had it been created by the states. The powers delegated to the state sovereignties were to be exercised by themselves, not by a distinct and independent sovereignty, created by themselves. To the formation of a league, such as was the Confederation, the state sovereignties were certainly competent. But when, "in order to form a more perfect union," it was deemed necessary to change this alliance into an effective government, possessing great and sovereign powers, and acting directly on the people, the necessity of referring it to the people, and of deriving its powers directly from them, was felt and acknowledged by all.

The government of the Union, then (whatever may be the influence of this fact on the case), is emphatically and truly a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them, its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit.

This government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle, that it can exercise only the powers granted to it, would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge. That principle is now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted, is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist. * * *

If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this: that the government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one state may be willing to control its operations, no state is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason: the people have, in express terms, decided it, by saying, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof," "shall be the supreme law of the land," and by requiring that the members of the state legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the states, shall take the oath of fidelity to it.

The government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land, "anything in the Constitution or laws of any State, to the contrary notwithstanding."

Among the enumerated powers, we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the Articles of Confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the 10th Amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word "expressly," and declares only that the powers "not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people;" thus leaving the question, whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest, has been delegated to the one government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment, had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the Articles of Confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments. A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. That this idea was entertained by the framers of the American Constitution, is not only to be inferred from the nature of the instrument, but from the language. Why else were some of the limitations, found in the 9th section of the 1st article, introduced? It is also, in some degree, warranted by their having omitted to use any restrictive term which might prevent its receiving a fair and just interpretation. In considering this question, then, we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding.

Although, among the enumerated powers of government, we do not find the word "bank," or "incorporation," we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are intrusted to its government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance, merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may, with great reason, be contended, that a government, intrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depends, must also be intrusted with ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the nation to facilitate its execution. It can never be their interest, and cannot be presumed to have been their intention, to clog and embarrass its execution by withholding the most appropriate means. Throughout this vast republic, from the St. Croix to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, revenue is to be collected and expended, armies are to be marched and supported. The exigencies of the nation may require, that the treasure raised in the North should be transported to the South, that raised in the East conveyed to the West, or that this order should be reversed. Is that construction of the Constitution to be preferred which would render these operations difficult, hazardous, and expensive? Can we adopt that construction (unless the words imperiously require it) which would impute to the framers of that instrument, when granting these powers for the public good, the intention of impeding their exercise by withholding a choice of means? If, indeed, such be the mandate of the Constitution, we have only to obey; but that instrument does not profess to enumerate the means by which the powers it confers may be executed; nor does it prohibit the creation of a corporation, if the existence of such a being be essential to the beneficial exercise of those powers. It is, then, the subject of fair inquiry, how far such means may be employed. * * *

The government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means; and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the objects is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception. * * *

But the Constitution of the United States has not left the right of Congress to employ the necessary means, for the execution of the powers conferred on the government, to general reasoning. To its enumeration of powers is added that of making "all laws which shall be necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department [or officer] thereof."

The counsel for the State of Maryland have urged various arguments, to prove that this clause, though in terms a grant of power, is not so in effect; but is really restrictive of the general right, which might otherwise be implied, of selecting means for executing the enumerated powers. * * *

But the argument on which most reliance is placed, is drawn from the peculiar language of this clause. Congress is not empowered by it to make all laws, which may have relation to the powers conferred on the government, but such only as may be "necessary and proper" for carrying them into execution. The word "necessary" is considered as controlling the whole sentence, and as limiting the right to pass laws for the execution of the granted powers, to such as are indispensable, and without which the power would be nugatory. That it excludes the choice of means, and leaves to Congress, in each case, that only which is most direct and simple.

Is it true, that this is the sense in which the word "necessary" is always used? Does it always import an absolute physical necessity, so strong, that one thing, to which another may be termed necessary, cannot exist without that other? We think it does not. If reference be had to its use, in the common affairs of the world, or in approved authors, we find that it frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another. To employ the means necessary to an end, is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end, and not as being confined to those single means, without which the end would be entirely unattainable. Such is the character of human language that no word conveys to the mind, in all situations, one single definite idea; and nothing is more common than to use words in a figurative sense. Almost all compositions contain words, which, taken in their rigorous sense, would convey a meaning different from that which is obviously intended. It is essential to just construction, that many words which import something excessive, should be understood in a more mitigated sense—in that sense which common usage justifies. The word "necessary" is of this description. It has not a fixed character peculiar to itself. It admits of all degrees of comparison; and is often connected with other words, which increase or diminish the impression the mind receives of the urgency it imports. A thing may be necessary, very necessary, absolutely or indispensably necessary. To no mind would the same idea be conveyed, by these several phrases. This comment on the word is well illustrated, by the passage cited at the Bar, from the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution. It is, we think, impossible to compare the sentence which prohibits a state from laying "imposts, or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws," with that which authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers of the general government, without feeling a conviction that the convention understood itself to change materially the meaning of the word "necessary, by prefixing the word "absolutely." This word, then, like others, is used in various senses; and, in its construction, the subject, the context, the intention of the person using them, are all to be taken into view.

Let this be done in the case under consideration. The subject is the execution of those great powers on which the welfare of a nation essentially depends. It must have been the intention of those who gave these powers, to insure, as far as human prudence could insure, their beneficial execution. This could not be done by confining the choice of means to such narrow limits as not to leave it in the power of Congress to adopt any which might be appropriate, and which were conducive to the end. This provision is made in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur. To have declared that the best means shall not be used, but those alone without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances. If we apply this principle of construction to any of the powers of the government, we shall find it so pernicious in its operation that we shall be compelled to discard it. * * *

So, with respect to the whole penal code of the United States. Whence arises the power to punish in cases not prescribed by the Constitution? All admit that the government may, legitimately, punish any violation of its laws; and yet, this is not among the enumerated powers of Congress. The right to enforce the observance of law, by punishing its infraction, might be denied with the more plausibility, because it is expressly given in some cases. Congress is empowered "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States," and "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." The several powers of Congress may exist, in a very imperfect state to be sure, but they may exist and be carried into execution, although no punishment should be inflicted in cases where the right to punish is not expressly given.

Take, for example, the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." This power is executed by the single act of making the establishment. But from this has been inferred the power and duty of carrying the mail along the post-road, from one post-office to another. And, from this implied power, has again been inferred the right to punish those who steal letters from the post-office, or rob the mail. It may be said, with some plausibility, that the right to carry the mail, and to punish those who rob it, is not indispensably necessary to the establishment of a post-office and post-road. This right is, indeed, essential to the beneficial exercise of the power, but not indispensably necessary to its existence. So, of the punishment of the crimes of stealing or falsifying a record or process of a court of the United States, or of perjury in such court. To punish these offences is certainly conducive to the due administration of justice. But courts may exist, and may decide the causes brought before them, though such crimes escape punishment.

The baneful influence of this narrow construction on all the operations of the government, and the absolute impracticability of maintaining it without rendering the government incompetent to its great objects, might be illustrated by numerous examples drawn from the Constitution, and from our laws. The good sense of the public has pronounced, without hesitation, that the power of punishment appertains to sovereignty, and may be exercised whenever the sovereign has a right to act, as incidental to his constitutional powers. It is a means for carrying into execution all sovereign powers, and may be used, although not indispensably necessary. It is a right incidental to the power, and conducive to its beneficial exercise.

If this limited construction of the word "necessary" must be abandoned in order to punish, whence is derived the rule which would reinstate it, when the government would carry its powers into execution by means not vindictive in their nature? If the word "necessary" means "needful," "requisite," "essential," "conducive to," in order to let in the power of punishment for the infraction of law, why is it not equally comprehensive when required to authorize the use of means which facilitate the execution of the powers of government without the infliction of punishment?

In ascertaining the sense in which the word "necessary" is used in this clause of the Constitution, we may derive some aid from that with which it is associated. Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution" the powers of the government. If the word "necessary" was used in that strict and rigorous sense for which the counsel for the State of Maryland contend, it would be an extraordinary departure from the usual course of the human mind, as exhibited in composition, to add a word, the only possible effect of which is to qualify that strict and rigorous meaning; to present to the mind the idea of some choice of means of legislation not straightened and compressed within the narrow limits for which gentlemen contend.

But the argument which most conclusively demonstrates the error of the construction contended for by the counsel for the State of Maryland, is founded on the intention of the convention, as manifested in the whole clause. To waste time and argument in proving that, without it, Congress might carry its powers into execution, would be not much less idle than to hold a lighted taper to the sun. As little can it be required to prove, that in the absence of this clause, Congress would have some choice of means. That it might employ those which, in its judgment, would most advantageously effect the object to be accomplished. That any means adapted to the end, any means which tended directly to the execution of the constitutional powers of the government, were in themselves constitutional. This clause, as construed by the State of Maryland, would abridge and almost annihilate this useful and necessary right of the legislature to select its means. That this could not be intended, is, we should think, had it not been already controverted, too apparent for controversy. We think so for the following reasons:—

1. The clause is placed among the powers of Congress, not among the limitations on those powers.

2. Its terms purport to enlarge, not to diminish the powers vested in the government. It purports to be an additional power, not a restriction on those already granted. No reason has been or can be assigned, for thus concealing an intention to narrow the discretion of the national legislature, under words which purport to enlarge it. * * *

The result of the most careful and attentive consideration bestowed upon this clause is, that if it does not enlarge, it cannot be construed to restrain the powers of Congress, or to impair the right of the legislature to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures, to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the government. If no other motive for its insertion can be suggested, a sufficient one is found in the desire to remove all doubts respecting the right to legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the Constitution, if that instrument be not a splendid bauble.

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

That a corporation must be considered as a means not less usual, not of higher dignity, not more requiring a particular specification than other means, has been sufficiently proved. If we look to the origin of corporations, to the manner in which they have been framed in that government, from which we have derived most of our legal principles and ideas, or to the uses to which they have been applied, we find no reason to suppose that a constitution, omitting, and wisely omitting, to enumerate all the means for carrying into execution the great powers vested in government, ought to have specified this. Had it been intended to grant this power as one which should be distinct and independent, to be exercised in any case whatever, it would have found a place among the enumerated powers of the government. But being considered merely as a means, to be employed only for the purpose of carrying into execution the given powers, there could be no motive for particularly mentioning it. * * *

If a corporation may be employed indiscriminately with other means to carry into execution the powers of the government, no particular reason can be assigned for excluding the use of a bank, if required for its fiscal operations. To use one, must be within the discretion of Congress, if it be an appropriate mode of executing the powers of government. That it is a convenient, a useful, and essential instrument in the prosecution of its fiscal operations, is not now a subject of controversy. All those who have been concerned in the administration of our finances, have concurred in representing its importance and necessity; and so strongly have they been felt, that statesmen of the first class, whose previous opinions against it had been confirmed by every circumstance which can fix the human judgment, have yielded those opinions to the exigencies of the nation. Under the confederation, Congress justifying the measure by its necessity, transcended, perhaps, its powers to obtain the advantage of a bank; and our own legislation attests the universal conviction of the utility of this measure. The time has passed away when it can be necessary to enter into any discussion in order to prove the importance of this instrument, as a means to effect the legitimate objects of the government.

But were its necessity less apparent, none can deny its being an appropriate measure; and if it is, the degree of its necessity, as has been very justly observed, is to be discussed in another place. Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an Act was not the law of the land. But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity, would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power.

After this declaration, it can scarcely be necessary to say, that the existence of state banks can have no possible influence on the question. No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the government of the Union on those of the states, for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends; and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends. To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it cannot control, which another government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution. But were it otherwise, the choice of means implies a right to choose a national bank in preference to state banks, and Congress alone can make the election.

After the most deliberate consideration, it is the unanimous and decided opinion of this court, that the Act to incorporate the Bank of the United States is a law made in pursuance of the Constitution, and is a part of the supreme law of the land.

The branches, proceeding from the same stock, and being conducive to the complete accomplishment of the object, are equally constitutional. It would have been unwise to locate them in the charter, and it would be unnecessarily inconvenient to employ the legislative power in making those subordinate arrangements. The great duties of the bank are prescribed; those duties require branches, and the bank itself may, we think, be safely trusted with the selection of places where those branches shall be fixed; reserving always to the government the right to require that a branch shall be located where it may be deemed necessary.

It being the opinion of the court that the act incorporating the bank is constitutional; and that the power of establishing a branch in the State of Maryland might be properly exercised by the bank itself, we proceed to inquire:—

2. Whether the State of Maryland may, without violating the Constitution, tax that branch? * * *

We are unanimously of opinion, that the law passed by the Legislature of Maryland, imposing a tax on the Bank of the United States, is unconstitutional and void. * * *

NOTES

1. In developing the doctrine of "implied powers" Chief Justice Marshall drew heavily upon Alexander Hamilton's opinion upholding the constitutionality of the first Bank of the United States, chartered in 1791. Hamilton, who had proposed the creation of the bank, argued that every power vested in a government is in its nature sovereign and includes by force of the term a right to employ all the means requisite and fairly applicable to the attainment of the ends of such power, and which are not precluded by restrictions specified in the Constitution. For a discussion of the distinction between "implied," "resulting" and "inherent" powers, see 1 Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (2d ed. 1929), 76-93. See also, Dodd, Implied Powers and Implied Limitations in Constitutional Law, 29 Yale L. J. 137 (1919).

2. In 1819 Ohio enacted a statute imposing an annual tax of $50,000 upon each branch of the Bank of the United States within that state and authorizing collection by distraint proceedings upon warrant of the state auditor. The bank secured an injunction in the federal circuit court against Osborn, the auditor, restraining him from executing the statute. Osborn issued a warrant, however, and another officer forcibly seized $100,000 in specie despite notice of the injunction. The money was delivered to the state treasurer, who, because of the injunction, kept it segregated from the general state funds. The bank amended its bill, adding the state treasurer as defendant, and the federal circuit court ordered the return of the money to the bank on the ground that the tax was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Marshall, affirmed the decree of the lower court and Ohio was obliged to recede from its recalcitrant position. Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204 (1824).

JULLIARD v. GREENMAN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1884.

110 U. S. 421, 28 L. ed. 204, 4 Sup. Ct. 122.

[Some of the notes issued by the United States under the Legal Tender Acts, passed during the Civil War and sustained in the Legal Tender Cases, came into the treasury of the United States by redemption or otherwise. Sometime after January 1, 1879, they were reissued in pursuance of an Act of May 31, 1878. Some of those reissued notes were tendered by defendant to plaintiff in payment of a debt and refused, raising the question whether in time of peace Congress constitutionally could continue the legal tender quality of these notes.]

MR. JUSTICE GRAY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States" is the power to raise money for the public use on a pledge of the public credit, and may be exercised to meet either present or anticipated expenses and liabilities of the government. It includes the power to issue, in return for the money borrowed, the obligations of the United States in any appropriate form, of stock, bonds, bills, or notes. * * * Congress has authority to issue these obligations in a form adapted to circulation from hand to hand in the ordinary transactions of commerce and business. In order to promote and facilitate such circulation, to adapt them to use as currency, and to make them more current in the market, it may provide for their redemption in coin or bonds, and may make them receivable in payment of debts to the government. So much is settled beyond doubt, and was asserted or distinctly admitted by the judges who dissented from the decision in the Legal Tender Cases, as well as by those who concurred in that decision. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 548; Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 616, 636; Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 543, 544, 560, 582, 610, 613, 637.

It is equally well settled that Congress has the power to incorporate national banks, with the capacity, for their own profit as well as for the use of the government in its money transactions, of issuing bills which under ordinary circumstances pass from hand to hand as money at their nominal value, and which, when so current, the law has always recognized as a good tender in payment of money debts, unless specifically objected to at the time of the tender. United States Bank v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat. 333, 347; Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 447, 451. The power of Congress to charter a bank was maintained in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, and in Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, chiefly upon the ground that it was an appropriate means for carrying on the money transactions of the government. * * *

The constitutional authority of Congress to provide a currency for the whole country is now firmly established. In Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 548, Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It cannot be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress. And it is settled by the uniform practice of the government, and by repeated decisions, that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit." Congress, having undertaken to supply a national currency, consisting of coin, of treasury notes of the United States, and of the bills of national banks, is authorized to impose on all state banks, or national banks, or private bankers, paying out the notes of individuals or of state banks, a tax of ten per cent upon the amount of such notes so paid out. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, above cited; National Bank v. United States, 101 U. S. 1. The reason for this conclusion was stated by Chief Justice Chase, and repeated by the present Chief Justice, in those words: "Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end, Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end, Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile." 8 Wall. 549; 101 U. S. 6.

By the Constitution of the United States, the several states are prohibited from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. But no intention can be inferred from this to deny to Congress either of these powers.

The states are forbidden, but Congress is expressly authorized, to coin money. The states are prohibited from emitting bills of credit; but Congress, which is neither expressly authorized nor expressly forbidden to do so, has, as we have already seen, been held to have the power of emitting bills of credit, and of making every provision for their circulation as currency, short of giving them the quality of legal tender for private debts—even by those who have denied its authority to give them this quality.

It appears to us to follow, as a logical and necessary consequence, that Congress has the power to issue the obligations of the United States in such form, and to impress upon them such qualities as currency for the purchase of merchandise and the payment of debts, as accord with the usage of sovereign governments. The power, as incident to the power of borrowing money and issuing bills or notes of the government for money borrowed, of impressing upon those bills or notes the quality of being a legal tender for the payment of private debts, was a power universally understood to belong to sovereignty, in Europe and America, at the time of the framing and adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The governments of Europe, acting through the monarch or the legislature, according to the distribution of powers under their respective constitutions, had and have as sovereign a power of issuing paper money as of stamping coin. * * * The power of issuing bills of credit, and making them, at the discretion of the legislature, a tender in payment of private debts, had long been exercised in this country by the several colonies and states; and during the Revolutionary War the states, upon the recommendation of the Congress of the Confederation, had made the bills issued by Congress a legal tender. See Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. 435, 453; Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet. 257, 313, 334-336; Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 557, 558, 622; Phillips on American Paper Currency, passim. The exercise of this power not being prohibited to Congress by the Constitution, it is included in the power expressly granted to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

This position is fortified by the fact that Congress is vested with the exclusive exercise of the analogous power of coining money and regulating the value of domestic and foreign coin, and also with the paramount power of regulating foreign and interstate commerce. Under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to issue circulating notes for the money borrowed, its power to define the quality and force of those notes as currency is as broad as the like power over a metallic currency under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. Under the two powers, taken together, Congress is authorized to establish a national currency, either in coin or in paper, and to make that currency lawful money for all purposes, as regards the national government or private individuals.

The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of private contracts. If, upon a just and fair interpretation of the whole Constitution, a particular power or authority appears to be vested in Congress, it is no constitutional objection to its existence, or to its exercise, that the property or the contracts of individuals may be incidentally affected. The decisions of this Court, already cited, afford several examples of this. * * *

So, under the power to coin money and to regulate its value, Congress may (as it did with regard to gold by the Act of June 28th, 1834, c. 95, and with regard to silver by the Act of February 28th, 1878, c. 20), issue coins of the same denominations as those already current by law, but of less intrinsic value than those, by reason of containing a less weight of the precious metals, and thereby enable debtors to discharge their debts by the payment of coins of the less real value. A contract to pay a certain sum in money, without any stipulation as to the kind of money in which it shall be paid, may always be satisfied by payment of that sum in any currency which is lawful money at the place and time at which payment is to be made. * * *

Congress, as the legislature of a sovereign nation, being expressly empowered by the Constitution, "to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," and "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," and "to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin;" and being clearly authorized, as incidental to the exercise of those great powers, to emit bills of credit, to charter national banks, and to provide a national currency for the whole people, in the form of coin, treasury notes, and national bank bills; and the power to make the notes of the government a legal tender in payment of private debts being one of the powers belonging to sovereignty in other civilized nations, and not expressly withheld from Congress by the Constitution; we are irresistibly impelled to the conclusion that the impressing upon the treasury notes of the United States the quality of being a legal tender in payment of private debts is an appropriate means, conducive and plainly adapted to the execution of the undoubted powers of Congress, consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and therefore, within the meaning of that instrument, "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States."

Such being our conclusion in matter of law, the question whether at any particular time, in war or in peace, the exigency is such, by reason of unusual and pressing demands on the resources of the government, or of the inadequacy of the supply of gold and silver coin to furnish the currency needed for the uses of the government and of the people, that it is, as matter of fact, wise and expedient to resort to this means, is a political question, to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterwards passed upon by the courts.

[MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered a dissenting opinion.]

NOTE

1. Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 603, 19 L. ed. 513 (1870), which held the Legal Tender Acts, passed during the Civil War, unconstitutional as regards payment of debts created before the enactment of the legislation, was decided by a four-to-three vote of the seven-member court. The case had been decided in conference on November 27, 1869, by a vote of five to three, the court then consisting of eight justices, but the judgment was not announced in court until February 7, 1870. Justice Grier, one of the majority, resigned February 1, 1870, on account of advanced age. An Act of April 10, 1869, which went into effect in December, 1869, authorized the increase of the court to nine members. Justices Strong and Bradley, the new justices appointed by President Grant, and the three who dissented in Hepburn v. Griswold constituted a five-to-four majority in the Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287, decided May 1, 1871, which overruled the earlier holding. The opinion was written by Justice Strong, with Chief Justice Chase and the three other surviving members of the former majority dissenting. In these circumstances the overturning of the earlier decision in so short a time resulted in charges that the new appointees had been selected for the express purpose of achieving this result. The evidence does not appear to support such a charge. See Ratner, Was the Supreme Court Packed by President Grant? 50 Pol. Sci. Q. 343 (1935); Fairman, Mr. Justice Bradley's Appointment to the Supreme Court and the Legal Tender Cases, 54 Harv. L. Rev. 977, 1128 (1941). #### NORMAN v. BALTIMORE & OHIO R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1935.

These cases present the question of the validity of the Joint Resolution of the Congress, of June 5, 1933, with respect to the "gold clauses" of private contracts for the payment of money. 48 Stat. 112.

This Resolution * * * declares that "every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby" is "against public policy." Such provisions in obligations thereafter incurred are prohibited. The Resolution provides that "Every obligation, heretofore or hereafter incurred, whether or not any such provision is contained therein or made with respect thereto, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts."

In No. 270, the suit was brought upon a coupon of a bond made by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company under date of February 1, 1930, for the payment of \$1,000 on February 1, 1960, and interest from date at the rate of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. The bond provided that the payment of principal and interest "will be made \* \* \* in gold coin of the United States of America of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on February 1, 1930." The coupon in suit, for \$22.50, was payable on February 1, 1934. The complaint alleged that on February 1, 1930, the standard weight and fineness of a gold dollar of the United States as a unit of value "was fixed to consist of twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of gold, nine-tenths fine," pursuant to the Act of Congress of March 14, 1900 (31 Stat. 45); and that by the Act of Congress known as the "Gold Reserve Act of 1934" (January 30, 1934, 48 Stat. 337), and by the order of the President under that Act, the standard unit of value of a gold dollar of the United States "was fixed to consist of fifteen and five-twenty-firsts grains of gold, nine-tenths fine," from and after January 31, 1934. On presentation of the coupon, defendant refused to pay the amount in gold, or the equivalent of gold in legal tender of the United States which was alleged to be, on February 1, 1934, according to the standard of weight and fineness existing on February 1, 1930, the sum of \$38.10, and plaintiff demanded judgment for that amount.

Defendant answered that by Acts of Congress, and, in particular, by the Joint Resolution of June 5, 1933, defendant had been prevented from making payment in gold coin "or otherwise than dollar for dollar, in coin or currency of the United States (other than gold coin and gold certificates)" which at the time of payment constituted legal tender. Plaintiff, challenging the validity of the Joint Resolution under the Fifth and Tenth Amendments, and Article I, Section 1, of the Constitution of the United States, moved to strike the defense. The motion was denied. Judgment was entered for plaintiff for $22.50, the face of the coupon, and was affirmed upon appeal. The Court of Appeals of the State considered the federal question and decided that the Joint Resolution was valid. 265 N. Y. 37. This Court granted a writ of certiorari, October 8, 1934. * * *

The Joint Resolution of June 5, 1933, was one of a series of measures relating to the currency. These measures disclose not only the purposes of the Congress but also the situations which existed at the time the Joint Resolution was adopted and when the payments under the "gold clauses" were sought. On March 6, 1933, the President, stating that there had been "heavy and unwarranted withdrawals of gold and currency from our banking institutions for the purpose of hoarding" and "extensive speculative activity abroad in foreign exchange" which had resulted "in severe drains on the Nation's stocks of gold," and reciting the authority conferred by Section 5(b) of the Act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 411), declared "a bank holiday" until March 9, 1933. On the same date, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the President's approval, issued instructions to the Treasurer of the United States to make payments in gold in any form only under license issued by the Secretary.

On March 9, 1933, the Congress passed the Emergency Banking Act. 48 Stat. 1. All orders issued by the President or the Secretary of the Treasury since March 4, 1933, under the authority conferred by Section 5(b) of the Act of October 6, 1917, were confirmed. That section was amended so as to provide that during any period of national emergency declared by the President, he might "investigate, regulate or prohibit," by means of licenses or otherwise, "any transactions in foreign exchange, transfers of credit between or payments by banking institutions as defined by the President, and export, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, by any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof." The Act also amended Section 11 of the Federal Reserve Act (39 Stat. 752) so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to require all persons to deliver to the Treasurer of the United States "any or all gold coin, gold bullion, and gold certificates" owned by them, and that the Secretary should pay therefor "an equivalent amount of any other form of coin or currency coined or issued under the laws of the United States." By Executive Order of March 10, 1933, the President authorized banks to be reopened, as stated, but prohibited the removal from the United States, or any place subject to its jurisdiction, of "any gold coin, gold bullion, or gold certificates, except in accordance with regulations prescribed by or under license issued by the Secretary of the Treasury." By further Executive Order of April 5, 1933, forbidding hoarding, all persons were required to deliver, on or before May 1, 1933, to stated banks "all gold coin, gold bullion and gold certificates," with certain exceptions, the holder to receive "an equivalent amount of any other form of coin or currency coined or issued under the laws of the United States." * * *

On January 30, 1934, the Congress passed the "Gold Reserve Act of 1934" (48 Stat. 337) which, by section 13, ratified and confirmed all the actions, regulations and orders taken or made by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the Act of March 9, 1933, or under section 43 of the Act of May 12, 1933, and, by section 12, with respect to the authority of the President to fix the weight of the gold dollar, provided that it should not be fixed "in any event at more than 60 per centum of its present weight." On January 31, 1934, the President issued his proclamation declaring that he fixed "the weight of the gold dollar to be 15 5/21 grains nine tenths fine," from and after that date.

We have not attempted to summarize all the provisions of these measures. We are not concerned with their wisdom. The question before the Court is one of power, not of policy. And that question touches the validity of these measures at but a single point, that is, in relation to the Joint Resolution denying effect to "gold clauses" in existing contracts. The Resolution must, however, be considered in its legislative setting and in the light of other measures in pari materia. * * *

Second. The power of the Congress to establish a monetary system. It is unnecessary to review the historic controversy as to the extent of this power, or again to go over the ground traversed by the Court in reaching the conclusion that the Congress may make treasury notes legal tender in payment of debts previously contracted, as well as of those subsequently contracted, whether that authority be exercised in course of war or in time of peace. Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. 457; Juilliard v. Greenman, 110 U. S. 421. We need only consider certain postulates upon which that conclusion rested.

The Constitution grants to the Congress power "To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Art. I, sec. 8, par. 5. But the Court in the legal tender cases did not derive from that express grant alone the full authority of the Congress in relation to the currency. The Court found the source of that authority in all the related powers conferred upon the Congress and appropriate to achieve "the great objects for which the government was framed,"—"a national government, with sovereign powers." McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 404-407; Knox v. Lee, supra, pp. 532, 536; Juilliard v. Greenman, supra, p. 438. The broad and comprehensive national authority over the subjects of revenue, finance and currency is derived from the aggregate of the powers granted to the Congress, embracing the powers to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standards of weights and measures, and the added express power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the other enumerated powers. Juilliard v. Greenman, supra, pp. 439, 440.

The Constitution "was designed to provide the same currency, having a uniform legal value in all the States." It was for that reason that the power to regulate the value of money was conferred upon the federal government, while the same power, as well as the power to emit bills of credit, was withdrawn from the states. The states cannot declare what shall be money, or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in the Congress. Knox v. Lee, supra, p. 545. * * *

Moreover, by virtue of this national power, there attaches to the ownership of gold and silver those limitations which public policy may require by reason of their quality as legal tender and as a medium of exchange. Ling Su Fan v. United States, 218 U. S. 302, 310. Those limitations arise from the fact that the law "gives to such coinage a value which does not attach as a mere consequence of intrinsic value." Their quality as legal tender is attributed by the law, aside from their bullion value. * * *

Third. The power of the Congress to invalidate the provisions of existing contracts which interfere with the exercise of its constitutional authority. The instant cases involve contracts between private parties, but the question necessarily relates as well to the contracts or obligations of States and municipalities, or of their political subdivisions, that is, to such engagements as are within the reach of the applicable national power. The Government's own contracts—the obligations of the United States—are in a distinct category and demand separate consideration. See Perry v. United States, decided this day.

The contention is that the power of the Congress, broadly sustained by the decisions we have cited in relation to private contracts for the payment of money generally, does not extend to the striking down of express contracts for gold payments. The acts before the Court in the legal tender cases, as we have seen, were not deemed to go so far. Those acts left in circulation two kinds of money, both lawful and available, and contracts for payments in gold, one of these kinds, were not disturbed. The Court did not decide that the Congress did not have the constitutional power to invalidate existing contracts of that sort, if they stood in the way of the execution of the policy of the Congress in relation to the currency. * * *

Here, the Congress has enacted an express interdiction. The argument against it does not rest upon the mere fact that the legislation may cause hardship or loss. Creditors who have not stipulated for gold payments may suffer equal hardship or loss with creditors who have so stipulated. The former, admittedly, have no constitutional grievance. And, while the latter may not suffer more, the point is pressed that their express stipulations for gold payments constitute property, and that creditors who have not such stipulations are without that property right. And the contestants urge that the Congress is seeking not to regulate the currency, but to regulate contracts, and thus has stepped beyond the power conferred.

This argument is in the teeth of another established principle. Contracts, however express, cannot fetter the constitutional authority of the Congress. Contracts may create rights of property, but when contracts deal with a subject matter which lies within the control of the Congress, they have a congenital infirmity. Parties cannot remove their transactions from the reach of dominant constitutional power by making contracts about them. See Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 349, 357. * * *

The principle is not limited to the incidental effect of the exercise by the Congress of its constitutional authority. There is no constitutional ground for denying to the Congress the power expressly to prohibit and invalidate contracts although previously made, and valid when made, when they interfere with the carrying out of the policy it is free to adopt. The exercise of this power is illustrated by the provision of section 5 of the Employers' Liability Act of 1908 (35 Stat. 65, 66) relating to any contract the purpose of which was to enable a common carrier to exempt itself from the liability which the Act created. Such a stipulation the Act explicitly declared to be void. In the Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 52, the Court decided that as the Congress possessed the power to impose the liability, it also possessed the power "to insure its efficacy by prohibiting any contract, rule, regulation or device in evasion of it." And this prohibition the Court has held to be applicable to contracts made before the Act was passed. Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington R. R. Co. v. Schubert, 224 U. S. 603. * * *

The same reasoning applies to the constitutional authority of the Congress to regulate the currency and to establish the monetary system of the country. If the gold clauses now before us interfere with the policy of the Congress in the exercise of that authority, they cannot stand.

Fourth, The effect of the gold clauses in suit in relation to the monetary policy adopted by the Congress. Despite the wide range of the discussion at the bar and the earnestness with which the arguments against the validity of the Joint Resolution have been pressed, these contentions necessarily are brought, under the dominant principles to which we have referred, to a single and narrow point. That point is whether the gold clauses do constitute an actual interference with the monetary policy of the Congress in the light of its broad power to determine that policy. Whether they may be deemed to be such an interference depends upon an appraisal of economic conditions and upon determinations of questions of fact. With respect to those conditions and determinations, the Congress is entitled to its own judgment. We may inquire whether its action is arbitrary or capricious, that is, whether it has reasonable relation to a legitimate end. If it is an appropriate means to such an end, the decisions of the Congress as to the degree of the necessity for the adoption of that means, is final. * * *

The Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives stated in its report recommending favorable action upon the Joint Resolution (H. R. Rep. No. 169, 73d Cong., 1st Sess.):

"The occasion for the declaration in the resolution that the gold clauses are contrary to public policy arises out of the experiences of the present emergency. These gold clauses render ineffective the power of the Government to create a currency and determine the value thereof. If the gold clause, applied to a very limited number of contracts and security issues, it would be a matter of no particular consequence, but in this country virtually all obligations, almost as a matter of routine, contain the gold clause. In the light of this situation two phenomena which have developed during the present emergency make the enforcement of the gold clauses incompatible with the public interest. The first is the tendency which has developed internally to hoard gold; the second is the tendency for capital to leave the country. Under these circumstances no currency system, whether based upon gold or upon any other foundation, can meet the requirements of a situation in which many billions of dollars of securities are expressed in a particular form of the circulating medium, particularly when it is the medium upon which the entire credit and currency structure rests."

And the Joint Resolution itself recites the determination of the Congress in these words:

"Whereas the existing emergency has disclosed that provisions of obligations which purport to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency of the United States, or in an amount of money of the United States measured thereby, obstruct the power of the Congress to regulate the value of the money of the United States, and are inconsistent with the declared policy of the Congress to maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar, coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts."

Can we say that this determination is so destitute of basis that the interdiction of the gold clauses must be deemed to be without any reasonable relation to the monetary policy adopted by the Congress?

The Congress in the exercise of its discretion was entitled to consider the volume of obligations with gold clauses, as that fact, as the report of the House Committee observed, obviously had a bearing upon the question whether their existence constituted a substantial obstruction to the congressional policy. The estimates submitted at the bar indicate that when the Joint Resolution was adopted there were outstanding seventy-five billion dollars or more of such obligations, the annual interest charges on which probably amounted to between three and four billion dollars. It is apparent that if these promises were to be taken literally, as calling for actual payment in gold coin, they would be directly opposed to the policy of Congress, as they would be calculated to increase the demand for gold, to encourage hoarding, and to stimulate attempts at exportation of gold coin. * * *

But, if the clauses are treated as "gold value" clauses, that is, as intended to set up a measure or standard of value if gold coin is not available, we think they are still hostile to the policy of the Congress and hence subject to prohibition. It is true that when the Joint Resolution was adopted on June 5, 1933, while gold coin had largely been withdrawn from circulation and the Treasury had declared that "gold is not now paid, nor is it available for payment, upon public or private debts," the dollar had not yet been devalued. But devaluation was in prospect and a uniform currency was intended. Section 43 of the Act of May 12, 1933 (48 Stat. 51), provided that the President should have authority, on certain conditions, to fix the weight of the gold dollar as stated, and that its weight as so fixed should be "the standard unit of value" with which all forms of money should be maintained "at a parity." The weight of the gold dollar was not to be reduced by more than 50 per centum. The Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (January 30, 1934, 48 Stat. 337), provided that the President should not fix the weight of the gold dollar at more than 60 per cent. of its present weight. The order of the President of January 31, 1934, fixed the weight of the gold dollar at 15 5/21 grains nine-tenths fine as against the former standard of 25 8/10 grains nine-tenths fine. If the gold clauses interfered with the congressional policy and hence could be invalidated, there appears to be no constitutional objection to that action by the Congress in anticipation of the determination of the value of the currency. And the questions now before us must be determined in the light of that action.

The devaluation of the dollar placed the domestic economy upon a new basis. In the currency as thus provided, States and municipalities must receive their taxes; railroads, their rates and fares; public utilities, their charges for services. The income out of which they must meet their obligations is determined by the new standard. Yet, according to the contentions before us, while that income is thus controlled by law, their indebtedness on their "gold bonds" must be met by an amount of currency determined by the former gold standard. Their receipts, in this view, would be fixed on one basis; their interest charges, and the principal of their obligations, on another. It is common knowledge that the bonds issued by these obligors have generally contained gold clauses, and presumably they account for a large part of the outstanding obligations of that sort. It is also common knowledge that a similar situation exists with respect to numerous industrial corporations that have issued their "gold bonds" and must now receive payments for their products in the existing currency. It requires no acute analysis or profound economic inquiry to disclose the dislocation of the domestic economy which would be caused by such a disparity of conditions in which, it is insisted, those debtors under gold clauses should be required to pay one dollar and sixty-nine cents in currency while respectively receiving their taxes, rates, charges and prices on the basis of one dollar of that currency.

We are not concerned with consequences, in the sense that consequences, however serious, may excuse an invasion of constitutional right. We are concerned with the constitutional power of the Congress over the monetary system of the country and its attempted frustration. Exercising that power, the Congress has undertaken to establish a uniform currency, and parity between kinds of currency, and to make that currency, dollar for dollar, legal tender for the payment of debts. In the light of abundant experience, the Congress was entitled to choose such a uniform monetary system, and to reject a dual system, with respect to all obligations within the range of the exercise of its constitutional authority. The contention that these gold clauses are valid contracts and cannot be struck down proceeds upon the assumption that private parties, and States and municipalities, may make and enforce contracts which may limit that authority. Dismissing that untenable assumption, the facts must be faced. We think that it is clearly shown that these clauses interfere with the exertion of the power granted to the Congress and certainly it is not established that the Congress arbitrarily or capriciously decided that such an interference existed.

The judgment and decree, severally under review, are affirmed.

[MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS, MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER, MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND and MR. JUSTICE BUTLER dissented, all concurring in a dissenting opinion written by MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS.]

NOTE

1. Two other cases decided on the same day as the principal case dealt with the issue of whether the government could abrogate the gold clause contracts in its own obligations. Perry v. United States, 294 U. S. 330, 79 L. ed. 912, 55 Sup. Ct. 432, 95 A. L. R. 1335 (1935) involved a federal bond issued in 1918 and payable "in United States gold coin of the present standard of value." The court held that the contract was binding upon the United States, but that the plaintiff had failed to show a cause of action for actual damages, since he had not shown that in relation to buying power he had sustained any loss whatever. Plaintiff was forbidden by law to export gold or to engage in transactions in foreign exchange, and there was no free domestic market for gold. Justice Stone, concurring specially, said that the government, through the exercise of its sovereign power to regulate the value of money, had rendered itself immune from liability for its action. In other words, the obligation of the gold clauses was not superior to the government's power to regulate the value of money. "It will not benefit this plaintiff," he said, "to whom we deny any remedy, to be assured that he has an inviolable right to performance of the gold clause." (Congress later withdrew the government's consent to be sued.)

Nortz v. United States, 294 U. S. 317, 79 L. ed. 907, 55 Sup. Ct. 428, 95 A. L. R. 1346 (1935) dealt with gold certificates issued by the United States and payable in gold coin. Plaintiff claimed that his compulsory delivery of gold certificates constituted a "taking" of his contract with the government, and he demanded compensation therefor based upon the market price of gold at the time he presented the certificates for redemption. He had received compensation only in legal tender currency equivalent to the face amount of his certificates. The court held that no damage had been suffered by the government's refusal to pay in gold coin, because the holder, by virtue of governmental legislation and orders, would have been required forthwith to deliver the gold coin to the Treasury. He could not have kept the gold coin, or exported it or dealt in it. He could not have resorted to world markets. There was no free market for gold at the time in the United States or any market available for the plaintiff for the gold coin to which he claimed he was entitled. Therefore no actual loss had been sustained.

The dissenting opinion noted above applied to all three cases. The dissenting justices took the view that the gold clauses were property and that the legislation under challenge destroyed the property rights of bondholders in violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The dissent asserted that "under the guise of pursuing a monetary policy, Congress really has inaugurated a plan primarily designed to destroy private obligations, repudiate national debts and drive into the Treasury all gold within the country, in exchange for incon-vertible promises to pay, of much less value."

Section 2.—The Taxing, Spending and Property Powers.

KNOWLTON v. MOORE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1900.
178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. 747.

[The case involved the validity of an act of Congress passed in 1898 which taxed the passing of legacies and distributive shares of personalty. The Court interpreted the act as exacting basic percentages of the value of each beneficiary's legacy or share, varying with the degree of relation, or with lack of relation, of the beneficiary to the deceased, with progressively higher percentage rates on legacies and shares that were larger than those to which the basic rates applied.]

MR. JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

It is conceded on all sides that the levy and collection of some form of death duty is provided by the sections of the law in question. * * * Taxes of this general character are universally deemed to relate, not to property eo nomine, but to its passage by will or by descent in cases of intestacy, as distinguished from taxes imposed on property, real or personal as such, because of its ownership and possession. In other words, the public contribution which death duties exact is predicated on the passing of property as the result of death, as distinct from a tax on property disassociated from its transmission or receipt by will, or as the result of intestacy. Such taxes so considered were known to the Roman law and the ancient law of the continent of Europe. Smith's Wealth of Nations, London ed. of 1811, vol. 3, p. 311. Continuing the rule of the ancient French law, at the present day in France inheritance and legacy taxes are enforced, being collectible as stamp duties. They are included officially under the general denomination of indirect taxes, for the reason that all inheritance and legacy taxes are considered as levied on the "occasion of a particular isolated act." This view of the inheritance and legacy tax conforms to the official definition of indirect taxes, among which inheritance and legacy taxes are classed, which prevails in France at the present day. The definition is as follows:

"Direct taxes bear immediately upon persons, upon the possession and enjoyments of rights; indirect taxes are levied upon the happening of an event or an exchange." * * *

Thus, looking over the whole field, and considering death duties in the order in which we have reviewed them, that is, in the Roman and ancient law, in that of modern France, Germany and other continental countries, in England and those of her colonies where such laws have been enacted, in the legislation of the United States and the several states of the Union, the following appears: Although different modes of assessing such duties prevail, and although they have different accidental names, such as probate duties, stamp duties, taxes on the transaction, or the act of passing of an estate or a succession, legacy taxes, estate taxes or privilege taxes, nevertheless tax laws of this nature in all countries rest in their essence upon the principle that death is the generating source from which the particular taxing power takes its being and that it is the power to transmit, or the transmission from the dead to the living, on which such taxes are more immediately rested. * * *

[Here in answer to a contention that since the states had exclusive power to regulate the disposition of property at death this act of Congress was an encroachment upon that power, it was said, in effect, that the act did not undertake to regulate or determine what dispositions could or could not be made but taxed only where legacies and distributive shares passed in accordance with state law.]

The precise meaning of the law being thus determined, the question whether the tax which it imposes is direct, and hence subject to the requirement of apportionment, arises for consideration. * * * [After a review of the cases, the Court held that the tax involved was not a direct tax.]

Concluding, then, that the tax under consideration is not direct within the meaning of the Constitution, but, on the contrary, is a duty or excise, we are brought to consider the question of uniformity.

The contention is that because the statute exempts legacies and distributive shares in personal property below ten thousand dollars, because it classifies the rate of tax according to the relationship or absence of the relationship of the taker to the deceased, and provides for a rate progressing by the amount of the legacy or share, therefore the tax is repugnant to that portion of the first clause of Section 8 of Article 1 of the Constitution, which provides "the duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." * * * The two [opposing] contentions then may be summarized by saying that the one asserts that the Constitution prohibits the levy of any duty, impost or excise which is not intrinsically equal and uniform in its operation upon individuals, and the other that the power of Congress in levying the taxes in question is by the terms of the Constitution restrained only by the requirement that such taxes be geographically uniform. * * * [Here followed an elaborate discussion of this question.]

By the result then of an analysis of the history of the adoption of the Constitution it becomes plain that the words "uniform throughout the United States" do not signify an intrinsic but simply a geographical uniformity. * * *

It is yet further asserted that the tax does not fulfill the requirements of geographical uniformity, for the following reason: As the primary rate of taxation depends upon the degree of relationship or want of relationship to a deceased person, it is argued that it cannot operate with geographical uniformity, inasmuch as testamentary and intestacy laws may differ in every state. It is certain that the same degree of relationship or want of relationship to the deceased, wherever existing, is levied on at the same rate throughout the United States. The tax is hence uniform throughout the United States, despite the fact that different conditions among the states may obtain as to the objects upon which the tax is levied. The proposition in substance assumes that the objects taxed by duties, imposts and excises must be found in uniform quantities and conditions in the respective states, otherwise the tax levied on them will not be uniform throughout the United States. But what the Constitution commands is the imposition of a tax by the rule of geographical uniformity, not that in order to levy such a tax objects must be selected which exist uniformly in the several states. * * *

[MR. JUSTICE BREWER dissented from so much of the opinion as held that a progressive rate of tax could be validly imposed. In other respects he concurred. MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE McKENNA dissented as to the construction of the statute.]

NOTE

1. The Constitution confers on Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" (Art. I, § 8, cl. 1), but limits the power by declaring in the same clause that "all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." The Constitution also provides (Art. I, § 9, cl. 4) that "no capitation, or other direct, tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken." The principal case deals with both the requirement of uniformity and the prohibition against direct taxation except in proportion to the population of the respective states.

In Springer v. United States, 102 U. S. 586, 26 L. ed. 253 (1880), a Civil War income tax upon personal earnings and income from personal property was sustained as an indirect tax, the court upholding the view of earlier cases that capitation taxes and taxes on real estate were the only forms of direct taxation. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. ed. 759, 15 Sup. Ct. 673 (1895), Id., 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. 912 (1895), rejected this view and held that taxes on personal property and on the income from both real and personal property were direct taxes and hence subject to the requirement of apportionment. In the Pollock cases the source of the income was made the decisive consideration. The theory accepted by the court was that a direct tax is one imposed upon property solely by reason of its ownership and that a tax on the income from property is in substance a tax on the property producing the income, and, consequently, direct. The opinion stated that "we are unable to conclude that the enforced subtraction from the yield of all the owner's real or personal property, in the manner prescribed, is so different from a tax upon the property itself that it is not a direct, but an indirect tax, in the meaning of the Constitution."

The requirement of apportionment made resort to a system of income taxation that would be accepted as fair and equitable utterly impracticable. Illustrating the rule of apportionment as it would operate if applied to an income tax, Mr. Justice Jackson said: "Take the illustration suggested in the opinion of the Court. Congress lays a tax of thirty millions upon the incomes of the country above a certain designated amount, and directs that tax to be apportioned among the several states according to their numbers, and when so apportioned to be pro-rated amongst the citizens of the respective states coming within the operation of the law. * * * Take the new State of Washington and the old State of Rhode Island, having about the same population. To each would be assigned the same amount of the general assessment. In the former, we will say, there are 5,000 citizens subject to the operation of the law, in the latter 50,000. The citizen of Washington will be required to pay ten times as much as the citizen of Rhode Island on the same amount of taxable income. Extend the rule to all the states, and the result is that the larger the number of those subject to the operation of the law in any given state, the smaller their proportion of the tax and the smaller their rate of taxation, while, in respect to the smaller number in other states, the greater will be their rate of taxation on the same income." 158 U. S. 703, 704.

Eighteen years after the Pollock decision (1913) the Sixteenth Amendment was incorporated into the Constitution. It provides: "The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several states, and without regard to any census or enumeration." The amendment has been strictly construed as not extending the taxing power of Congress to new subjects, but as merely removing the requirement of apportionment in the matter of income taxes. See Brushaber v. Union Pacific R. Co., 240 U. S. 1, 60 L. ed. 493, 36 Sup. Ct. 236, L. R. A. 1917D, 414, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 713 (1916), where it was said that "the whole purpose of the amendment was to relieve all income taxes when imposed from apportionment [and] from a consideration of the source whence the income was derived." The effect of the Sixteenth Amendment, therefore, was to transform taxes of the sort which had been held direct in the Pollock decision into excises and thus subject to the Constitutional requirement of uniformity.

FLINT v. STONE TRACY CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1911.

These cases involve the constitutional validity of § 38 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1909, known as "The Corporation Tax" law. 36 Stat. c. 6, 11, 112-117. * * *

"Sec. 38. That every corporation, joint stock company or association organized for profit and having a capital stock represented by shares, and every insurance company now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory * * * shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation, joint stock company or association or insurance company equivalent to one per centum upon the entire net income over and above five thousand dollars received by it from all sources during such year, exclusive of amounts received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations, * * *."

This tax, it is expressly stated, is to be equivalent to one per centum of the entire net income over and above $5,000 received from all sources during the year—this is the measure of the tax explicitly adopted by the statute. The income is not limited to such as is received from property used in the business, strictly speaking, but is expressly declared to be upon the entire net income above $5,000 from all sources, excluding the amounts received as dividends on stock in other corporations, joint stock companies or associations, or insurance companies also subject to the tax. In other words, the tax is imposed upon the doing of business of the character described, and the measure of the tax is to be the income, with the deduction stated, received not only from property used in business, but from every source. * * *

The act * * * does not impose direct taxation upon property solely because of its ownership, but the tax is within the class which Congress is authorized to lay and collect under Art. I, § 8, cl. 1 of the Constitution, and described generally as taxes, duties, imposts and excises, upon which the limitation is that they shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Within the category of indirect taxation, as we shall have further occasion to show, is embraced a tax upon business done in a corporate capacity, which is the subject-matter of the tax imposed in the act under consideration. The Pollock case construed the tax there levied as direct, because it was imposed upon property simply because of its ownership. In the present case the tax is not payable unless there be a carrying on or doing of business in the designated capacity, and this is made the occasion for the tax, measured by the standard prescribed. The difference between the acts is not merely nominal, but rests upon substantial differences between the mere ownership of property and the actual doing of business in a certain way. * * *

The tax under consideration, as we have construed the statute, may be described as an excise upon the particular privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity, i.e., with the advantages which arise from corporate or quasi-corporate organization; or, when applied to insurance companies, for doing the business of such companies. As was said in the Thomas Case, 192 U. S. 363 supra, the requirement to pay such taxes involves the exercise of privileges, and the element of absolute and unavoidable demand is lacking. If business is not done in the manner described in the statute, no tax is payable. * * *

It is further contended that some of the corporations, notably insurance companies, have large investments in municipal bonds and other non-taxable securities, and in real estate and personal property not used in the business, that therefore the selection of the measure of the income from all sources is void, because it reaches property which is not the subject of taxation—upon the authority of the Pollock case, supra. But this argument confuses the measure of the tax upon the privilege, with direct taxation of the estate or thing taxed. In the Pollock case, as we have seen, the tax was held unconstitutional, because it was in effect a direct tax on the property solely because of its ownership. * * *

It is * * * well settled by the decisions of this Court that when the sovereign authority has exercised the right to tax a legitimate subject of taxation as an exercise of a franchise or privilege, it is no objection that the measure of taxation is found in the income produced in part from property which of itself considered is nontaxable. * * *

1. Nicol v. Ames, 173 U. S. 509, 43 L. ed. 786, 19 Sup. Ct. 522 (1899) held a tax on sales at business exchanges to be an excise, the court saying: "We think the tax is, in effect, a duty or excise laid upon the privilege, opportunity, or facility offered at boards of trade or exchanges for the transaction of the business mentioned in the act. It is not a tax upon the business itself which is so transacted, but it is a duty upon the facilities made use of, and actually employed, in the transaction of the business, and separate and apart from the business itself."

2. Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S. 608, 46 L. ed. 713, 22 Sup. Ct. 493 (1902) held a tax on manufactured tobacco in the hands of dealers to be an excise, the court saying that "it is not a tax upon property as such, but upon certain kinds of property, having reference to their origin and their intended use."

3. Bromley v. McCaughn, 280 U. S. 124, 74 L. ed. 226, 50 Sup. Ct. 46 (1929) held that a tax on transfers of property by gift inter vivos, and not made in contemplation of death, was not a direct tax but an excise and thus valid although not apportioned. Justices Sutherland, Van Devanter and Butler dissented.

4. Although Mr. Chief Justice White said in Brushaber v. Union Pacific R. Co., 240 U. S. 1, 60 L. ed. 493, 36 Sup. Ct. 236 (1916) that the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment was not a limitation upon the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, later cases repudiated this view.

In Nichols v. Coolidge, 274 U. S. 531, 71 L. ed. 1184, 47 Sup. Ct. 710, 52 A. L. R. 1081 (1927), it was held that a Federal Estate Tax Act was inapplicable to an irrevocable trust distributable at death but executed before any federal law had been passed taxing such transfers. And Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U. S. 312, 76 L. ed. 772, 52 Sup. Ct. 358 (1932) invalidated a provision of the same tax act declaring that gifts made within two years of death would be conclusively presumed to have been made in contemplation thereof and subjecting such gifts to death duties. However, speaking for the court in A. Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U. S. 40, 78 L. ed. 1109, 54 Sup. Ct. 599 (1934), Mr. Justice Sutherland said: "Except in rare and specified instances, the due process of law clause contained in the Fifth Amendment is not a limitation upon the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution." The above mentioned cases were cited in support of this statement. See, generally, Ballard, Retroactive Federal Taxation, 48 Harv. L. Rev. 592 (1935), 5 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 687.

5. Implied limitations on the taxing powers of the national government and of the states have previously been dealt with in Chapter III, in cases involving the doctrine of intergovernmental tax immunities. No attempt is made here to deal with problems relating to national taxation for revenue purposes as the subject is more suitably covered in courses in Taxation. The cases which follow raise important issues as to the extent to which the taxing power of Congress may be used to effect regulatory, rather than revenue-raising, objectives. Cases involving constitutional limitations on state taxation of commerce are included in chapter VI.

UNITED STATES v. KAHRIGER.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1953.

345 U. S. 22, 97 L. ed. 754, 73 Sup. Ct. 510.

The issue raised by this appeal is the constitutionality of the occupational tax provisions of the Revenue Act of 1951 which levy a tax on persons engaged in the business of accepting wagers, and require such persons to register with the Collector of Internal Revenue. The unconstitutionality of the tax is asserted on two grounds. First, it is said that Congress, under the pretense of exercising its power to tax has attempted to penalize illegal intrastate gambling through the regulatory features of the Act, 26 U. S. C. (Supp. V) § 3291 [F. C. A. 26 § 3291], and has thus infringed the police power which is reserved to the states. Secondly, it is urged that the registration provisions of the tax violate the privilege against self-incrimination and are arbitrary and vague, contrary to the guarantees of the Fifth Amendment.

The case comes here on appeal, in accordance with 18 U. S. C. § 3731 [F. C. A. 18 § 3731], from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, where an information was filed against appellee alleging that he was in the business of accepting wagers and that he willfully failed to register for and pay the occupational tax in question. Appellee moved to dismiss on the ground that the sections upon which the indictment was based were unconstitutional. The District Court sustained the motion on the authority of our opinion in United States v. Constantine, 296 U. S. 287. The court reasoned that while "the subject matter of this legislation so far as revenue purposes is concerned is within the scope of Federal authorities," the tax was unconstitutional in that the information called for by the registration provisions was "peculiarly applicable to the applicant from the standpoint of law enforcement and vice control," and therefore the whole of the legislation was an infringement by the Federal Government on the police power reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment. United States v. Kahriger, 105 F. Supp. 322, 323.

The result below is at odds with the position of the seven other district courts which have considered the matter, and, in our opinion, is erroneous.

In the term following the Constantine opinion, this Court pointed out in Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U. S. 506, at page 513, (a case involving a tax on a "limited class" of objectionable firearms alleged to be prohibitory in effect and "to disclose unmistakably the legislative purpose to regulate rather than to tax"), that the subject of the tax in Constantine was "described or treated as criminal by the taxing statute." The tax in the Constantine case was a special additional excise tax of $1,000, placed only on persons who carried on a liquor business in violation of state law. The wagering tax with which we are here concerned applies to all persons engaged in the business of receiving wagers regardless of whether such activity violates state law.

The substance of respondent's position with respect to the Tenth Amendment is that Congress has chosen to tax a specified business which is not within its power to regulate. The precedents are many upholding taxes similar to this wagering tax as a proper exercise of the federal taxing power. In the License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 462, the controversy arose out of indictments for selling lottery tickets and retailing liquor in various states without having first obtained and paid for a license under the Internal Revenue Act of Congress. The objecting taxpayers urged that Congress could not constitutionally tax or regulate activities carried on within a state. 5 Wall. at page 470. The Court pointed out that Congress had "no power of regulation nor any direct control," 5 Wall. at pages 471, 472, over the business there involved. The Court said if the licenses were to be regarded as by themselves giving authority to carry on the licensed business it might be impossible to reconcile the granting of them with the Constitution. 5 Wall. at page 471.

"But it is not necessary to regard these laws as giving such authority. So far as they relate to trade within State limits, they give none, and can give none. They simply express the purpose of the government not to interfere by penal proceedings with the trade nominally licensed, if the required taxes are paid. The power to tax is not questioned, nor the power to impose penalties for non-payment of taxes. The granting of a license, therefore, must be regarded as nothing more than a mere form of imposing a tax, and of implying nothing except that the licensee shall be subject to no penalties under national law, if he pays it." 5 Wall. at page 471.

Appellee would have us say that because there is legislative history indicating a congressional motive to suppress wagering, this tax is not a proper exercise of such taxing power. In the License Cases, supra, it was admitted that the federal license "discouraged" the activities. The intent to curtail and hinder, as well as tax, was also manifest in the following cases, and in each of them the tax was upheld: Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533 (tax on paper money issued by state banks); McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27, 59 (tax on colored oleomargarine); United States v. Doremus, 249 U. S. 86 and Nigro v. United States, 276 U. S. 332 (tax on narcotics); Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U. S. 506 (tax on firearms); United States v. Sanchez, 340 U. S. 42 (tax on marihuana).

It is conceded that a federal excise tax does not cease to be valid merely because it discourages or deters the activities taxed. Nor is the tax invalid because the revenue obtained is negligible. Appellee, however, argues that the sole purpose of the statute is to penalize only illegal gambling in the states through the guise of a tax measure. As with the above excise taxes which we have held to be valid, the instant tax has a regulatory effect. But regardless of its regulatory effect, the wagering tax produces revenue. As such it surpasses both the narcotics and firearms taxes which we have found valid.

It is axiomatic that the power of Congress to tax is extensive and sometimes falls with crushing effect on businesses deemed unessential or inimical to the public welfare, or where, as in dealings with narcotics, the collection of the tax also is difficult. As is well known, the constitutional restraints on taxing are few. "Congress cannot tax exports, and it must impose direct taxes by the rule of apportionment and indirect taxes by the rule of uniformity." License Tax Cases, supra, 5 Wall. 471. The remedy for excessive taxation is in the hands of Congress, not the courts. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 548.

The difficulty of saying when the power to lay uniform taxes is curtailed, because its use brings a result beyond the direct legislative power of Congress, has given rise to diverse decisions. In that area of abstract ideas, a final definition of the line between state and federal power has baffled judges and legislators. * * *

Where federal legislation has rested on other congressional powers, such as the Necessary and Proper clause or the Commerce clause, this Court has generally sustained the statutes, despite their effect on matters ordinarily considered state concern. When federal power to regulate is found, its exercise is a matter for Congress. Where Congress has employed the taxing clause a greater variation in the decisions has resulted. The division in this Court has been more acute. Without any specific differentiation between the power to tax and other federal powers, the indirect results from the exercise of the power to tax have raised more doubts. This is strikingly illustrated by the shifting course of adjudication in taxation of the handling of narcotics. The tax ground in the Veazie Bank case, supra, recognized that strictly state governmental activities such as the right to pass laws were beyond the federal taxing power. That case allowed a tax, however, that obliterated from circulation all state bank notes. A reason was that "the judicial cannot prescribe to the legislative departments of the government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers." 8 Wall. at page 548. The tax cases cited above in the third preceding paragraph followed that theory. It is hard to understand why the power to tax should raise more doubts because of indirect effects than other federal powers.

Penalty provisions in tax statutes added for breach of a regulation concerning activities in themselves subject only to state regulation have caused this Court to declare the enactments invalid. Unless there are provisions, extraneous to any tax need, courts are without authority to limit the exercise of the taxing power. All the provisions of this excise are adapted to the collection of a valid tax.

Nor do we find the registration requirements of the wagering tax offensive. All that is required is the filing of names, addresses, and places of business. This is quite general in tax returns. Such data are directly and intimately related to the collection of the tax and are "obviously supportable as in aid of a revenue purpose." Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U. S. 506, at page 513. The registration provisions make the tax simpler to collect.

Since appellee failed to register for the wagering tax, it is difficult to see how he can now claim the privilege even assuming that the disclosure of violations of law are called for. In United States v. Sullivan, 274 U. S. 259, defendant was convicted of refusing to file an income tax return. It was assumed that his income "was derived from business in violation of the National Prohibition Act." 274 U. S. at page 263. "As the defendant's income was taxed, the statute of course required a return. See United States v. Sischo, 262 U. S. 165. In the decision that this was contrary to the Constitution we are of opinion that the protection of the Fifth Amendment was pressed too far. If the form of return provided called for answers that the defendant was privileged from making he could have raised the objection in the return, but could not on that account refuse to make any return at all." 274 U. S. at page 263.

Assuming that respondent can raise the self-incrimination issue, that privilege has relation only to past acts, not to future acts that may or may not be committed. 8 Wigmore (3d ed., 1940) § 2259(c). If respondent wishes to take wagers subject to excise taxes under § 3285, supra, he must pay an occupational tax and register. Under the registration provisions of the wagering tax, appellee is not compelled to confess to acts already committed, he is merely informed by the statute that in order to engage in the business of wagering in the future he must fulfill certain conditions.

Finally, we consider respondent's contention that the order of dismissal was correct because a conviction under the sections in question would violate the Due Process Clause because the classification is arbitrary and the statutory definitions are vague. The applicable definitions are 26 U. S. C. (Supp. V) § 3285(b), (d) and (e) [F. C. A. 26 § 3285(b), (d), (e)]. The arbitrariness is said to arise from discrimination because some wagering activities are excluded. The Constitution does not require that a tax statute cover all phases of a taxed or licensed business. Respondent predicates vagueness of the statute upon the use, in defining the subject of the tax, of the description "engaged in the business" of wagering and "usually" in § 3285 (b) (2). We have no doubt the definitions make clear the activities covered and excluded.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, concurring.

I concur in the judgment and opinion of the Court, but with such doubt that if the minority agreed upon an opinion which did not impair legitimate use of the taxing power I probably would join it. But we deal here with important and contrasting values in our scheme of government, and it is important that neither be allowed to destroy the other. * * *

But here is a purported tax law which requires no reports and lays no tax except from specified gamblers whose calling in most states is illegal. It requires this group to step forward and identify themselves, not because they like others have income, but because of its source. This is difficult to regard as a rational or good-faith revenue measure, despite the deference that is due Congress. On the contrary, it seems to be a plan to tax out of existence the professional gambler whom it has been found impossible to prosecute out of existence. Few pursuits are entitled to less consideration at our hands than professional gambling, but the plain unwelcome fact is that it continues to survive because a large and influential part of our population patronizes and protects it.

The United States has a system of taxation by confession. That a people so numerous, scattered and individualistic annually assesses itself with a tax liability, often in highly burdensome amounts, is a reassuring sign of the stability and vitality of our system of self government. What surprised me in once trying to help administer these laws was not to discover examples of recalcitrance, fraud or self-serving mistakes in reporting, but to discover that such derelictions were so few. It will be a sad day for the revenues if the good will of the people toward their taxing system is frittered away in efforts to accomplish by taxation moral reforms that cannot be accomplished by direct legislation. But the evil that can come from this statute will probably soon make itself manifest to Congress. The evil of a judicial decision impairing the legitimate taxing power by extreme constitutional interpretations might not be transient. Even though this statute approaches the fair limits of constitutionality, I join the decision of the Court.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, dissenting.

The Court's opinion manifests a natural difficulty in reaching its conclusion. Constitutional issues are likely to arise whenever Congress draws on the taxing power not to raise revenue but to regulate conduct. This is so, of course, because of the distribution of legislative power as between the Congress and the State Legislatures in the regulation of conduct.

To review in detail the decisions of this Court, beginning with Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, dealing with this ambivalent type of revenue enactment, would be to rehash the familiar. Two generalizations may, however, safely be drawn from this series of cases. Congress may make an oblique use of the taxing power in relation to activities with which Congress may deal directly, as for instance, commerce between the States. Thus, if the dissenting views of Mr. Justice Holmes in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251, 277, had been the decision of the Court, as they became in United States v. Darby, 312 U. S. 100, the effort to deal with the problem of child labor through an assertion of the taxing power in the statute considered in Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U. S. 20, would by the latter case have been sustained. However, when oblique use is made of the taxing power as to matters which substantively are not within the powers delegated to Congress, the Court cannot shut its eyes to what is obviously, because designedly, an attempt to control conduct which the Constitution left to the responsibility of the States, merely because Congress wrapped the legislation in the verbal cellophane of a revenue measure.

Concededly the constitutional questions presented by such legislation are difficult. On the one hand, courts should scrupulously abstain from hobbling congressional choice of policies, particularly when the vast reach of the taxing power is concerned. On the other hand, to allow what otherwise is excluded from congressional authority to be brought within it by casting legislation in the form of a revenue measure could, as so significantly expounded in the Child Labor Tax Case, supra, offer an easy way for the legislative imagination to control "any one of the great number of subjects of public interest, jurisdiction of which the states have never parted with * * *." Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U. S. at page 38. I say "significantly" because Mr. Justice Holmes and two of the Justices who had joined his dissent in Hammer v. Dagenhart, McKenna and Brandeis, JJ., agreed with the opinion in the Child Labor Tax Case. Issues of such gravity affecting the balance of powers within our federal system are not susceptible of comprehensive statement by smooth formulas such as that a tax is nonetheless a tax although it discourages the activities taxed, or, that a tax may be imposed although it may effect ulterior ends. No such phrase, however fine and well-worn, enables one to decide the concrete case.

What is relevant to judgment here is that, even if the history of this legislation as it went through Congress did not give one the libretto to the song, the context of the circumstances which brought forth this enactment—sensationally exploited disclosures regarding gambling in big cities and small, the relation of this gambling to corrupt politics, the impatient public response to these disclosures, the feeling of ineptitude or paralysis on the part of local law-enforcing agencies—emphatically supports what was revealed on the floor of Congress, namely, that what was formally a means of raising revenue for the Federal Government was essentially an effort to check if not to stamp out professional gambling.

A nominal taxing measure must be found an inadmissible intrusion into a domain of legislation reserved for the States not merely when Congress requires that such a measure is to be enforced through a detailed scheme of administration beyond the obvious fiscal needs, as in the Child Labor Tax Case, supra. That is one ground for holding that Congress was constitutionally disrespectful of what is reserved to the States. Another basis for deeming such a formal revenue measure inadmissible is presented by this case. In addition to the fact that Congress was concerned with activity beyond the authority of the Federal Government, the enforcing provision of this enactment is designed for the systematic confession of crimes with a view to prosecution for such crimes under State law.

It is one thing to hold that the exception, which the Fifth Amendment makes to the duty of a witness to give his testimony when relevant to a proceeding in a federal court, does not include the potential danger to that witness of possible prosecution in a state court, Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 606, and, conversely, that the Fifth Amendment does not enable States to give immunity from use in federal courts of testimony given in a State court. Feldman v. United States, 322 U. S. 487. It is a wholly different thing to hold that Congress, which cannot constitutionally grapple directly with gambling in the States, may compel self-incriminating disclosures for the enforcement of State gambling laws, merely because it does so under the guise of a revenue measure obviously passed not for revenue purposes. The motive of congressional legislation is not for our scrutiny, provided only that the ulterior purpose is not expressed in ways which negate what the revenue words on their face express and, which do not seek enforcement of the formal revenue purpose through means that offend those standards of decency in our civilization against which due process is a barrier.

I would affirm this judgment.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, while not joining in the entire opinion, agrees with the views expressed herein that this tax is an attempt by the Congress to control conduct which the Constitution has left to the responsibility of the states.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS concurs, dissenting.

The Fifth Amendment declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The Court nevertheless here sustains an Act which requires a man to register and confess that he is engaged in the business of gambling. I think this confession can provide a basis to convict him of a federal crime for having gambled before registration without paying a federal tax. 26 U. S. C. (Supp. V) §§ 3285, 3290, 3291, 3294 [F. C. A. 26 §§ 3285, 3290, 3291, 3294]. Whether or not the Act has this effect, I am sure that it creates a squeezing device contrived to put a man in federal prison if he refuses to confess himself into a state prison as a violator of state gambling laws. The coercion of confessions is a common but justly criticized practice of many countries that do not have or live up to a Bill of Rights. But we have a Bill of Rights that condemns coerced confessions, however refined or legalistic may be the technique of extortion. I would hold that this Act violates the Fifth Amendment. See my dissent in Feldman v. United States, 322 U. S. 487, 494-503.

NOTES

1. In Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co., 259 U. S. 20, 66 L. ed. 817, 42 Sup. Ct. 449, 21 A. L. R. 1432 (1922), discussed in Mr. Justice Frankfurter's dissenting opinion in the principal case, the court invalidated an attempt by Congress to accomplish, through the use of the national taxing power, a purpose to regulate child labor. Speaking for the court, Mr. Chief Justice Taft said: "The difference between a tax and a penalty is sometimes difficult to define and yet the consequences of the distinction in the required method of their collection often are important. Where the sovereign enacting the law has power to impose both tax and penalty the difference between revenue production and mere regulation may be immaterial, but not so when one sovereign can impose a tax only, and the power of regulation rests in another. Taxes are occasionally imposed in the discretion of the legislature on proper subjects with the primary motive of obtaining revenue from them and with the incidental motive of discouraging them by making their continuance onerous. They do not lose their character as taxes because of the incidental motive. But there comes a time in the extension of the penalizing features of the so-called tax when it loses its character as such and becomes a mere penalty with the characteristics of regulation and punishment. Such is the case in the law before us. Although Congress does not invalidate the contract of employment or expressly declare that the employment within the mentioned ages is illegal, it does exhibit its intent practically to achieve the latter result by adopting the criteria of wrongdoing and imposing its principal consequence on those who transgress its standard."

A previous attempt to deal with the same problem through a federal statute excluding the products of child labor from the channels of interstate commerce had been held invalid in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251, 62 L. ed. 1101, 38 Sup. Ct. 529, 3 A. L. R. 649 (1918) in a five-to-four decision. This case was expressly overruled in United States v. F. W. Darby Lumber Co., 312 U. S. 100, 85 L. ed. 609, 61 Sup. Ct. 451, 132 A. L. R. 1430 (1941).

2. In Hill v. Wallace, 259 U. S. 44, 66 L. ed. 822, 42 Sup. Ct. 453 (1922) legislation of Congress entitled "An Act taxing contracts for the sale of grain for future delivery, and options for such contracts, and providing for the regulation of boards of trade, and for other purposes" was held invalid. In addition to a tax of two cents on every $100 of value imposed by a prior law, this statute imposed a tax of twenty cents a bushel for every bushel involved in every such contract with exception that the twenty cent tax should not apply to such sales when made by or through a board of trade designated by the Secretary of Agriculture who was authorized to designate only such boards of trade as complied with several detailed requirements. The court said: "The act is in essence and on its face a complete regulation of boards of trade, with a penalty of twenty cents a bushel on all 'futures' to coerce boards of trade and their members into compliance. When this purpose is declared in the title to the bill, and is so clear from the effect of the provisions of the bill itself, it leaves no ground upon which the provisions we have been considering can be sustained as a valid exercise of the taxing power." A subsequent enactment known as the Grain Futures Act of 1922, regulating boards of trade and members thereof engaged in sale of "futures" in grain, was upheld as a valid regulation of interstate commerce. Board of Trade v. Olsen, 262 U. S. 1, 67 L. ed. 839, 43 Sup. Ct. 470 (1923).

3. Coercive penalty taxes imposed upon coal producers for refusal to become "code members" or for failure to comply with the code of fair competition set up under the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937 were sustained in Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381, 84 L. ed. 1263, 60 Sup. Ct. 907 (1940). By its terms the regulatory features of the statute applied "only to matters and transactions in or directly affecting interstate commerce in bituminous coal." The court said: "Clearly this tax is not designed merely for revenue purposes. In purpose and effect it is primarily a sanction to enforce the regulatory provisions of the Act. * * * Congress may impose penalties in aid of the exercise of any of its enumerated powers. The power of taxation, granted to Congress by the Constitution, may be utilized as a sanction for the exercise of another power which is granted it. * * * It is so utilized here. The regulatory provisions are clearly within the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause of the Constitution."

UNITED STATES v. BUTLER.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1936.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this case we must determine whether certain provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, 1933, conflict with the Federal Constitution.

Title I of the statute is captioned "Agricultural Adjustment." Section 1 recites that an economic emergency has arisen, due to disparity between the prices of agricultural and other commodities, with consequent destruction of farmers' purchasing power and breakdown in orderly exchange, which in turn, have affected transactions in agricultural commodities with a national public interest and burdened and obstructed the normal currents of commerce, calling for the enactment of legislation.

Section 2 declares it to be the policy of Congress:

"To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period."

The base period, in the case of cotton, and all other commodities except tobacco, is designated as that between August, 1909, and July, 1914.

The further policies announced are an approach to the desired equality by gradual correction of present inequalities "at as rapid a rate as is deemed feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets," and the protection of consumers' interests by readjusting farm production at such level as will not increase the percentage of the consumers' retail expenditures for agricultural commodities or products derived therefrom, which is returned to the farmer, above the percentage returned to him in the base period.

Section 8 provides, amongst other things, that "In order to effectuate the declared policy," the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power

"(1) To provide for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity, through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods, and to provide for rental or benefit payments in connection therewith or upon that part of the production of any basic agricultural commodity required for domestic consumption, in such amounts as the Secretary deems fair and reasonable, to be paid out of any moneys available for such payments. * * *

It will be observed that the Secretary is not required, but is permitted, if, in his uncontrolled judgment, the policy of the act will so be promoted, to make agreements with individual farmers for a reduction of acreage or production upon such terms as he may think fair and reasonable.

Section 9 (a) enacts:

"To obtain revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the national economic emergency, there shall be levied processing taxes as hereinafter provided. * * * The processing tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the first domestic processing of the commodity, whether of domestic production or imported, and shall be paid by the processor. * * *

* * * On July 14, 1933, the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, proclaimed that he had determined rental and benefit payments should be made with respect to cotton; that the marketing year for that commodity was to begin August 1, 1933; and calculated and fixed the rates of processing and floor taxes on cotton in accordance with the terms of the act.

The United States presented a claim to the respondents as receivers of the Hoosac Mills Corporation for processing and floor taxes on cotton levied under §§ 9 and 16 of the act. The receivers recommended that the claim be disallowed. The District Court found the taxes valid and ordered them paid. Upon appeal the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the order. The judgment under review was entered prior to the adoption of the amending act of August 24, 1935, and we are therefore concerned only with the original act. * * *

First. [The opinion here distinguishes Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 447, on the ground that that case did not deal with an earmarked tax. It states that the Agricultural Adjustment Act both levied the tax and appropriated it to a specified purpose, that if the spending was for an unconstitutional purpose, the tax to raise the money therefor would likewise be unconstitutional, and that for that reason the processors on whom this particular tax was laid had standing to challenge the constitutionality of the expenditure.]

Second. The Government asserts that even if the respondents may question the propriety of the appropriation embodied in the statute their attack must fail because Article I, § 8 of the Constitution authorizes the contemplated expenditure of the funds raised by the tax. This contention presents the great and the controlling question in the case.

Article I, § 8, of the Constitution vests sundry powers in the Congress. But two of its clauses have any bearing upon the validity of the statute under review.

The third clause endows the Congress with power "to regulate Commerce * * * among the several States." Despite a reference in its first section to a burden upon, and an obstruction of the normal currents of commerce, the act under review does not purport to regulate transactions in interstate or foreign commerce. Its stated purpose is the control of agricultural production, a purely local activity, in an effort to raise the prices paid the farmer. Indeed, the Government does not attempt to uphold the validity of the act on the basis of the commerce clause, which, for the purpose of the present case, may be put aside as irrelevant.

The clause thought to authorize the legislation,—the first,—confers upon the Congress power "to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States. * * *" It is not contended that this provision grants power to regulate agricultural production upon the theory that such legislation would promote the general welfare. The Government concedes that the phrase "to provide for the general welfare" qualifies the power "to lay and collect taxes." The view that the clause grants power to provide for the general welfare, independently of the taxing power, has never been authoritatively accepted. Mr. Justice Story points out that if it were adopted "it is obvious that under color of the generality of the words, to 'provide for the common defence and general welfare,' the government of the United States is, in reality, a government of general and unlimited powers, notwithstanding the subsequent enumeration of specific powers." The true construction undoubtedly is that the only thing granted is the power to tax for the purpose of providing funds for payment of the nation's debts and making provision for the general welfare.

Nevertheless the Government asserts that warrant is found in this clause for the adoption of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The argument is that Congress may appropriate and authorize the spending of moneys for the "general welfare"; that the phrase should be liberally construed to cover anything conducive to national welfare; that decision as to what will promote such welfare rests with Congress alone, and the courts may not review its determination; and finally that the appropriation under attack was in fact for the general welfare of the United States.

The Congress is expressly empowered to lay taxes to provide for the general welfare. Funds in the Treasury as a result of taxation may be expended only through appropriation. (Art. I, § 9, cl. 7.) They can never accomplish the objects for which they were collected unless the power to appropriate is as broad as the power to tax. The necessary implication from the terms of the grant is that the public funds may be appropriated "to provide for the general welfare of the United States." These words cannot be meaningless, else they would not have been used. The conclusion must be that they were intended to limit and define the granted power to raise and to expend money. How shall they be construed to effectuate the intent of the instrument?

Since the foundation of the Nation sharp differences of opinion have persisted as to the true interpretation of the phrase. Madison asserted it amounted to no more than a reference to the other powers enumerated in the subsequent clauses of the same section; that, as the United States is a government of limited and enumerated powers, the grant of power to tax and spend for the general national welfare must be confined to the enumerated legislative fields committed to the Congress. In this view the phrase is mere tautology, for taxation and appropriation are or may be necessary incidents of the exercise of any of the enumerated legislative powers. Hamilton, on the other hand, maintained the clause confers a power separate and distinct from those later enumerated, is not restricted in meaning by the grant of them, and Congress consequently has a substantive power to tax and to appropriate, limited only by the requirement that it shall be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States. * * * Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, espouses the Hamiltonian position. We shall not review the writings of public men and commentators or discuss the legislative practice. Study of all these leads us to conclude that the reading advocated by Mr. Justice Story is the correct one. * * *

That the qualifying phrase must be given effect all advocates of broad construction admit. Hamilton, in his well known Report on Manufactures, states that the purpose must be "general, and not local." Monroe, an advocate of Hamilton's doctrine, wrote: "Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the money to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not." Story says that if the tax be not proposed for the common defence or general welfare, but for other objects wholly extraneous, it would be wholly indefensible upon constitutional principles. And he makes it clear that the powers of taxation and appropriation extend only to matters of national, as distinguished from local welfare. * * *

How great is the extent of that range, when the subject is the promotion of the general welfare of the United States, we hardly need remark. But, despite the breadth of the legislative discretion, our duty to hear and to render judgment remains. If the statute plainly violates the stated principle of the Constitution we must so declare.

We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States" or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. Wholly apart from that question, another principle embedded in our Constitution prohibits the enforcement of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The act invades the reserved rights of the states. It is a statutory plan to regulate and control agricultural production, a matter beyond the powers delegated to the federal government. The tax, the appropriation of the funds raised, and the direction for their disbursement, are but parts of the plan. They are but means to an unconstitutional end. * * *

"Congress cannot, under the pretext of executing delegated power, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the Federal Government. And we accept as established doctrine that any provision of an act of Congress ostensibly enacted under power granted by the Constitution, not naturally and reasonably adapted to the effective exercise of such power but solely to the achievement of something plainly within power reserved to the States, is invalid and cannot be enforced." Linder v. United States, 268 U. S. 5, 17. * * *

statutes which purported to be taxing measures. But their purpose was found to be to regulate the conduct of manufacturing and trading, not in interstate commerce, but in the states,—matters not within any power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution—and the levy of the tax a means to force compliance. The court held this was not a constitutional use, but an unconstitutional abuse of the power to tax. * * * These decisions demonstrate that Congress could not, under the pretext of raising revenue, lay a tax on processors who refuse to pay a certain price for cotton, and exempt those who agree so to do, with the purpose of benefiting producers.

Third. If the taxing power may not be used as the instrument to enforce a regulation of matters of state concern with respect to which the Congress has no authority to interfere, may it, as in the present case, be employed to raise the money necessary to purchase a compliance which the Congress is powerless to command? The government asserts that whatever might be said against the validity of the plan if compulsory, it is constitutionally sound because the end is accomplished by voluntary cooperation. There are two sufficient answers to the contention. The regulation is not in fact voluntary. The farmer, of course, may refuse to comply, but the price of such refusal is the loss of benefits. The amount offered is intended to be sufficient to exert pressure on him to agree to the proposed regulation. The power to confer or withhold unlimited benefits is the power to coerce or destroy. * * *

But if the plan were one for purely voluntary cooperation it would stand no better so far as federal power is concerned. At best it is a scheme for purchasing with federal funds submission to federal regulation of a subject reserved to the states.

It is said that Congress has the undoubted right to appropriate money to executive officers for expenditure under contracts between the government and individuals; that much of the total expenditures is so made. But appropriations and expenditures under contracts for proper governmental purposes cannot justify contracts which are not within federal power. * * *

We are not here concerned with a conditional appropriation of money, nor with a provision that if certain conditions are not complied with the appropriation shall no longer be available. By the Agricultural Adjustment Act the amount of the tax is appropriated to be expended only in payment under contracts whereby the parties bind themselves to regulation by the Federal Government. There is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditions upon which moneys shall be expended and one effective only upon assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could not be enforced. * * *

Congress has no power to enforce its commands on the farmer to the ends sought by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It must follow that it may not indirectly accomplish those ends by taxing and spending to purchase compliance. The Constitution and the entire plan of our government negative any such use of the power to tax and to spend as the act undertakes to authorize. It does not help to declare that local conditions throughout the nation have created a situation of national concern; for this is but to say that whenever there is a widespread similarity of local conditions, Congress may ignore constitutional limitations upon its own powers and usurp those reserved to the states. If, in lieu of compulsory regulation of subjects within the states' reserved jurisdiction, which is prohibited, the Congress could invoke the taxing and spending power as a means to accomplish the same end, clause 1 of § 8 of Article I would become the instrument for total subversion of the governmental powers reserved to the individual states. * * *

Hamilton himself, the leading advocate of broad interpretation of the power to tax and to appropriate for the general welfare, never suggested that any power granted by the Constitution could be used for the destruction of local self-government in the states. Story countenances no such doctrine. It seems never to have occurred to them, or to those who have agreed with them, that the general welfare of the United States, (which has aptly been termed "an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States,") might be served by obliterating the constituent members of the Union. But to this fatal conclusion the doctrine contended for would inevitably lead. * * *

The judgment is

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE STONE, dissenting. * * *

1. The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness. One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government.

2. The constitutional power of Congress to levy an excise tax upon the processing of agricultural products is not questioned. The present levy is held invalid, not for any want of power in Congress to lay such a tax to defray public expenditures, including those for the general welfare, but because the use to which its proceeds are put is disapproved.

3. As the present depressed state of agriculture is nation wide in its extent and effects, there is no basis for saying that the expenditures of public money in aid of farmers is not within the specifically granted power of Congress to levy taxes to "provide for the * * * general welfare." The opinion of the Court does not declare otherwise. * * *

It is with these preliminary and hardly controverted matters in mind that we should direct our attention to the pivot on which the decision of the Court is made to turn. It is that a levy unquestionably within the taxing power of Congress may be treated as invalid because it is a step in a plan to regulate agricultural production and is thus a forbidden infringement of state power. The levy is not any the less an exercise of taxing power because it is intended to defray an expenditure for the general welfare rather than for some other support of government. Nor is the levy and collection of the tax pointed to as effecting the regulation. While all federal taxes inevitably have some influence on the internal economy of the states, it is not contended that the levy of a processing tax upon manufacturers using agricultural products as raw material has any perceptible regulatory effect upon either their production or manufacture. The tax is unlike the penalties which were held invalid in the Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U. S. 20, in Hill v. Wallace, 259 U. S. 44, in Linder v. United States, 268 U. S. 5, 17, and in United States v. Constantine, 296 U. S. 287, because they were themselves the instruments of regulation by virtue of their coercive effect on matters left to the control of the states. Here regulation, if any there be, is accomplished not by the tax but by the method by which its proceeds are extended, and would equally be accomplished by any like use of public funds, regardless of their source.

The method may be simply stated. Out of the available fund payments are made to such farmers as are willing to curtail their productive acreage, who in fact do so and who in advance have filed their written undertaking to do so with the Secretary of Agriculture. In saying that this method of spending public moneys is an invasion of the reserved powers of the states, the Court does not assert that the expenditure of public funds to promote the general welfare is not a substantive power specifically delegated to the national government, as Hamilton and Story pronounced it to be. It does not deny that the expenditure of funds for the benefit of farmers and in aid of a program of curtailment of production of agricultural products, and thus of a supposedly better ordered national economy, is within the specifically granted power. But it is declared that state power is nevertheless infringed by the expenditure of the proceeds of the tax to compensate farmers for the curtailment of their cotton acreage. Although the farmer is placed under no legal compulsion to reduce acreage, it is said that the mere offer of compensation for so doing is a species of economic coercion which operates with the same legal force and effect as though the curtailment were made mandatory by Act of Congress. In any event it is insisted that even though not coercive the expenditure of public funds to induce the recipients to curtail production is itself an infringement of state power, since the federal government cannot invade the domain of the states by the "purchase" of performance of acts which it has no power to compel. * * *

It is insisted that, while the Constitution gives to Congress, in specific and unambiguous terms, the power to tax and spend, the power is subject to limitations which do not find their origin in any express provision of the Constitution and to which other expressly delegated powers are not subject.

The Constitution requires that public funds shall be spent for a defined purpose, the promotion of the general welfare. Their expenditure usually involves payment on terms which will insure use by the selected recipients within the limits of the constitutional purpose. Expenditures would fail of their purpose and thus lose their constitutional sanction if the terms of payment were not such that by their influence on the action of the recipients the permitted end would be attained. The power of Congress to spend is inseparable from persuasion to action over which Congress has no legislative control. Congress may not command that the science of agriculture be taught in state universities. But if it would aid the teaching of that science by grants to state institutions, it is appropriate, if not necessary, that the grant be on the condition, incorporated in the Morrill Act, 12 Stat. 503, 26 Stat. 417, that it be used for the intended purpose. Similarly it would seem to be compliance with the Constitution, not violation of it, for the government to take and the university to give a contract that the grant would be so used. It makes no difference that there is a promise to do an act which the condition is calculated to induce. Condition and promise are alike valid since both are in furtherance of the national purpose for which the money is appropriated.

These effects upon individual action, which are but incidents of the authorized expenditure of government money, are pronounced to be themselves a limitation upon the granted power, and so the time-honored principle of constitutional interpretation that the granted power includes all those which are incident to it is reversed. * * *

The spending power of Congress is in addition to the legislative power and not subordinate to it. This independent grant of the power of the purse, and its very nature, involving in its exercise the duty to insure expenditure within the granted power, presuppose freedom of selection among divers ends and aims, and the capacity to impose such conditions as will render the choice effective. It is a contradiction in terms to say that there is power to spend for the national welfare, while rejecting any power to impose conditions reasonably adapted to the attainment of the end which alone would justify the expenditure. * * * If appropriation in aid of a program of curtailment of agricultural production is constitutional, and it is not denied that it is, payment to farmers on condition that they reduce their crop acreage is constitutional. It is not any the less so because the farmer at his own option promises to fulfill the condition. * * *

Mr. JUSTICE BRANDEIS and Mr. JUSTICE CARDOZO join in this opinion.

NOTE

1. A new Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed in 1938 with objectives similar to those in the Act of 1933 but pegged upon the commerce power of the national government rather than its taxing power. This statute was upheld in Mufford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38, 83 L. ed. 1092, 59 Sup. Ct. 648 (1939).

STEWART MACHINE CO. v. DAVIS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1937.

Mr. JUSTICE CARDOZO delivered the opinion of the Court.

The validity of the tax imposed by the Social Security Act on employers of eight or more is here to be determined.

Petitioner, an Alabama corporation, paid a tax in accordance with the statute, filed a claim for refund with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and sued to recover the payment ($46.14), asserting a conflict between the statute and the Constitution of the United States. Upon demurrer the District Court gave judgment for the defendant, dismissing the complaint, and the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. * * * An important question of constitutional law being involved, we granted certiorari.

The Social Security Act (Act of August 14, 1935, c. 531, 49 Stat. 620, 42 U. S. C., c. 7 (Supp.)) is divided into eleven separate titles, of which only Titles IX and III are so related to this case as to stand in need of summary.

The caption of Title IX is "Tax on Employers of Eight or More." Every employer (with stated exceptions) is to pay for each calendar year "an excise tax, with respect to having individuals in his employ," the tax to be measured by prescribed percentages of the total wages payable by the employer during the calendar year with respect to such employment. Section 901. One is not, however, an "employer" within the meaning of the act unless he employs eight persons or more. Section 907 (a). There are also other limitations of minor importance. The term "employment" too has its special definition, excluding agricultural labor, domestic service in a private home and some other smaller classes. Section 907 (c). The tax begins with the year 1936, and is payable for the first time on January 31, 1937. During the calendar year 1936 the rate is to be one per cent, during 1937 two per cent, and three per cent thereafter. The proceeds, when collected, go into the Treasury of the United States like internal-revenue collections generally. Section 905 (a). They are not earmarked in any way. In certain circumstances, however, credits are allowable. Section 902. If the taxpayer has made contributions to an unemployment fund under a state law, he may credit such contributions against the federal tax, provided, however, that the total credit allowed to any taxpayer shall not exceed 90 per centum of the tax against which it is credited, and provided also that the state law shall have been certified to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Social Security Board as satisfying certain minimum criteria. * * * Some of the conditions thus attached to the allowance of a credit are designed to give assurance that the state unemployment compensation law shall be one in substance as well as name. Others are designed to give assurance that the contributions shall be protected against loss after payment to the state. To this last end there are provisions that before a state law shall have the approval of the Board it must direct that the contributions to the state fund be paid over immediately to the Secretary of the Treasury to the credit of the "Unemployment Trust Fund." * * * For the moment it is enough to say that the Fund is to be held by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is to invest in government securities any portion not required in his judgment to meet current withdrawals. He is authorized and directed to pay out of the Fund to any competent state agency such sums as it may duly requisition from the amount standing to its credit. Section 904 (f). * * *

The assault on the statute proceeds on an extended front. Its assailants take the ground that the tax is not an excise; that it is not uniform throughout the United States as excises are required to be; that its exceptions are so many and arbitrary as to violate the Fifth Amendment; that its purpose was not revenue, but an unlawful invasion of the reserved powers of the states; and that the states in submitting to it have yielded to coercion and have abandoned governmental functions which they are not permitted to surrender.

The objections will be considered seriatim with such further explanation as may be necessary to make their meaning clear.

First: The tax, which is described in the statute as an excise, is laid with uniformity throughout the United States as a duty, an impost or an excise upon the relation of employment.

1. * * * An excise is not limited to vocations or activities that may be prohibited altogether. It is not limited to those that are the outcome of a franchise. It extends to vocations or activities pursued as a common right. What the individual does in the operation of a business is amenable to taxation just as much as what he owns, at all events if the classification is not tyrannical or arbitrary. * * *

2. The tax being an excise, its imposition must conform to the canon of uniformity. There has been no departure from this requirement. According to the settled doctrine the uniformity exacted is geographical, not intrinsic. * * *

Second: The excise is not invalid under the provisions of the Fifth Amendment by force of its exemptions.

The statute does not apply, as we have seen, to employers of less than eight. It does not apply to agricultural labor, or domestic service in a private home or to some other classes of less importance. Petitioner contends that the effect of these restrictions is an arbitrary discrimination vitiating the tax.

The Fifth Amendment unlike the Fourteenth has no equal protection clause. * * *

The classifications and exemptions directed by the statute now in controversy have support in considerations of policy and practical convenience that cannot be condemned as arbitrary. The classifications and exemptions would therefore be upheld if they had been adopted by a state and the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment were invoked to annul them. * * * The act of Congress is therefore valid, so far at least as its system of exceptions is concerned, and this though we assume that discrimination, if gross enough, is equivalent to confiscation and subject under the Fifth Amendment to challenge and annulment.

Third: The excise is not void as involving the coercion of the states in contravention of the Tenth Amendment or of restrictions implicit in our federal form of government.

The proceeds of the excise when collected are paid into the Treasury at Washington, and thereafter are subject to appropriation like public moneys generally. Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U. S. 308. No presumption can be indulged that they will be misapplied or wasted. Even if they were collected in the hope or expectation that some other and collateral good would be furthered as an incident, that without more would not make the act invalid. Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U. S. 506. This indeed is hardly questioned. The case for the petitioner is built on the contention that here an ulterior aim is wrought into the very structure of the act, and what is even more important that the aim is not only ulterior, but essentially unlawful. In particular, the 90 per cent credit is relied upon as supporting that conclusion. * * *

[After giving statistics of the large numbers of persons who suffered loss of employment in 1933 to 1936 and of the enormous expenditure, over eight billion dollars, from the federal treasury to give employment on public works and other forms of relief, the opinion continued.]

In the presence of this urgent need for some remedial expedient, the question is to be answered whether the expedient adopted has overlept the bounds of power. The assailants of the statute say that its dominant end and aim is to drive the state legislatures under the whip of economic pressure into the enactment of unemployment compensation laws at the bidding of the central government. Supporters of the statute say that its operation is not constraint, but the creation of a larger freedom, the states and the nation joining in a co-operative endeavor to avert a common evil. Before Congress acted, unemployment compensation insurance was still, for the most part, a project and no more. Wisconsin was the pioneer. Her statute was adopted in 1931. At times bills for such insurance were introduced elsewhere, but they did not reach the stage of law. In 1935, four states (California, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and New York) passed unemployment laws on the eve of the adoption of the Social Security Act, and two others did likewise after the federal act and later in the year. The statutes differed to some extent in type, but were directed to a common end. In 1936, twenty-eight other states fell in line, and eight more the present year. But if states had been holding back before the passage of the federal law, inaction was not owing, for the most part, to the lack of sympathetic interest. Many held back through alarm lest in laying such a toll upon their industries, they would place themselves in a position of economic disadvantage as compared with neighbors or competitors. See House Report, No. 615, 74th Congress, 1st session, p. 8; Senate Report, No. 628, 74th Congress, 1st session, p. 11. Two consequences ensued. One was that the freedom of a state to contribute its fair share to the solution of a national problem was paralyzed by fear. The other was that in so far as there was failure by the states to contribute relief according to the measure of their capacity, a disproportionate burden, and a mountainous one, was laid upon the resources of the Government of the nation.

The Social Security Act is an attempt to find a method by which all these public agencies may work together to a common end. Every dollar of the new taxes will continue in all likelihood to be used and needed by the nation as long as states are unwilling, whether through timidity or for other motives, to do what can be done at home. At least the inference is permissible that Congress so believed, though retaining undiminished freedom to spend the money as it pleased. On the other hand fulfillment of the home duty will be lightened and encouraged by crediting the taxpayer upon his account with the Treasury of the nation to the extent that his contributions under the laws of the locality have simplified or diminished the problem of relief and the probable demand upon the resources of the fisc. Duplicated taxes, or burdens that approach them, are recognized hardships that government, state or national, may properly avoid. Henneford v. Silas Mason Co., 300 U. S. 577; Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 732; Watson v. State Comptroller, 254 U. S. 122, 125. If Congress believed that the general welfare would better be promoted by relief through local units than by the system then in vogue, the co-operating localities ought not in all fairness to pay a second time.

Who then is coerced through the operation of this statute? Not the taxpayer. He pays in fulfillment of the mandate of the local legislature. Not the state. Even now she does not offer a suggestion that in passing the unemployment law she was affected by duress. See Carmichael v.

Southern Coal & Coke Co., [and] Carmichael v. Gulf States Paper Corp., 301 U.S. 495. For all that appears she is satisfied with her choice, and would be sorely disappointed if it were now to be annulled. The difficulty with the petitioner's contention is that it confuses motive with coercion. "Every tax is in some measure regulatory. To some extent it interposes an economic impediment to the activity taxed as compared with others not taxed." Sonzinsky v. United States, supra. In like manner every rebate from a tax when conditioned upon conduct is in some measure a temptation. But to hold that motive or temptation is equivalent to coercion is to plunge the law in endless difficulties. The outcome of such a doctrine is the acceptance of a philosophical determinism by which choice becomes impossible. Till now the law has been guided by a robust common sense which assumes the freedom of the will as a working hypothesis in the solution of its problems. The wisdom of the hypothesis has illustration in this case. Nothing in the case suggests the exertion of a power akin to undue influence, if we assume that such a concept can ever be applied with fitness to the relations between state and nation. Even on that assumption the location of the point at which pressure turns into compulsion, and ceases to be inducement, would be a question of degree,—at times, perhaps, of fact. The point had not been reached when Alabama made her choice. We cannot say that she was acting, not of her unfettered will, but under the strain of a persuasion equivalent to undue influence, when she chose to have relief administered under laws of her own making, by agents of her own selection, instead of under federal laws, administered by federal officers, with all the ensuing evils, at least to many minds, of federal patronage and power. There would be a strange irony, indeed, if her choice were now to be annulled on the basis of an assumed duress in the enactment of a statute which her courts have accepted as a true expression of her will. Beeland Wholesale Co. v. Kaufman, 234 Ala. 249, 174 So. 516. We think the choice must stand.

In ruling as we do, we leave many questions open. We do not say that a tax is valid, when imposed by act of Congress, if it is laid upon the condition that a state may escape its operation through the adoption of a statute unrelated in subject matter to activities fairly within the scope of national policy and power. No such question is before us. In the tender of this credit Congress does not intrude upon fields foreign to its function. The purpose of its intervention, as we have shown, is to safeguard its own treasury and as an incident to that protection to place the states upon a footing of equal opportunity. Drains upon its own resources are to be checked; obstructions to the freedom of the states are to be leveled. It is one thing to impose a tax dependent upon the conduct of the taxpayers, or of the state in which they live, where the conduct to be stimulated or discouraged is unrelated to the fiscal need subserved by the tax in its normal operation, or to any other end legitimately national. The Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U. S. 20, and Hill v. Wallace, 259 U. S. 44, were decided in the belief that the statutes there condemned were exposed to that reproach. Cf. United States v. Constantine, 296 U. S. 287. It is quite another thing to say that a tax will be abated upon the doing of an act that will satisfy the fiscal need, the tax and the alternative being approximate equivalents. In such circumstances, if in no others, inducement or persuasion does not go beyond the bounds of power. We do not fix the outermost line. Enough for present purposes that wherever the line may be, this statute is within it. Definition more precise must abide the wisdom of the future.

Florida v. Mellon, 273 U. S. 12, supplies us with a precedent, if precedent be needed. What was in controversy there was section 301 of the Revenue Act of 1926, which imposes a tax upon the transfer of a decedent's estate, while at the same time permitting a credit, not exceeding 80 per cent, for "the amount of any estate, inheritance, legacy or succession taxes actually paid to any State or Territory." Florida challenged that provision as unlawful. Florida had no inheritance taxes and alleged that under its constitution it could not levy any. 273 U. S. 12, 15. Indeed, by abolishing inheritance taxes, it had hoped to induce wealthy persons to become its citizens. See 67 Cong. Rec., Part 1, pp. 735, 752. It argued at our bar that "the Estate Tax provision was not passed for the purpose of raising federal revenue" (273 U. S. 12, 14), but rather "to coerce States into adopting estate or inheritance tax laws." 273 U. S. 12, 13. In fact, as a result of the 80 per cent credit, material changes of such laws were made in 36 states. In the face of that attack we upheld the act as valid. Cf. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 447, 482; also Act of August 5, 1861, c. 45, 12 Stat. 292; Act of May 13, 1862, c. 66, 12 Stat. 384.

United States v. Butler, supra, is cited by petitioner as a decision to the contrary. There a tax was imposed on processors of farm products, the proceeds to be paid to farmers who would reduce their acreage and crops under agreements with the Secretary of Agriculture, the plan of the act being to increase the prices of certain farm products by decreasing the quantities produced. The court held (1) that the so-called tax was not a true one (pp. 56, 61), the proceeds being earmarked for the benefit of farmers complying with the prescribed conditions, (2) that there was an attempt to regulate production without the consent of the state in which production was affected, and (3) that the payments to farmers were coupled with coercive contracts (p. 73), unlawful in their aim and oppressive in their consequences. The decision was by a divided court, a minority taking the view that the objections were untenable. None of them is applicable to the situation here developed.

(a) The proceeds of the tax in controversy are not earmarked for a special group.

(b) The unemployment compensation law which is a condition of the credit has had the approval of the state and could not be a law without it.

(c) The condition is not linked to an irrevocable agreement, for the state at its pleasure may repeal its unemployment law (Section 903(a)(6)), terminate the credit, and place itself where it was before the credit was accepted.

(d) The condition is not directed to the attainment of an unlawful end, but to an end, the relief of unemployment, for which nation and state may lawfully co-operate.

Fourth: The statute does not call for the surrender by the states of powers essential to their quasi-sovereign existence. * * *

A credit to taxpayers for payments made to a state under a state unemployment law will be manifestly futile in the absence of some assurance that the law leading to the credit is in truth what it professes to be. An unemployment law framed in such a way that the unemployed who look to it will be deprived of reasonable protection is one in name and nothing more. What is basic and essential may be assured by suitable conditions. The terms embodied in these sections are directed to that end. A wide range of judgment is given to the several states as to the particular type of statute to be spread upon their books. For anything to the contrary in the provisions of this act they may use the pooled unemployment form, which is in effect with variations in Alabama, California, Michigan, New York, and elsewhere. They may establish a system of merit ratings applicable at once or to go into effect later on the basis of subsequent experience. Cf. Sections 909, 910. They may provide for employee contributions as in Alabama and California, or put the entire burden upon the employer as in New York. They may choose a system of unemployment reserve accounts by which an employer is permitted after his reserve has accumulated to contribute at a reduced rate or even not at all. This is the system which had its origin in Wisconsin. What they may not do, if they would earn the credit, is to depart from those standards which in the judgment of Congress are to be ranked as fundamental. Even if opinion may differ as to the fundamental quality of one or more of the conditions, the difference will not avail to vitiate the statute. In determining essentials Congress must have the benefit of a fair margin of discretion. One cannot say with reason that this margin has been exceeded, or that the basic standards have been determined in any arbitrary fashion. In the event that some particular condition shall be found to be too uncertain to be capable of enforcement, it may be severed from the others, and what is left will still be valid.

We are to keep in mind steadily that the conditions to be approved by the Board as the basis for a credit are not provisions of a contract, but terms of a statute, which may be altered or repealed. Section 903 (a)

(6). The state does not bind itself to keep the law in force. It does not even bind itself that the moneys paid into the federal fund will be kept there indefinitely or for any stated time. On the contrary, the Secretary of the Treasury will honor a requisition for the whole or any part of the deposit in the fund whenever one is made by the appropriate officials. The only consequence of the repeal or excessive amendment of the statute, or the expenditure of the money, when requisitioned, for other than compensation uses or administrative expenses, is that approval of the law will end, and with it the allowance of a credit, upon notice to the state agency and an opportunity for hearing. Section 903 (b) (c).

These basic considerations are in truth a solvent of the problem. Subjected to their test, the several objections on the score of abdication are found to be unreal.

Thus, the argument is made that by force of an agreement the moneys when withdrawn must be "paid through public employment offices in the State or through such other agencies as the Board may approve." Section 903 (a) (1). But in truth there is no agreement as to the method of disbursement. There is only a condition which the state is free at pleasure to disregard or to fulfill. Moreover, approval is not requisite if public employment offices are made the disbursing instruments. Approval is to be a check upon resort to "other agencies" that may, perchance, be irresponsible. A state looking for a credit must give assurance that her system has been organized upon a base of rationality.

There is argument again that the moneys when withdrawn are to be devoted to specific uses, the relief of unemployment, and that by agreement for such payment the quasi-sovereign position of the state has been impaired, if not abandoned. But again there is confusion between promise and condition. Alabama is still free, without breach of an agreement, to change her system overnight. No officer or agency of the national Government can force a compensation law upon her or keep it in existence. No officer or agency of that Government, either by suit or other means, can supervise or control the application of the payments.

Finally and chiefly, abdication is supposed to follow from section 904 of the statute and the parts of section 903 that are complementary thereto. Section 903 (a) (3). By these the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive and hold in the Unemployment Trust Fund all moneys deposited therein by a state agency for a state unemployment fund and to invest in obligations of the United States such portion of the Fund as is not in his judgment required to meet current withdrawals. We are told that Alabama in consenting to that deposit has renounced the plenitude of power inherent in her statehood.

The same pervasive misconception is in evidence again. All that the state has done is to say in effect through the enactment of a statute that her agents shall be authorized to deposit the unemployment tax receipts in the Treasury at Washington. Alabama Unemployment Act of September 14, 1935, section 10 (i). The statute may be repealed. Section 903 (a) (6). The consent may be revoked. The deposits may be withdrawn. The moment the state commission gives notice to the depository that it would like the moneys back, the Treasurer will return them. To find state destruction there is to find it almost anywhere. With nearly as much reason one might say that a state abdicates its functions when it places the state moneys on deposit in a national bank. * * *

The inference of abdication thus dissolves in thinnest air when the deposit is conceived of as dependent upon a statutory consent, and not upon a contract effective to create a duty. By this we do not intimate that the conclusion would be different if a contract were discovered. Even sovereigns may contract without derogating from their sovereignty. Perry v. United States, 294 U. S. 330, 353; 1 Oppenheim, International Law, 4th ed., §§ 493, 494; Hall, International Law, 8th ed., § 107; 2 Hyde, International Law, § 489. The states are at liberty, upon obtaining the consent of Congress, to make agreements with one another. Constitution, Art. 1, section 10, par. 3. Poole v. Fleeger, 11 Pet. 185-209; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 657, 725. We find no room for doubt that they may do the like with Congress if the essence of their statehood is maintained without impairment. Alabama is seeking and obtaining a credit of many millions in favor of her citizens out of the Treasury of the nation. Nowhere in our scheme of government—in the limitations express or implied of our Federal Constitution—do we find that she is prohibited from assenting to conditions that will assure a fair and just requital for benefits received. But we will not labor the point further. An unreal prohibition directed to an unreal agreement will not vitiate an act of Congress, and cause it to collapse in ruin.

The judgment is

Affirmed.

NOTE

1. A section of the Revenue Act of 1934 which imposed a tax of three cents per pound upon the first processing in continental United States of all coconut oil and provided that the proceeds of the tax so far as it was derived from processing coconut oil produced in the Philippines "shall be held as a separate fund and paid to the Treasury of the Philippine Islands," was sustained in Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U. S. 308, 81 L. ed. 1122, 57 Sup. Ct. 764 (1937). Delivering the court's opinion, Mr. Justice Sutherland said: "Plainly, the imposition of the tax in itself is a valid exercise of the taxing power of the federal government. It is purely an excise tax upon a manufacturing process for revenue purposes, and in no sense a regulation of the process itself. * * * Standing apart, therefore, the tax is unassailable. It is said to be bad because it is earmarked and devoted from its inception to a specific purpose. But if the tax qua tax, be good, as we hold it is, and the purpose specified be one which would sustain a subsequent and separate appropriation made out of the general funds of the Treasury, neither is made invalid by being bound to the other in the same act of legislation. The only concern which we have in that aspect of the matter is to determine whether the purpose specified is one for which Congress can make an appropriation without violating the fundamental law." The court concluded that since the United States had an obligation to protect, defend and provide for the general welfare of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, a dependency, and such an obligation may well require the appropriation and expenditure of money from the national purse, the law was sustainable "as an act in discharge of a high moral obligation, amounting to a 'debt' within the meaning of the Constitution as it always has been practically construed." Query: Could not the statute have been better justified as an exercise of the power to tax to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States?

HELVERING v. DAVIS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1937.

[Davis, a shareholder in the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, a Massachusetts corporation, brought a bill in a District Court of the United States to restrain the corporation from paying the taxes imposed by Title VIII of the Social Security Act of August 14, 1935. Helvering, United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and Welch, Collector of Internal Revenue, were allowed to intervene. The District Court held that the tax on employees could not be challenged by the corporation or by a shareholder in its behalf and that the tax on employers was constitutional. On appeal the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that Title II was void on the ground that payment of old age benefits was a power reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment, and that the invalidity of Title II affected the taxes levied by Title VIII with invalidity. On petition for certiorari, by the Commissioner and the Collector, a review was granted by the Supreme Court.]

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Social Security Act (Act of August 14, 1935, c. 531, 49 Stat. 620, 42 U. S. C., c. 7, (Supp.)) is challenged once again.

In No. 837, Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U. S. 548, decided this day, we have upheld the validity of Title IX of the act, imposing an excise upon employers of eight or more. In this case Titles VIII and II are the subject of attack. Title VIII lays another excise upon employers in addition to the one imposed by Title IX (though with different exemptions). It lays a special income tax upon employees to be deducted from their wages and paid by the employers. Title II provides for the payment of Old Age Benefits, and supplies the motive and occasion, in the view of the assailants of the statute, for the levy of the taxes imposed by Title VIII. The plan of the two titles will now be summarized more fully.

Title VIII, as we have said, lays two different types of tax, an "income tax on employees," and "an excise tax on employers." The income tax on employees is measured by wages paid during the calendar year. Section 801. The excise tax on the employer is to be paid "with respect to having individuals in his employ," and, like the tax on employees, is measured by wages. Section 804. Neither tax is applicable to certain types of employment, such as agricultural labor, domestic service, service for the national or state governments, and service performed by persons who have attained the age of 65 years. Section 811 (b). The two taxes are at the same rate. Sections 801, 804. For the years 1937 to 1939, inclusive, the rate for each tax is fixed at one per cent. Thereafter the rate increases  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent every three years, until after December 31, 1948, the rate for each tax reaches 3 per cent. Ibid. In the computation of wages all remuneration is to be included except so much as is in excess of \$3,000 during the calendar year affected. Section 811 (a). The income tax on employees is to be collected by the employer, who is to deduct the amount from the wages "as and when paid." Section 802 (a). He is indemnified against claims and demands of any person by reason of such payment. Ibid. The proceeds of both taxes are to be paid into the Treasury like internal-revenue taxes generally, and are not earmarked in any way. Section 807 (a). There are penalties for non-payment. Section 807 (c).

Title II has the caption "Federal Old-Age Benefits." The benefits are of two types, first, monthly pensions, and second, lump sum payments, the payments of the second class being relatively few and unimportant.

The first section of this title creates an account in the United States Treasury to be known as the "Old-Age Reserve Account." Section 201. No present appropriation, however, is made to that account. All that the statute does is to authorize appropriations annually thereafter, beginning with the fiscal year which ends June 30, 1937. How large they shall be is not known in advance. The "amount sufficient as an annual premium" to provide for the required payments is "to be determined on a reserve basis in accordance with accepted actuarial principles, and based upon such tables of mortality as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time adopt, and upon an interest rate of 3 per centum per annum compounded annually." Section 201 (a). Not a dollar goes into the Account by force of the challenged act alone, unaided by acts to follow.

Section 202 and later sections prescribe the form of benefits. The principal type is a monthly pension payable to a person after he has attained the age of 65. This benefit is available only to one who has worked for at least one day in each of at least five separate years since December 31, 1936, who has earned at least $2,000 since that date, and who is not then receiving wages "with respect to regular employment." Sections 202 (a), (d), 210 (c). The benefits are not to begin before January 1, 1942. Section 202 (a). In no event are they to exceed $85 a month. Section 202 (b). They are to be measured (subject to that limit) by a percentage of the wages, the percentage decreasing at stated intervals as the wages become higher. Section 202 (a). * * *

[Here is omitted discussion whether the shareholder's bill in the circumstances was adequate to raise the constitutional issues. A majority of the Court held that it was. JUSTICES BRANDEIS, STONE, ROBERTS and CARDOZO dissented on this point.]

The ruling of the majority removes from the case the preliminary objection as to the nature of the remedy which we took of our own motion at the beginning of the argument. Under the compulsion of that ruling, the merits are now here.

Second: The scheme of benefits created by the provisions of Title II is not in contravention of the limitations of the Tenth Amendment.

Congress may spend money in aid of the "general welfare." Constitution, Art. I, section 8; United States v. Butler, 297 U. S. 1, 65; Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra. There have been great statesmen in our history who have stood for other views. We will not resurrect the contest. It is now settled by decision. United States v. Butler, supra. The conception of the spending power advocated by Hamilton and strongly reinforced by Story has prevailed over that of Madison, which has not been lacking in adherents. Yet difficulties are left when the power is conceded. The line must still be drawn between one welfare and another, between particular and general. Where this shall be placed cannot be known through a formula in advance of the event. There is a middle ground or certainly a penumbra in which discretion is at large. The discretion, however, is not confided to the courts. The discretion belongs to Congress, unless the choice is clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power, not an exercise of judgment. This is now familiar law. "When such a contention comes here we naturally require a showing that by no reasonable possibility can the challenged legislation fall within the wide range of discretion permitted to the Congress." United States v. Butler, supra, p. 67. Cf. Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U. S. 308; United States v. Realty Co., 163 U. S. 427, 440; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 595. Nor is the concept of the general welfare static. Needs that were narrow or parochial a century ago may be interwoven in our day with the well-being of the nation. What is critical or urgent changes with the times.

The purge of nation-wide calamity that began in 1929 has taught us many lessons. Not the least is the solidarity of interests that may once have seemed to be divided. Unemployment spreads from state to state, the hinterland now settled that in pioneer days gave an avenue of escape. Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U. S. 398, 442. Spreading from state to state, unemployment is an ill not particular but general, which may be checked, if Congress so determines, by the resources of the nation. If this can have been doubtful until now, our ruling today in the case of the Steward Machine Co., supra, has set the doubt at rest. But the ill is all one or at least not greatly different whether men are thrown out of work because there is no longer work to do or because the disabilities of age make them incapable of doing it. Rescue becomes necessary irrespective of the cause. The hope behind this statute is to save men and women from the rigors of the poor house as well as from the haunting fear that such a lot awaits them when journey's end is near.

Congress did not improvise a judgment when it found that the award of old age benefits would be conducive to the general welfare. The President's Committee on Economic Security made an investigation and report, aided by a research staff of Government officers and employees, and by an Advisory Council and seven other advisory groups. Extensive hearings followed before the House Committee on Ways and Means, and the Senate Committee on Finance. A great mass of evidence was brought together supporting the policy which finds expression in the act. Among the relevant facts are these: The number of persons in the United States 65 years of age or over is increasing proportionately as well as absolutely. What is even more important the number of such persons unable to take care of themselves is growing at a threatening pace. More and more our population is becoming urban and industrial instead of rural and agricultural. The evidence is impressive that among industrial workers the younger men and women are preferred over the older. In times of retrenchment the older are commonly the first to go, and even if retained, their wages are likely to be lowered. The plight of men and women at so low an age as 40 is hard, almost hopeless, when they are driven to seek for reemployment. * * *

The problem is plainly national in area and dimensions. Moreover, laws of the separate states cannot deal with it effectively. Congress, at least, has a basis for that belief. States and local governments are often lacking in the resources that are necessary to finance an adequate program of security for the aged. This is brought out with a wealth of illustration in recent studies of the problem. Apart from the failure of resources, states and local governments are at times reluctant to increase so heavily the burden of taxation to be borne by their residents for fear of placing themselves in a position of economic disadvantage as compared with neighbors or competitors. We have seen this in our study of the problem of unemployment compensation. Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra. A system of old age pensions has special dangers of its own, if put in force in one state and rejected in another. The existence of such a system is a bait to the needy and dependent elsewhere, encouraging them to migrate and seek a haven of repose. Only a power that is national can serve the interests of all. * * *

Third: Title II being valid, there is no occasion to inquire whether Title VIII would have to fall if Title II were set at naught.

The argument for the respondent is that the provisions of the two titles dovetail in such a way as to justify the conclusion that Congress would have been unwilling to pass one without the other. The argument for petitioners is that the tax moneys are not earmarked, and that Congress is at liberty to spend them as it will. The usual separability clause is embodied in the act. Section 1103.

We find it unnecessary to make a choice between the arguments, and so leave the question open.

Fourth: The tax upon employers is a valid excise or duty upon the relation of employment.

As to this we need not add to our opinion in Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra, where we considered a like question in respect to Title IX.

Fifth: The tax is not invalid as a result of its exemptions.

Here again the opinion of Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra, says all that need be said.

Sixth: The decree of the Court of Appeals should be reversed and that of the District Court affirmed. Ordered accordingly.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS and MR. JUSTICE BUTLER are of opinion that the provisions of the Act here challenged are repugnant to the Tenth Amendment, and that the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

ASHWANDER v. TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1936.
297 U. S. 288, 80 L. ed. 688, 56 Sup. Ct. 466.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court.

On January 4, 1934, the Tennessee Valley Authority, an agency of the Federal Government, entered into a contract with the Alabama Power Company, providing (1) for the purchase by the Authority from the Power Company of certain transmission lines, sub-stations, and auxiliary properties for $1,000,000, (2) for the purchase by the Authority from the Power Company of certain real property for $150,000, (3) for an interchange of hydro-electric energy, and in addition for the sale by the Authority to the Power Company of its "surplus power," on stated terms, and (4) for mutual restrictions as to the areas to be served in the sale of power. The contract was amended and supplemented in minor particulars on February 13 and May 24, 1934.

The Alabama Power Company is a corporation organized under the laws of Alabama and is engaged in the generation of electric energy and its distribution generally throughout that State, its lines reaching 66 counties. The transmission lines to be purchased by the Authority extend from Wilson Dam, at the Muscle Shoals plant owned by the United States on the Tennessee River in northern Alabama, into seven counties in that State, within a radius of about 50 miles. These lines serve a population of approximately 190,000, including about 10,000 individual customers, or about one-tenth of the total number served directly by the Power Company. The real property to be acquired by the Authority (apart from the transmission lines above mentioned and related properties) is adjacent to the area known as the "Joe Wheeler dam site," upon which the Authority is constructing the Wheeler Dam. * * *

The Circuit Court of Appeals limited its discussion to the precise issue with respect to the effect and validity of the contract of January 4, 1934. The District Court had found that the electric energy required for the territory served by the transmission lines to be purchased under that contract is available at Wilson Dam without the necessity for any interconnection with any other dam or power plant. The Circuit Court of Appeals accordingly considered the constitutional authority for the construction of Wilson Dam and for the disposition of the electric energy there created. In the view that the Wilson Dam had been constructed in the exercise of the war and commerce powers of the Congress and that the electric energy there available was the property of the United States and subject to its disposition, the Circuit Court of Appeals decided that the decree of the District Court was erroneous and should be reversed. The Court also held that plaintiffs should take nothing by their cross appeal. 78 F. (2d) 578. On plaintiff's application we granted writs of certiorari.

First. The right of plaintiffs to bring this suit. [A majority of the Court held that the plaintiffs as shareholders of the Alabama Power Company had shown the prerequisites of a shareholder's bill and might sue in the right of the company and that the constitutional issue was thus properly presented.]

Second. The scope of the issue. We agree with the Circuit Court of Appeals that the question to be determined is limited to the validity of the contract of January 4, 1934. The pronouncements, policies and program of the Tennessee Valley Authority and its directors, their motives and desires, did not give rise to a justiciable controversy save as they had fruition in action of a definite and concrete character constituting an actual or threatened interference with the rights of the persons complaining. The judicial power does not extend to the determination of abstract questions. * * *

There is a further limitation upon our inquiry. As it appears that the transmission lines in question run from the Wilson Dam and that the electric energy generated at that dam is more than sufficient to supply all the requirements of the contract, the questions that are properly before us relate to the constitutional authority for the construction of the Wilson Dam and for the disposition, as provided in the contract, of the electric energy there generated.

Third. The constitutional authority for the construction of the Wilson Dam. The Congress may not, "under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the government." Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 423; Linder v. United States, 268 U. S. 5, 17. The Government's argument recognizes this essential limitation. The Government's contention is that the Wilson Dam was constructed, and the power plant connected with it was installed, in the exercise by the Congress of its war and commerce powers, that is, for the purposes of national defense and the improvement of navigation.

Wilson Dam is described as a concrete monolith one hundred feet high and almost a mile long, containing two locks for navigation and eight installed generators. Construction was begun in 1917 and completed in 1926. Authority for its construction is found in § 124 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916. It authorized the President to cause an investigation to be made in order to determine "the best, cheapest, and most available means for the production of nitrates and other products for munitions of war"; to designate for the exclusive use of the United States "such site or sites upon any navigable or non-navigable river or rivers or upon the public lands, as in his opinion will be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this Act"; and "to construct, maintain and operate" on any such site "dams, locks, improvements to navigation, power houses, and other plants and equipment or other means than water power as in his judgment is the best and cheapest, necessary or convenient for the generation of electrical or other power and for the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products." The President was authorized to lease, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise such lands as might be necessary and there was further provision that "The products of such plants shall be used by the President for military and naval purposes to the extent that he may deem necessary, and any surplus which he shall determine is not required shall be sold and disposed of by him under such regulations as he may prescribe." Id.

We may take judicial notice of the international situation at the time the Act of 1916 was passed, and it cannot be successfully disputed that the Wilson Dam and its auxiliary plants including the hydroelectric power plant, are, and were intended to be, adapted to the purposes of national defense. While the District Court found that there is no intention to use the nitrate plants or the hydro-electric units installed at Wilson Dam for the production of war materials in time of peace, "the maintenance of said properties in operating condition and the assurance of an abundant supply of electric energy in the event of war, constitute national defense assets." This finding has ample support.

The Act of 1916 also had in view "improvements to navigation." Commerce includes navigation. "All America understands, and has uniformly understood," said Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 190, "the word 'commerce,' to comprehend navigation." The power to regulate interstate commerce embraces the power to keep the navigable rivers of the United States free from obstructions to navigation and to remove such obstructions when they exist. "For these purposes," said the Court in Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713, 725, "Congress possesses all the powers which existed in the States before the adoption of the national Constitution, and which have always existed in the Parliament in England." See, also, Philadelphia Company v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 634.

The Tennessee River is a navigable stream, although there are obstructions at various points because of shoals, reefs and rapids. The improvement of navigation on this river has been a matter of national concern for over a century. * * *

While, in its present condition, the Tennessee River is not adequately improved for commercial navigation, the traffic is small, we are not at liberty to conclude either that the river is not susceptible of development as an important waterway, or that Congress has not undertaken that development, or that the construction of the Wilson Dam was not an appropriate means to accomplish a legitimate end.

The Wilson Dam and its power plant must be taken to have been constructed in the exercise of the constitutional functions of the Federal Government.

Fourth. The constitutional authority to dispose of electric energy generated at the Wilson Dam. The Government acquired full title to the dam site, with all riparian rights. The power of falling water was an inevitable incident of the construction of the dam. The water power came into the exclusive control of the Federal Government. The mechanical energy was convertible into electric energy, and the water power, the right to convert it into electric energy, and the electric energy thus produced, constitute property belonging to the United States. See Green Bay Canal Co. v. Patten Paper Co., 172 U. S. 58, 80; United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 229 U. S. 53, 72, 73; Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost, 286 U. S. 165, 170.

Authority to dispose of property constitutionally acquired by the United States is expressly granted to the Congress by § 3 of Article IV of the Constitution. This section provides:

"The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

To the extent that the power of disposition is thus expressly conferred, it is manifest that the Tenth Amendment is not applicable. And the Ninth Amendment (which petitioners also invoke) in insuring the maintenance of the rights retained by the people does not withdraw the rights which are expressly granted to the Federal Government. The question is as to the scope of the grant and whether there are inherent limitations which render invalid the disposition of property with which we are now concerned.

The occasion for the grant was the obvious necessity of making provisions for the government of the vast territory acquired by the United States. The power to govern and to dispose of that territory was deemed to be indispensable to the purposes of the cessions made by the States. And yet it was a matter of grave concern because of the fear that "the sale and disposal" might become "a source of such immense revenue to the national government, as to make it independent of and formidable to the people." Story on the Constitution, §§ 1325, 1326. The grant was made in broad terms, and the power of regulation and disposition was not confined to territory, but extended to "other property belonging to the United States," so that the power may be applied, as Story says, "to the due regulation of all other personal and real property rightfully belonging to the United States." And so, he adds, "it has been constantly understood and acted upon." Id.

This power of disposal was early construed to embrace leases, thus enabling the Government to derive profit through royalties. The question arose with respect to a government lease of lead mines on public lands, under the Act of March 3, 1807. The contention was advanced that "disposal is not letting or leasing"; that Congress had no power "to give or authorize leases" and "to obtain profits from the working of the mines." The Court overruled the contention, saying: "The disposal must be left to the discretion of Congress. And there can be no apprehensions of any encroachments upon state rights, by the creation of a numerous tenantry within their borders, as has been so strenuously urged in the argument." United States v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. 526, 533, 538. The policy, early adopted and steadily pursued, of segregating mineral lands from other public lands and providing for leases, pointed to the recognition both of the full power of disposal and of the necessity of suitably adapting the methods of disposal to different sorts of property. * * *

But when Congress thus reserved mineral lands for special disposal, can it be doubted that Congress could have provided for mining directly by its own agents, instead of giving that right to lessees on the payment of royalties? Upon what ground could it be said that the Government could not mine its own gold, silver, coal, lead, or phosphates in the public domain, and dispose of them as property belonging to the United States? That it could dispose of its land but not of what the land contained? It would seem to be clear that under the same power of disposition which enabled the Government to lease and obtain profit from sales by its lessees, it could mine and obtain profit from its own sales.

The question is whether a more limited power of disposal should be applied to the water power, convertible into electric energy, and to the electric energy thus produced at the Wilson Dam constructed by the Government in the exercise of its constitutional functions. If so, it must be by reason either of (1) the nature of the particular property, or (2) the character of the "surplus" disposed of, or (3) the manner of disposition.

(1) That the water power and the electric energy generated at the dam are susceptible of disposition as property belonging to the United States is well established. * * *

(2) The argument is stressed that, assuming that electric energy generated at the dam belongs to the United States, the Congress has authority to dispose of this energy only to the extent that it is a surplus necessarily created in the course of making munitions of war or operating the works for navigation purposes; that is, that the remainder of the available energy must be lost or go to waste. We find nothing in the Constitution which imposes such a limitation. It is not to be deduced from the mere fact that the electric energy is only potentially available until the generators are operated. The Government has no less right to the energy thus available by letting the water course over its turbines than it has to use the appropriate processes to reduce to possession other property within its control, as, for example, oil which it may recover from a pool beneath its lands, and which is reduced to possession by boring oil wells and otherwise might escape its grasp. See Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 208. And it would hardly be contended that, when the Government reserves coal on its lands, it can mine the coal and dispose of it only for the purpose of heating public buildings or for other governmental operations. Or, if the Government owns a silver mine, that it can obtain the silver only for the purpose of storage or coinage. Or, that when the Government extracts the oil it has reserved, it has no constitutional power to sell it. Our decisions recognize no such restriction. United States

v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. 526; Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 88, 89; Light v. United States, 220 U. S. 523, 536, 537; Ruddy v. Rossi, 248 U. S. 104, 106. The United States owns the coal, or the silver, or the lead, or the oil, it obtains from its lands, and it lies in the discretion of the Congress, acting in the public interest, to determine of how much of the property it shall dispose.

We think that the same principle is applicable to electric energy. The argument pressed upon us leads to absurd consequences in the denial, despite the broad terms of the constitutional provision, of a power of disposal which the public interest may imperatively require. Suppose, for example, that in the erection of a dam for the improvement of navigation, it became necessary to destroy a dam and power plant which had previously been erected by a private corporation engaged in the generation and distribution of energy which supplied the needs of neighboring communities and business enterprises. Would anyone say that, because the United States had built its own dam and plant in the exercise of its constitutional functions, and had complete ownership and dominion over both, no power could be supplied to the communities and enterprises dependent on it, not because of any unwillingness of the Congress to supply it, or of any overriding governmental need, but because there was no constitutional authority to furnish the supply? Or that, with abundant power available, which must otherwise be wasted, the supply to the communities and enterprises whose very life may be at stake must be limited to the slender amount of surplus unavoidably involved in the operation of the navigation works, because the Constitution does not permit any more energy to be generated and distributed? In the case of the Green Bay Canal Co., above cited, where the government works supplanted those of the Canal Company, the Court found no difficulty in sustaining the Government's authority to grant to the Canal Company the water powers which it had previously enjoyed, subject, of course, to the dominant control of the Government. And in the case of United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 229 U. S. 53, the statutory provision, to which the Court referred, was "that any excess of water in the St. Marys River at Sault Sainte Marie over and above the amount now or hereafter required for the uses of navigation shall be leased for power purposes by the Secretary of War upon such terms and conditions as shall be best calculated in his judgment to insure the development thereof." It was to the leasing, under this provision, "of any excess of power over the needs of the Government" that the Court saw no valid objection. Id., p. 73. * * *

(3) We come then to the question as to the validity of the method which has been adopted in disposing of the surplus energy generated at the Wilson Dam. The constitutional provision is silent as to the method of disposing of property belonging to the United States. That method, of course, must be an appropriate means of disposition according to the nature of the property, it must be one adopted in the public interest as distinguished from private or personal ends, and we may assume that it must be consistent with the foundation principles of our dual system of government and must not be contrived to govern the concerns reserved to the States. See Kansas v. Colorado, supra. In this instance, the method of disposal embraces the sale of surplus energy by the Tennessee Valley Authority to the Alabama Power Company, the interchange of energy between the Authority and the Power Company, and the purchase by the Authority from the Power Company of certain transmission lines.

As to the mere sale of surplus energy, nothing need be added to what we have said as to the constitutional authority to dispose. The Government could lease or sell and fix the terms. Sales of surplus energy to the Power Company by the Authority continued a practice begun by the Government several years before. The contemplated interchange of energy is a form of disposition and presents no questions which are essentially different from those that are pertinent to sales.

The transmission lines which the Authority undertakes to purchase from the Power Company lead from the Wilson Dam to a large area within about fifty miles of the dam. These lines provide the means of distributing the electric energy, generated at the dam, to a large population. They furnish a method of reaching a market. The alternative method is to sell the surplus energy at the dam, and the market there appears to be limited to one purchaser, the Alabama Power Company, and its affiliated interests. We know of no constitutional ground upon which the Federal Government can be denied the right to seek a wider market. We suppose that in the early days of mining in the West, if the Government had undertaken to operate a silver mine on its domain, it could have acquired the mules or horses and equipment to carry its silver to market. And the transmission lines for electric energy are but a facility for conveying to market that particular sort of property, and the acquisition of these lines raises no different constitutional question, unless in some way there is an invasion of the rights reserved to the State or to the people. We find no basis for concluding that the limited undertaking with the Alabama Power Company amounts to such an invasion. Certainly, the Alabama Power Company has no constitutional right to insist that it shall be the sole purchaser of the energy generated at the Wilson Dam; that the energy shall be sold to it or go to waste.

We limit our decision to the case before us, as we have defined it. The argument is earnestly presented that the Government by virtue of its ownership of the dam and power plant could not establish a steel mill and make and sell steel products, or a factory to manufacture clothing or shoes for the public, and thus attempt to make its ownership of energy, generated at its dam, a means of carrying on competitive commercial enterprises and thus drawing to the Federal Government the conduct and management of business having no relation to the purposes for which the Federal Government was established. The picture is eloquently drawn but we deem it to be irrelevant to the issue here. The Government is not using the water power at the Wilson Dam to establish any industry or business. It is not using the energy generated at the dam to manufacture commodities of any sort for the public. The Government is disposing of the energy itself which simply is the mechanical energy, incidental to falling water at the dam, converted into the electric energy which is susceptible of transmission. The question here is simply as to the acquisition of the transmission lines as a facility for the disposal of that energy. And the Government rightly conceded at the bar, in substance, that it was without constitutional authority to acquire or dispose of such energy except as it comes into being in the operation of works constructed in the exercise of some power delegated to the United States. As we have said, these transmission lines lead directly from the dam, which has been lawfully constructed, and the question of the constitutional right of the Government to acquire or operate local or urban distribution systems is not involved. We express no opinion as to the validity of such an effort, as to the status of any other dam or power development in the Tennessee Valley, whether connected with or apart from the Wilson Dam, or as to the validity of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act or of the claims made in the pronouncements and program of the Authority apart from the questions we have discussed in relation to the particular provisions of the contract of January 4, 1934, affecting the Alabama Power Company.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

[MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered a separate opinion, in which JUSTICES STONE, ROBERTS and CARDOZO concurred, saying, "I do not disagree with the conclusion on the constitutional question announced by the Chief Justice; but, in my opinion, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be affirmed without passing on it,"—on the ground that in his opinion the shareholder's bill in the circumstances was not appropriate to raise the constitutional issue.]

Separate opinion of MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS.

Considering the consistent rulings of this court through many years, it is not difficult for me to conclude that petitioners have presented a justiciable controversy which we must decide. * * *

Nor do I find serious difficulty with the notion that the United States, by proper means and for legitimate ends, may dispose of water power or electricity honestly developed in connection with permissible improvements of navigable waters. But the means employed to that end must be reasonably appropriate in the circumstances. Under pretense of exercising granted power, they may not in fact undertake something not intrusted to them. * * *

The record leaves no room for reasonable doubt that the primary purpose was to put the Federal Government into the business of distributing and selling electric power throughout certain large districts, to expel the power companies which had long serviced them, and to control the market therein. A government instrumentality had entered upon a pretentious scheme to provide a "yardstick" of the fairness of rates charged by private owners, and to attain "no less a goal than the electrification of America." "When we carry this program into every town and city and village, and every farm throughout the country, we will have written the greatest chapter in the economic, industrial and social development of America." Any reasonable doubt concerning the purpose and result of the Contract of January 4th or of the design of the Authority should be dispelled by examination of its Reports for 1934 and 1935. * * *

As matter of law the trial court found—

"The function intended by TVA under the evidence in relation to service, utility in type, in the area ceded by the contract of January 4, 1934, transcends the function of conservation or disposition of government property, involves continuing service and commercial functions by the government to fill contracts not governmental in origin or character." * * *

"Congress has no constitutional authority to authorize Tennessee Valley Authority or any other federal agency to undertake the operation, essentially permanent in character, of a utility system, for profit, involving the generation, transmission and commercial distribution of electricity within State domain, having no reasonable relation to a lawful governmental use."

I think the trial court reached the correct conclusion and that its decree should be approved. If under the thin mask of disposing of property the United States can enter the business of generating, transmitting and selling power as, when and wherever some board may specify, with the definite design to accomplish ends wholly beyond the sphere marked out for them by the Constitution, an easy way has been found for breaking down the limitations heretofore supposed to guarantee protection against aggression.

NOTES

1. In Tennessee Electric Power Co. v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 306 U. S. 118, 83 L. ed. 543, 59 Sup. Ct. 366 (1939) a number of private electric power companies suing to enjoin the generation and distribution of power by the Authority in competition with the plaintiffs were held not proper parties in interest to raise the issue of constitutionality, since they had no right to be free from competition. In an earlier case the court had reached the same result in a suit by utility companies to enjoin the making of loans and grants by the Public Works Administration to municipalities for the construction of their own electricity distribution systems. Not holding exclusive franchises, they had no standing in court to raise the constitutional question. Alabama Power Co. v. Ickes, 302 U. S. 464, 82 L. ed. 374, 58 Sup. Ct. 300 (1938).

2. In United States v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. 526, 537, 10 L. ed. 573 (1840) the Supreme Court said that the power under the Constitution (Art. IV, § 3, cl. 2) to dispose of property belonging to the United States "is vested in Congress without limitation." This fact has been strikingly emphasized by the recent refusal of the court to permit the States of Alabama and Rhode Island to file complaints against the States of Texas and Louisiana, respectively, challenging the validity of the Submerged Lands Act of 1953. In a per curiam opinion the court said that since the power was without limitation it was not for the courts to say how that trust should be administered. (Justices Black and Douglas dissented on the ground that the power of Congress to enact the challenged statute was subject to sufficient doubt to require that the complainant states be given full opportunity to present their contentions.) Alabama v. Texas; Rhode Island v. Louisiana, 347 U. S. 272, 98 L. ed. 689, 74 Sup. Ct. 481 (1954).

Section 3.—The War Powers.

SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1918.

[Error to the United States District Courts for the district of Minnesota and the southern district of New York. Under the Act of May 18, 1917, 40 Stat. 76, Congress provided that all male citizens between the ages of 21 and 30, with certain exceptions, should be subject to military service and authorized the President to select from them a national army of one million men. All persons made liable to service by the Act were required to present themselves at a time appointed by the President for registration. The plaintiffs in error failed to present themselves as required and were prosecuted and convicted for violation of the Act. They sued out writs of error, contending that Congress had no power to compel military service by a selective draft.]

The possession of authority to enact the statute must be found in the clauses of the Constitution giving Congress power "to declare war; * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; * * * to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Article I, § 8. And of course the powers conferred by these provisions like all other powers given carry with them as provided by the Constitution the authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." Article I, § 8.

As the mind cannot conceive an army without the men to compose it, on the face of the Constitution the objection that it does not give power to provide for such men would seem to be too frivolous for further notice. It is said, however, that since under the Constitution as originally framed state citizenship was primary and the United States citizenship but derivative and dependent thereon, therefore the power conferred upon Congress to raise armies was only coterminous with United States citizenship and could not be exerted so as to cause that citizenship to lose its dependent character and dominate state citizenship. But the proposition simply denies to Congress the power to raise armies which the Constitution gives. That power by the very terms of the Constitution, being delegated, is supreme. * * * In truth the contention simply assails the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in conferring authority on Congress and in not retaining it as it was under the Confederation in the several States. Further it is said, the right to provide is not denied by calling for volunteer enlistments, but it does not and cannot include the power to exact enforced military duty by the citizen. This, however, but challenges the existence of all power, for a governmental power which has no sanction to it and which therefore can only be exercised provided the citizen consents to its exertion is in no substantial sense a power. It is argued, however, that although this is abstractly true, it is not concretely so because as compelled military service is repugnant to a free government and in conflict with all the great guarantees of the Constitution as to individual liberty, it must be assumed that the authority to raise armies was intended to be limited to the right to call an army into existence counting alone upon the willingness of the citizen to do his duty in time of public need, that is, in time of war. But the premise of this proposition is so devoid of foundation that it leaves not even a shadow of ground upon which to base the conclusion. Let us see if this is not at once demonstrable. It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need, and the right to compel it. Vattel, Law of Nations, book III, chaps. 1 and 2. To do more than state the proposition is absolutely unnecessary in view of the practical illustration afforded by the almost universal legislation to that effect now in force. In England it is certain that before the Norman Conquest the duty of the great militant body of the citizens was recognized and enforceable. Blackstone, book I, chap. 13. It is unnecessary to follow the long controversy between Crown and Parliament as to the branch of the government in which the power resided, since there never was any doubt that it somewhere resided. So also it is wholly unnecessary to explore the situation for the purpose of fixing the sources whence in England it came to be understood that the citizen or the force organized from the militia as such could not without their consent be compelled to render service in a foreign country, since there is no room to contend that such principle ever rested upon any challenge of the right of Parliament to impose compulsory duty upon the citizen to perform military duty wherever the public exigency exacted whether at home or abroad. This is exemplified by the present English Service Act.

In the Colonies before the separation from England there cannot be the slightest doubt that the right to enforce military service was unquestioned and that practical effect was given to the power in many cases. Indeed the brief of the government contains a list of Colonial Acts manifesting the power and its enforcement in more than two hundred cases. And this exact situation existed also after the separation. Under the Articles of Confederation it is true Congress had no such power, as its authority was absolutely limited to making calls upon the states for the military forces needed to create and maintain the army, each state being bound for its quota as called. But it is indisputable that the states in response to the calls made upon them met the situation when they deemed it necessary by direct- ing enforced military service on the part of the citizens. In fact the duty of the citizen to render military service and the power to compel him against his consent to do so was expressly sanctioned by the Con- stitutions of at least nine of the states, an illustration being afforded by the following provision of the Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776: "That every member of society hath a right to be protected in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and therefore is bound to contribute his proportion toward the expense of that protection, and yield his personal service when necessary, or an equivalent thereto." Article 8 (5 Thorpe, American Charters, Constitutions and Organic Laws, pp. 3081, 3083). While it is true that the states were sometimes slow in exerting the power in order to fill their quotas—a condition shown by resolutions of Congress calling upon them to comply by exerting their compulsory power to draft and by earnest requests by Washington to Congress that a demand be made upon the states to resort to drafts to fill their quotas—that fact serves to demonstrate instead of to challenge the existence of the authority. A default in exercising a duty may not be resorted to as a reason for denying its existence.

When the Constitution came to be formed it may not be disputed that one of the recognized necessities for its adoption was the want of power in Congress to raise an army and the dependence upon the states for their quotas. In supplying the power it was manifestly intended to give it all and leave none to the states, since besides the delegation to Congress of authority to raise armies the Constitution prohibited the states, without the consent of Congress, from keeping troops in time of peace or engaging in war. Article 1, § 10.

To argue that as the state authority over the militia prior to the Constitution embraced every citizen, the right of Congress to raise an army should not be considered as granting authority to compel the citizen's service in the army, is but to express in a different form the denial of the right to call any citizen to the army. * * *

The fallacy of the argument results from confounding the constitutional provisions concerning the militia with that conferring upon Congress the power to raise armies. It treats them as one while they are different. This is the militia clause:

"The Congress shall have power * * * To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Article I, § 8.

The line which separates it from the army power is not only inherently plainly marked by the text of the two clauses, but will stand out in bolder relief by considering the condition before the Constitution was adopted and the remedy which it provided for the military situation with which it dealt. The right on the one hand of Congress under the Confederation to call on the States for forces and the duty on the other of the States to furnish when called, embraced the complete power of government over the subject. When the two were combined and were delegated to Congress all governmental power on that subject was conferred, a result manifested not only by the grant made but by the limitation expressly put upon the States on the subject. The army sphere therefore embraces such complete authority. But the duty of exerting the power thus conferred in all its plenitude was not made at once obligatory but was wisely left to depend upon the discretion of Congress as to the arising of the exigencies which would call it in whole or in part into play. There was left therefore under the sway of the States undelegated the control of the militia to the extent that such control was not taken away by the exercise by Congress of its power to raise armies. This did not diminish the military power or curb the full potentiality of the right to exert it but left an area of authority requiring to be provided for (the militia area) unless and until by the exertion of the military power of Congress that area had been circumscribed or totally disappeared. This, therefore, is what was dealt with by the militia provision. It diminished the occasion for the exercise by Congress of its military power beyond the strict necessities for its exercise by giving the power to Congress to direct the organization and training of the militia (evidently to prepare such militia in the event of the exercise of the army power) although leaving the carrying out of such command to the States. It further conduced to the same result by delegating to Congress the right to call on occasions which were specified for the militia force, thus again obviating the necessity for exercising the army power to the extent of being ready for every conceivable contingency. This purpose is made manifest by the provision preserving the organization of the militia so far as formed when called for such purposes although subjecting the militia when so called to the paramount authority of the United States. Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 397, 408. But because under the express regulations the power was given to call for specified purposes without exerting the army power, it cannot follow that the latter power when exerted was not complete to the extent of its exertion and dominant. Because the power of Congress to raise armies was not required to be exerted to its full limit but only as in the discretion of Congress it was deemed the public interest required, furnishes no ground for supposing that the complete power was lost by its partial exertion. Because, moreover, the power granted to Congress to raise armies in its potentiality was susceptible of narrowing the area over which the militia clause operated, affords no ground for confusing the two areas which were distinct and separate to the end of confounding both the powers and thus weakening or destroying both.

And upon this understanding of the two powers the legislative and executive authority has been exerted from the beginning. * * *

Thus, sanctioned as is the act before us by the text of the Constitution, and by its significance as read in the light of the fundamental principles with which the subject is concerned, by the power recognized and carried into effect in many civilized countries, by the authority and practice of the colonies before the Revolution, of the States under the Confederation and of the government since the formation of the Constitution, the want of merit in the contentions that the act in the particulars which we have been previously called upon to consider was beyond the constitutional power of Congress, is manifest. Cogency, however, if possible, is added to the demonstration by pointing out that in the only case to which we have been referred where the constitutionality of the Act of 1863 was contemporaneously challenged on grounds akin to, if not absolutely identical with, those here urged, the validity of the act was maintained for reasons not different from those which control our judgment. Kneedler v. Lane, 45 Pa. 238. And as further evidence that the conclusion we reach is but the inevitable consequence of the provisions of the Constitution as effect follows cause, we briefly recur to events in another environment. The seceding States wrote into the Constitution which was adopted to regulate the government which they sought to establish, in identical words the provisions of the Constitution of the United States which we here have under consideration. And when the right to enforce under that instrument a selective draft law which was enacted, not differing in principle from the one here in question, was challenged, its validity was upheld, evidently after great consideration, by the courts of Virginia, of Georgia, of Texas, of Alabama, of Mississippi and of North Carolina, the opinions in some of the cases copiously and critically reviewing the whole grounds which we have stated. * * *

Finally, as we are unable to conceive upon what theory the exaction by government from the citizen of the performance of his supreme and noble duty of contributing to the defense of the rights and honor of the nation as the result of a war declared by the great representative body of the people can be said to be the imposition of involuntary servitude in violation of the prohibitions of the Thirteenth Amendment, we are constrained to the conclusion that the contention to that effect is refuted by its mere statement. Affirmed.

1. Congress may provide for enlistment in the armed services on such terms as it deems expedient, and may require military service of minors as well as adults, thus superseding the control of parents over their minor children. United States v. Williams, 302 U. S. 46, 82 L. ed. 39, 58 Sup. Ct. 81 (1937). Cases dealing with the administration of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940 are: Billings v. Truesdell, 321 U. 2. Prize Cases, 2 Black 635, 17 L. ed. 459 (1863) sustained the power of the President to declare a blockade of the ports of the Confederate States upon the outbreak of the Civil War and before Congress had assembled and taken action. Mr. Justice Grier, for the court, said: "If a war be made by invasion of a foreign nation, the President is not only authorized but bound to resist force by force. He does not initiate the war, but is bound to accept the challenge without waiting for any special legislative authority. And whether the hostile party be a foreign invader, or states organized in rebellion, it is none the less a war, although the declaration of it be 'unilateral'." For a discussion of these cases see Swisher, American Constitutional Development (1943), 295-299. On the war powers of the President see Berdahl, War Powers of the Executive in the United States (1920); Randall, Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln (1926).

3. State militia forces are not part of the armed forces of the United States but they may be called into the service of the national government "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions" (Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 15). The Constitution gives this power to Congress but it has been vested by legislation in the President. Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19, 6 L. ed. 537 (1827) held that a determination by the President that an emergency has arisen justifying the calling forth of the militia is not open to question in the courts, the Supreme Court saying: "We are all of opinion, that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen, belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons."

BURNS v. WILSON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1953.
346 U. S. 137, 97 L. ed. 1508, 73 Sup. Ct. 1045.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON announced the judgment of the Court in an opinion in which MR. JUSTICE REED, MR. JUSTICE BURTON and MR. JUSTICE CLARK join.

Tried separately by Army courts-martial on the Island of Guam, petitioners were found guilty of murder and rape and sentenced to death. The sentences were confirmed by the President, and petitioners exhausted all remedies available to them under the Articles of War for review of their convictions by the military tribunals. They then filed petitions for writs of habeas corpus in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

In these applications petitioners alleged that they had been denied due process of law in the proceedings which led to their conviction by the courts-martial. They charged that they had been subjected to illegal detention; that coerced confessions had been extorted from them; that they had been denied counsel of their choice and denied effective representation; that the military authorities on Guam had suppressed evidence favorable to them, procured perjured testimony against them and otherwise interfered with the preparation of their defenses. Finally, petitioners charged that their trials were conducted in an atmosphere of terror and vengeance, conducive to mob violence instead of fair play.

The District Court dismissed the applications without hearing evidence, and without further review, after satisfying itself that the courts-martial which tried petitioners had jurisdiction over their persons at the time of the trial and jurisdiction over the crimes with which they were charged as well as jurisdiction to impose the sentences which petitioners received. Dennis v. Lovett, 104 F. Supp. 310. The Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court's judgment, after expanding the scope of review by giving petitioners' allegations full consideration on their merits, reviewing in detail the mass of evidence to be found in the transcripts of the trial and other proceedings before the military court. Burns v. Lovett, 91 U. S. App. D. C. 208, 202 F. 2d 335.

We granted certiorari, 344 U. S. 903. Petitioners' allegations are serious, and, as reflected by the divergent bases for decision in the two courts below, the case poses important problems concerning the proper administration of the power of a civil court to review the judgment of a court-martial in a habeas corpus proceeding.

In this case, we are dealing with habeas corpus applicants who assert—rightly or wrongly—that they have been imprisoned and sentenced to death as a result of proceedings which denied them basic rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The federal civil courts have jurisdiction over such applications. By statute, Congress has charged them with the exercise of that power. Accordingly, our initial concern is not whether the District Court has any power at all to consider petitioners' applications; rather our concern is with the manner in which the Court should proceed to exercise its power.

The statute which vests federal courts with jurisdiction over applications for habeas corpus from persons confined by the military courts is the same statute which vests them with jurisdiction over the applications of persons confined by the civil courts. But in military habeas corpus the inquiry, the scope of matters open for review, has always been more narrow than in civil cases. Hiatt v. Brown, 339 U. S. 103. Thus the law which governs a civil court in the exercise of its jurisdiction over military habeas corpus applications cannot simply be assimilated to the law which governs the exercise of that power in other instances. It is sui generis; it must be so, because of the peculiar relationship between the civil and military law.

Military law, like state law, is a jurisprudence which exists separate and apart from the law which governs in our federal judicial establishment. This Court has played no role in its development; we have exerted no supervisory power over the courts which enforce it; the rights of men in the armed forces must perforce be conditioned to meet certain overriding demands of discipline and duty, and the civil courts are not the agencies which must determine the precise balance to be struck in this adjustment. The Framers expressly entrusted that task to Congress.

Indeed, Congress has taken great care both to define the rights of those subject to military law, and provide a complete system of review within the military system to secure those rights. Only recently the Articles of War were completely revised, and thereafter, in conformity with its purpose to integrate the armed services, Congress established a Uniform Code of Military Justice applicable to all members of the military establishment. These enactments were prompted by a desire to meet objections and criticisms lodged against court-martial procedures in the aftermath of World War II. Nor was this a patchwork effort to plug loopholes in the old system of military justice. The revised Articles of the new Code are the result of painstaking study; they reflect an effort to reform and modernize the system—from top to bottom.

Rigorous provisions guarantee a trial as free as possible from command influence, the right to prompt arraignment, the right to counsel of the accused's own choosing, and the right to secure witnesses and prepare an adequate defense. The revised Articles, and their successor—the new Code—also establish a hierarchy within the military establishment to review the convictions of courts-martial, to ferret out irregularities in the trial, and to enforce the procedural safeguards which Congress determined to guarantee to those in the Nation's armed services. And finally Congress has provided a special post-conviction remedy within the military establishment, apart from ordinary appellate review, whereby one convicted by a court-martial, may attack collaterally the judgment under which he stands convicted.

The military courts, like the state courts, have the same responsibilities as do the federal courts to protect a person from a violation of his constitutional rights. In military habeas corpus cases, even more than in state habeas corpus cases, it would be in disregard of the statutory scheme if the federal civil courts failed to take account of the prior proceedings—of the fair determinations of the military tribunals after all military remedies have been exhausted. Congress has provided that these determinations are “final” and “binding” upon all courts. We have held before that this does not displace the civil courts’ jurisdiction over an application for habeas corpus from the military prisoner. Gusik v. Schilder, 340 U. S. 128. But these provisions do mean that when a military decision has dealt fully and fairly with an allegation raised in that application, it is not open to a federal civil court to grant the writ simply to re-evaluate the evidence. Whelchel v. McDonald, 340 U. S. 122.

We turn, then, to this case.

Petitioners’ applications, as has been noted, set forth serious charges—allegations which, in their cumulative effect, were sufficient to depict fundamental unfairness in the process whereby their guilt was determined and their death sentences rendered. Had the military courts manifestly refused to consider those claims, the District Court was empowered to review them de novo. For the constitutional guarantee of due process is meaningful enough, and sufficiently adaptable, to protect soldiers—as well as civilians—from the crude injustices of a trial so conducted that it becomes bent on fixing guilt by dispensing with rudimentary fairness rather than finding truth through adherence to those basic guarantees which have long been recognized and honored by the military courts as well as the civil courts.

Petitioners asserted: they had been arrested and confined incomunicado by officers of the military government of Guam; they were mistreated and subjected to continuous questioning without being informed of their rights; petitioner Dennis finally confessed, after police officers confronted him with the confession of Calvin Dennis—an alleged accomplice in the crime; after a period of about three weeks of this confinement, the petitioners were turned over to the Air Force; the military authorities “planted” real evidence—the victim’s smock with hairs from petitioners’ body attached—in a truck which petitioners had driven on the night of the crime; they further sought to “contrive” a conviction by coercing various witnesses to testify against petitioners; both petitioners were denied the benefit of counsel until a short while before trial, and petitioner Dennis was denied representation of his choice when counsel he sought was removed from the case by the commanding officer of his unit; the trial was conducted in an atmosphere of “hysteria” because the crime had been particularly brutal and the authorities had “created” a demand for vengeance; the “coerced” confessions were admitted at the trial and so was the incriminating confession of Calvin Dennis—which had been procured by threats and deceit.

Answering the habeas corpus applications, respondents denied that there had been any violation of petitioners’ rights and attached to their answer copies of the record of each trial, the review of the Staff Judge Advocate, the decision of the Board of Review in the office of the Judge Advocate General, the decision (after briefs and oral argument) of the Judicial Council in the Judge Advocate General's office, the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General, the action of the President confirming the sentences, and also the decision of the Judge Advocate General denying petitions for new trials under Article 53 of the Articles of War.

These records make it plain that the military courts have heard petitioners out on every significant allegation which they now urge. Accordingly, it is not the duty of the civil courts simply to repeat that process—to re-examine and reweigh each item of evidence of the occurrence of events which tend to prove or disprove one of the allegations in the applications for habeas corpus. It is the limited function of the civil courts to determine whether the military have given fair consideration to each of these claims. Whelchel v. McDonald, supra. We think they have.

The military reviewing courts scrutinized the trial records before rejecting petitioners' contentions. In lengthy opinions, they concluded that petitioners had been accorded a complete opportunity to establish the authenticity of their allegations, and had failed. Thus, the trial records were analyzed to show that the circumstances fully justified the decision to remove Dennis' original choice of defense counsel; that each petitioner had declared, at the beginning of his trial, that he was ready to proceed; that each was ably represented; that the trials proceeded in an orderly fashion—with that calm degree of dispassion essential to a fair hearing on the question of guilt; that there was exhaustive inquiry into the background of the confessions—with the taking of testimony from the persons most concerned with the making of these statements, including petitioner Dennis who elected to take the stand. And finally it was demonstrated that the issues arising from the charges relating to the use of perjured testimony and planted evidence were either explored or were available for exploration at the trial.

Petitioners have failed to show that this military review was legally inadequate to resolve the claims which they have urged upon the civil courts. They simply demand an opportunity to make a new record, to prove de novo in the District Court precisely the case which they failed to prove in the military courts. We think, under the circumstances, that due regard for the limitations on a civil court's power to grant such relief precludes such action. We think that although the Court of Appeals may have erred in reweighing each item of relevant evidence in the trial record, it certainly did not err in holding that there was no need for a further hearing in the District Court. Accordingly its judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON concurs in the result.

MR. JUSTICE MINTON, concurring in the affirmance of the judgment.

I do not agree that the federal civil courts sit to protect the constitutional rights of military defendants, except to the limited extent indicated below. Their rights are committed by the Constitution and by Congress acting in pursuance thereof to the protection of the military courts, with review in some instances by the President. Nor do we sit to review errors of law committed by military courts.

This grant to set up military courts is as distinct as the grant to set up civil courts. Congress has acted to implement both grants. Each hierarchy of courts is distinct from the other. We have no supervisory power over the administration of military justice, such as we have over civil justice in the federal courts. Due process of law for military personnel is what Congress has provided for them in the military hierarchy in courts established according to law. If the court is thus established, its action is not reviewable here. Such military court's jurisdiction is exclusive but for the exceptions contained in the statute, and the civil courts are not mentioned in the exceptions. 64 Stat. 115, 50 U. S. C. (Supp. V) § 581 [F. C. A. 50 § 581].

If error is made by the military courts, to which Congress has committed the protection of the rights of military personnel, that error must be corrected in the military hierarchy of courts provided by Congress. We have but one function, namely, to see that the military court has jurisdiction, not whether it has committed error in the exercise of that jurisdiction. * * *

With this understanding, I concur in affirming the judgment.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER. * * *

I cannot agree that the only inquiry that is open on an application for habeas corpus challenging a sentence of a military tribunal is whether that tribunal was legally constituted and had jurisdiction, technically speaking, over the person and the crime. Again, I cannot agree that the scope of inquiry is the same as that open to us on review of State convictions; the content of due process in civil trials does not control what is due process in military trials. Nor is the duty of the civil courts upon habeas corpus met simply when it is found that the military sentence has been reviewed by the military hierarchy, although in a debatable situation we should no doubt attach more weight to the conclusions reached on controversial facts by military appellate courts than to those reached by the highest court of a State.

In the light of these considerations I cannot assume the responsibility, where life is at stake, of concurring in the judgment of the Court. Equally, however, I would not feel justified in reversing the judgment. My duty, as I see it, is to resolve the dilemma by doing neither. It is my view that this is not just a case involving individuals. Issues of far-reaching import are at stake which call for further consideration. They were not explored in all their significance in the submissions made to the Court. While this case arose prior to the new Code of Military Justice, 64 Stat. 107, it necessarily will have a strong bearing upon the relations of the civil courts to the new Court of Military Appeals. The short of it is that I believe this case should be set down for reargument.

I think petitioners are entitled to a judicial hearing on the circumstances surrounding their confessions. * * *

Of course the military tribunals are not governed by the procedure for trials prescribed in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. That is the meaning of Ex parte Quirin, 317 U. S. 1, holding that indictment by grand jury and trial by jury are not constitutional requirements for trials before military commissions. Nor do the courts sit in review of the weight of the evidence before the military tribunal. * * * But never have we held that all the rights covered by the Fifth and the Sixth Amendments were abrogated by Art. I, § 8, cl. 14 of the Constitution, empowering Congress to make rules for the armed forces. I think it plain from the text of the Fifth Amendment that that position is untenable. * * *

What reason is there for making one specific exception for cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia if none of the Fifth Amendment is applicable to military trials? Since the requirement for indictment before trial is the only provision of the Fifth Amendment made inapplicable to military trials, it seems to me clear that the other relevant requirements of the Fifth Amendment (including the ban on coerced confessions) are applicable to them. And if the ban on coerced confessions is applicable, how can it mean one thing in civil trials and another in military trials?

The prohibition against double jeopardy is one of those provisions. And consistently with the construction I urge, we held in Wade v. Hunter, 336 U. S. 684, 690, that court-martial action was subject to that requirement of the Fifth Amendment. The mandates that no person be compelled to be a witness against himself or be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law are as specific and as clear. They too, as the Court of Appeals held, are constitutional requirements binding on military tribunals.

If a prisoner is coerced by torture or other methods to give the evidence against him, if he is beaten or slowly "broken" by third-degree methods, then the "trial" before the military tribunal becomes an empty ritual. The real trial takes place in secret where the accused without benefit of counsel succumbs to physical or psychological pressures. A soldier or sailor convicted in that manner has been denied due process of law; and, like the accused in criminal cases * * * should have relief by way of habeas corpus.

The opinion of the Court is not necessarily opposed to this view. But the Court gives binding effect to the ruling of the military tribunal on the constitutional question, provided it has given fair consideration to it.

If the military agency has fairly and conscientiously applied the standards of due process formulated by this Court, I would agree that a rehash of the same facts by a federal court would not advance the cause of justice. But where the military reviewing agency has not done that, a court should entertain the petition for habeas corpus. In the first place, the military tribunals in question are federal agencies subject to no other judicial supervision except what is afforded by the federal courts. In the second place, the rules of due process which they apply are constitutional rules which we, not they, formulate.

The undisputed facts in this case make a prima facie case that our rule on coerced confessions expressed in Watts v. Indiana, 338 U. S. 49, was violated here. No court has considered the question whether repetitious questioning over a period of five days while the accused was held incommunicado without benefit of counsel violated the Fifth Amendment. * * *

1. In Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How. 65, 15 L. ed. 838 (1858) it was said: "With the sentences of courts-martial which have been convened regularly, and have proceeded legally, and by which punishments are directed, not forbidden by law, or which are according to the laws and customs of the sea, civil courts have nothing to do, nor are they in any way alterable by them. * * * But we repeat, if a court-martial has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the charge it has been convened to try, or shall inflict a punishment forbidden by the law, though its sentence shall be approved by the officers having a revisory power of it, civil courts may, on an action by a party aggrieved by it, inquire into the want of the court's jurisdiction, and give him redress." A recent decision exemplifying the limited scope of judicial review upon habeas corpus of court-martial proceedings is Hiatt v. Brown, 339 U. S. 103, 94 L. ed. 691, 70 Sup. Ct. 495 (1950). See also, Whelchel v. McDonald, 340 U. S. 122, 95 L. ed. 141, 71 Sup. Ct. 146 (1950); Gusik v. Schilder, 340 U. S. 128, 95 L. ed. 146, 71 Sup. Ct. 149 (1950).

2. Petitioner, who had entered the American Zone of Occupied Germany as the dependent wife of a member of the United States Air Force, was convicted in an occupation court in Germany of having murdered her husband in violation of the German Criminal Code. The occupation court was organized under the authority of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces occupying Germany. Petitioner brought habeas corpus on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Burton, held that the occupation court, as a tribunal in the nature of a military commission, had jurisdiction to try petitioner, and that this jurisdiction was not affected by the fact that under the Articles of War a court-martial had concurrent jurisdiction, nor by the fact that before the commission of the crime an occupation statute took effect under which the President vested the authority of the Military Government in a civilian under the control of the Department of State rather than the Department of Defense. Mr. Justice Black dissented on the ground that, if American citizens in Germany are to be tried by the American Government, they should be tried under laws passed, and in courts created, by Congress under its Constitutional authority. Madsen v. Kinsella, 343 U. S. 341, 96 L. ed. 988, 72 Sup. Ct. 699 (1952).

EX PARTE QUIRIN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1942.
317 U. S. 1, 87 L. ed. 3, 63 Sup. Ct. 2.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases are brought here by petitioners' several applications for leave to file petitions for habeas corpus in this Court, and by their petitions for certiorari to review orders of the District Court for the District of Columbia, which denied their applications for leave to file petitions for habeas corpus in that court.

The question for decision is whether the detention of petitioners by respondent for trial by Military Commission, appointed by Order of the President of July 2, 1942, on charges preferred against them purporting to set out their violations of the law of war and the Articles of War, is in conformity to the laws and Constitution of the United States.

After denial of their applications by the District Court, 47 F. Supp. 431, petitioners asked leave to file petitions for habeas corpus in this Court. In view of the public importance of the questions raised by their petitions and of the duty which rests on the courts, in time of war as well as in time of peace, to preserve unimpaired the constitutional safeguards of civil liberty, and because in our opinion the public interest required that we consider and decide those questions without any avoidable delay, we directed that petitioners' applications be set down for full oral argument at a special term of this Court, convened on July 29, 1942. The applications for leave to file the petitions were presented in open court on that day and were heard on the petitions, the answers to them of respondent, a stipulation of facts by counsel, and the record of the testimony given before the Commission.

While the argument was proceeding before us, petitioners perfected their appeals from the orders of the District Court to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and thereupon filed with this Court petitions for certiorari to the Court of Appeals before judgment, pursuant to Section 240(a) of the Judicial Code, 28 U. S. C. § 347(a) [F. C. A. 28 § 347(a)]. We granted certiorari before judgment for the reasons which moved us to convene the special term of Court. In accordance with the stipulation of counsel we treat the record, briefs and arguments in the habeas corpus proceedings in this Court as the record, briefs and arguments upon the writs of certiorari.

On July 31, 1942, after hearing argument of counsel and after full consideration of all questions raised, this Court affirmed the orders of the District Court and denied petitioners' applications for leave to file petitions for habeas corpus. By per curiam opinion, 317 U. S. 1, we announced the decision of the Court, and that the full opinion in the causes would be prepared and filed with the Clerk.

The following facts appear from the petitions or are stipulated. Except as noted they are undisputed.

All the petitioners were born in Germany; all have lived in the United States. All returned to Germany between 1933 and 1941. All except petitioner Haupt are admittedly citizens of the German Reich, with which the United States is at war. Haupt came to this country with his parents when he was five years old; it is contended that he became a citizen of the United States by virtue of the naturalization of his parents during his minority and that he has not since lost his citizenship. The Government, however, takes the position that on attaining his majority he elected to maintain German allegiance and citizenship or in any case that he has by his conduct renounced or abandoned his United States citizenship. * * * For reasons presently to be stated we do not find it necessary to resolve these contentions.

After the declaration of war between the United States and the German Reich, petitioners received training at a sabotage school near Berlin, Germany, where they were instructed in the use of explosives and in methods of secret writing. Thereafter petitioners, with a German citizen, Dasch, proceeded from Germany to a seaport in Occupied France, where petitioners Burger, Heinck and Quirin, together with Dasch, boarded a German submarine which proceeded across the Atlantic to Amagansett Beach on Long Island, New York. The four were there landed from the submarine in the hours of darkness, on or about June 13, 1942, carrying with them a supply of explosives, fuses and incendiary and timing devices. While landing they wore German Marine Infantry uniforms or parts of uniforms. Immediately after landing they buried their uniforms and the other articles mentioned and proceeded in civilian dress to New York City.

The remaining four petitioners at the same French port boarded another German submarine, which carried them across the Atlantic to Ponte Vedra Beach, Florida. On or about June 17, 1942, they came ashore during the hours of darkness wearing caps of the German Marine Infantry and carrying with them a supply of explosives, fuses, and incendiary and timing devices. They immediately buried their caps and the other articles mentioned and proceeded in civilian dress to Jacksonville, Florida, and thence to various points in the United States. All were taken into custody in New York or Chicago by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. All had received instructions in Germany from an officer of the German High Command to destroy war industries and war facilities in the United States, for which they or their relatives in Germany were to receive salary payments from the German Government. They also had been paid by the German Government during their course of training at the sabotage school and had received substantial sums in United States currency, which were in their possession when arrested. The currency had been handed to them by an officer of the German High Command, who had instructed them to wear their German uniforms while landing in the United States.

The President, as President and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, by Order of July 2, 1942, appointed a Military Commission and directed it to try petitioners for offenses against the law of war and the Articles of War, and prescribed regulations for the procedure on the trial and for review of the record of the trial and of any judgment or sentence of the Commission. On the same day, by Proclamation, the President declared that "all persons who are subjects, citizens or residents of any nation at war with the United States or who give obedience to or act under the direction of any such nation, and who during time of war enter or attempt to enter the United States * * * through coastal or boundary defenses, and are charged with committing or attempting to or preparing to commit sabotage, espionage, hostile or war-like acts, or violations of the law of war, shall be subject to the law of war and to the jurisdictions of military tribunals."

The Proclamation also stated in terms that all such persons were denied access to the courts.

Pursuant to direction of the Attorney General, the Federal Bureau of Investigation surrendered custody of petitioners to respondent, Provost Marshal of the Military District of Washington, who was directed by the Secretary of War to receive and keep them in custody, and who thereafter held petitioners for trial before the Commission.

On July 3, 1942, the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army prepared and lodged with the Commission the following charges against petitioners, supported by specifications:

1. Violation of the law of war.
2. Violation of Article 81 of the Articles of War, defining the offense of relieving or attempting to relieve, or corresponding with or giving intelligence to, the enemy.
3. Violation of Article 82, defining the offense of spying.
4. Conspiracy to commit the offenses alleged in charges 1, 2 and 3.

The Commission met on July 8, 1942, and proceeded with the trial, which continued in progress while the causes were pending in this Court. On July 27th, before petitioners' applications to the District Court, all the evidence for the prosecution and the defense had been taken by the Commission and the case had been closed except for arguments of counsel. It is conceded that ever since petitioners' arrest the state and federal courts in Florida, New York, and the District of Columbia, and in the states in which each of the petitioners was arrested or detained, have been open and functioning normally. * * *

Petitioners' main contention is that the President is without any statutory or constitutional authority to order the petitioners to be tried by military tribunal for offenses with which they are charged; that in consequence they are entitled to be tried in the civil courts with the safeguards, including trial by jury, which the Fifth and Sixth Amendments guarantee to all persons charged in such courts with criminal offenses. In any case it is urged that the President's Order, in prescribing the procedure of the Commission and the method for review of its findings and sentence, and the proceedings of the Commission under the Order, conflict with Articles of War adopted by Congress—particularly Articles 38, 43, 46, 50½ and 70—and are illegal and void.

The Government challenges each of these propositions. But regardless of their merits, it also insists that petitioners must be denied access to the courts, both because they are enemy aliens or have entered our territory as enemy belligerents, and because the President's Proclamation undertakes in terms to deny such access to the class of persons defined by the Proclamation, which aptly describes the character and conduct of petitioners. It is urged that if they are enemy aliens or if the Proclamation has force no court may afford the petitioners a hearing. But there is certainly nothing in the Proclamation to preclude access to the courts for determining its applicability to the particular case. And neither the Proclamation nor the fact that they are enemy aliens forecloses consideration by the courts of petitioners' contentions that the Constitution and laws of the United States constitutionally enacted forbid their trial by military commission. As announced in our per curiam opinion we have resolved those questions by our conclusion that the Commission has jurisdiction to try the charge preferred against petitioners. There is therefore no occasion to decide contentions of the parties unrelated to this issue. We pass at once to the consideration of the basis of the Commission's authority. * * *

From the very beginning of its history this Court has recognized and applied the law of war as including that part of the law of nations which prescribes, for the conduct of war, the status, rights and duties of enemy nations as well as of enemy individuals. By the Articles of War, and especially Article 15, Congress has explicitly provided, so far as it may constitutionally do so, that military tribunals shall have jurisdiction to try offenders or offenses against the law of war in appropriate cases. Congress, in addition to making rules for the government of our Armed Forces, has thus exercised its authority to define and punish offenses against the law of nations by sanctioning, within constitutional limitations, the jurisdiction of military commissions to try persons and offenses which, according to the rules and precepts of the law of nations, and more particularly the law of war, are cognizable by such tribunals. And the President, as Commander in Chief, by his Proclamation in time of war has invoked that law. By his Order creating the present Commission he has undertaken to exercise the authority conferred upon him by Congress, and also such authority as the Constitution itself gives the Commander in Chief, to direct the performance of those functions which may constitutionally be performed by the military arm of the nation in time of war.

An important incident to the conduct of war is the adoption of measures by the military command not only to repel and defeat the enemy, but to seize and subject to disciplinary measures those enemies who in their attempt to thwart or impede our military effort have violated the law of war. It is unnecessary for present purposes to determine to what extent the President as Commander in Chief has constitutional power to create military commissions without the support of Congressional legislation. For here Congress has authorized trial of offenses against the law of war before such commissions. We are concerned only with the question whether it is within the constitutional power of the national government to place petitioners upon trial before a military commission for the offenses with which they are charged. We must therefore first inquire whether any of the acts charged is an offense against the law of war cognizable before a military tribunal, and if so whether the Constitution prohibits the trial. We may assume that there are acts regarded in other countries, or by some writers on international law, as offenses against the law of war which would not be triable by military tribunal here, either because they are not recognized by our courts as violations of the law of war or because they are of that class of offenses constitutionally triable only by a jury. It was upon such grounds that the Court denied the right to proceed by military tribunal in Ex parte Milligan [4 Wall. 2]. But as we shall show, these petitioners were charged with an offense against the law of war which the Constitution does not require to be tried by jury.

It is no objection that Congress in providing for the trial of such offenses has not itself undertaken to codify that branch of international law or to mark its precise boundaries, or to enumerate or define by statute all the acts which that law condemns. * * * Congress had the choice of crystallizing in permanent form and in minute detail every offense against the law of war, or of adopting the system of common law applied by military tribunals so far as it should be recognized and deemed applicable by the courts. It chose the latter course.

By universal agreement and practice the law of war draws a distinction between the armed forces and the peaceful populations of belligerent nations and also between those who are lawful and unlawful combatants. Lawful combatants are subject to capture and detention as prisoners of war by opposing military forces. Unlawful combatants are likewise subject to capture and detention, but in addition they are subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals for acts which render their belligerency unlawful. The spy who secretly and without uniform passes the military lines of a belligerent in time of war, seeking to gather military information and communicate it to the enemy, or an enemy combatant who without uniform comes secretly through the lines for the purpose of waging war by destruction of life or property, are familiar examples of belligerents who are generally deemed not to be entitled to the status of prisoners of war, but to be offenders against the law of war subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals. * * *

Our Government, by thus defining lawful belligerents entitled to be treated as prisoners of war, has recognized that there is a class of unlawful belligerents not entitled to that privilege, including those who though combatants do not wear "fixed and distinctive emblems." And by Article 15 of the Articles of War Congress has made provision for their trial and punishment by military commission, according to "the law of war." * * *

Specification 1 of the first charge is sufficient to charge all the petitioners with the offense of unlawful belligerency, trial of which is within the jurisdiction of the Commission, and the admitted facts affirmatively show that the charge is not merely colorable or without foundation. * * *

Citizenship in the United States of an enemy belligerent does not relieve him from the consequences of a belligerency which is unlawful because in violation of the law of war. Citizens who associate themselves with the military arm of the enemy government, and with its aid, guidance and direction enter this country bent on hostile acts are enemy belligerents within the meaning of the Hague Convention and the law of war. Cf. Gates v. Goodloe, 101 U. S. 612, 615, 617, 618. It is as an enemy belligerent that petitioner Haupt is charged with entering the United States, and unlawful belligerency is the gravamen of the offense of which he is accused. * * *

But petitioners insist that even if the offenses with which they are charged are offenses against the law of war, their trial is subject to the requirement of the Fifth Amendment that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that such trials by Article III, § 2, and the Sixth Amendment must be by jury in a civil court. * * *

Presentment by a grand jury and trial by a jury of the vicinage where the crime was committed were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution familiar parts of the machinery for criminal trials in the civil courts. But they were procedures unknown to military tribunals, which are not courts in the sense of the Judiciary Article, Ex parte Vallandigham, 1 Wall. 243; In re Vidal, 179 U. S. 126; cf. Williams v. United States, 289 U. S. 553, and which in the natural course of events are usually called upon to function under conditions precluding resort to such procedures. As this Court has often recognized, it was not the purpose or effect of § 2 of Article III, read in the light of the common law, to enlarge the then existing right to a jury trial. The object was to preserve unimpaired trial by jury in all those cases in which it had been recognized by the common law and in all cases of a like nature as they might arise in the future, District of Columbia v. Colts, 282 U. S. 63, but not to bring within the sweep of the guaranty those cases in which it was then well understood that a jury trial could not be demanded as of right.

The Fifth and Sixth Amendments, while guaranteeing the continuance of certain incidents of trial by jury which Article III, § 2 had left unmentioned, did not enlarge the right to jury trial as it had been established by that Article. Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 549. Hence petty offenses triable at common law without a jury may be tried without a jury in the federal courts, notwithstanding Article III, § 2, and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. Schick v. United States, 195 U. S. 65; District of Columbia v. Clawans, 300 U. S. 617. Trial by jury of criminal contempts may constitutionally be dispensed with in the federal courts in those cases in which they could be tried without a jury at common law. Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289, 302, 304; Savin, Petitioner, 131 U. S. 267, 277; In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 594-596; United States v. Shipp, 203 U. S. 563, 572; Blackmer v. United States, 284 U. S. 421, 440; Nye v. United States, 313 U. S. 33, 48; see United States v. Hudson and Goodwin, 7 Cranch 32, 34. Similarly, an action for debt to enforce a penalty inflicted by Congress is not subject to the constitutional restrictions upon criminal prosecutions. United States v. Zucker, 161 U. S. 475; United States v. Regan, 232 U. S. 37, and cases cited.

All these are instances of offenses committed against the United States, for which a penalty is imposed, but they are not deemed to be within Article III, § 2 or the provisions of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments relating to "crimes" and "criminal prosecutions." In the light of this long-continued and consistent interpretation we must conclude that § 2 of Article III and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments cannot be taken to have extended the right to demand a jury to trials by military commission, or to have required that offenses against the law of war not triable by jury at common law be tried only in the civil courts.

The fact that "cases arising in the land or naval forces" are excepted from the operation of the Amendments does not militate against this conclusion. Such cases are expressly excepted from the Fifth Amendment, and are deemed excepted by implication from the Sixth. Ex parte Milligan, supra, 4 Wall. 123, 138, 139. It is argued that the exception, which excludes from the Amendment cases arising in the armed forces, has also by implication extended its guaranty to all other cases; that since petitioners, not being members of the Armed Forces of the United States, are not within the exception, the Amendment operates to give to them the right to a jury trial. But we think this argument misconceives both the scope of the Amendment and the purpose of the exception.

We may assume, without deciding, that a trial prosecuted before a military commission created by military authority is not one "arising in the land * * * forces," when the accused is not a member of or associated with those forces. But even so, the exception cannot be taken to affect those trials before military commissions which are neither within the exception nor within the provisions of Article III, § 2, whose guaranty the Amendments did not enlarge. No exception is necessary to exclude from the operation of these provisions cases never deemed to be within their terms. * * *

Section 2 of the Act of Congress of April 10, 1806, 2 Stat. 371, derived from the Resolution of the Continental Congress of August 21, 1776, imposed the death penalty on alien spies "according to the law and usage of nations, by sentence of a general court-martial." This enactment must be regarded as a contemporary construction of both Article III, § 2, and the Amendments as not foreclosing trial by military tribunals, without a jury, of offenses against the law of war committed by enemies not in or associated with our Armed Forces. It is a construction of the Constitution which has been followed since the founding of our government, and is now continued in the 82nd Article of War. Such a construction is entitled to the greatest respect. Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299, 309; Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 691; United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U. S. 304, 328. It has not hitherto been challenged, and so far as we are advised it has never been suggested in the very extensive literature of the subject that an alien spy, in time of war, could not be tried by military tribunal without a jury.

The exception from the Amendments of "cases arising in the land or naval forces" was not aimed at trials by military tribunals, without a jury, of such offenses against the law of war. Its objective was quite different—to authorize the trial by court martial of the members of our Armed Forces for all that class of crimes which under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments might otherwise have been deemed triable in the civil courts. The cases mentioned in the exception are not restricted to those involving offenses against the law of war alone, but extend to trial of all offenses, including crimes which were of the class traditionally triable by jury at common law. Ex parte Mason, 105 U. S. 696; Kahn v. Anderson, 255 U. S. 1, 8, 9; cf. Caldwell v. Parker, 252 U. S. 376.

Since the Amendments, like § 2 of Article III, do not preclude all trials of offenses against the law of war by military commission without a jury when the offenders are aliens not members of our Armed Forces, it is plain that they present no greater obstacle to the trial in like manner of citizen enemies who have violated the law of war applicable to enemies. Under the original statute authorizing trial of alien spies by military tribunals, the offenders were outside the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury, not because they were aliens but only because they had violated the law of war by committing offenses constitutionally triable by military tribunal.

We cannot say that Congress in preparing the Fifth and Sixth Amendments intended to extend trial by jury to the cases of alien or citizen offenders against the law of war otherwise triable by military commission, while withholding it from members of our own armed forces charged with infractions of the Articles of War punishable by death. It is equally inadmissible to construe the Amendments—whose primary purpose was to continue unimpaired presentment by grand jury and trial by petit jury in all those cases in which they had been customary—as either abolishing all trials by military tribunals, save those of the personnel of our own armed forces, or what in effect comes to the same thing, as imposing on all such tribunals the necessity of proceeding against unlawful enemy belligerents only on presentment and trial by jury. We conclude that the Fifth and Sixth Amendments did not restrict whatever authority was conferred by the Constitution to try offenses against the law of war by military commission, and that petitioners, charged with such an offense not required to be tried by jury at common law, were lawfully placed on trial by the Commission without a jury.

Petitioners, and especially petitioner Haupt, stress the pronouncement of this Court in the Milligan case, 4 Wall. page 121, that the law of war “can never be applied to citizens in states which have upheld the authority of the government, and where the courts are open and their process unobstructed.” Elsewhere in its opinion, 4 Wall. at pages 118, 121, 122, and 131, the Court was at pains to point out that Milligan, a citizen twenty years resident in Indiana, who had never been a resident of any of the states in rebellion, was not an enemy belligerent either entitled to the status of a prisoner of war or subject to the penalties imposed upon unlawful belligerents. We construe the Court’s statement as to the inapplicability of the law of war to Milligan’s case as having particular reference to the facts before it. From them the Court concluded that Milligan, not being a part of or associated with the armed forces of the enemy, was a non-belligerent, not subject to the law of war save as—in circumstances found not there to be present and not involved here—martial law might be constitutionally established.

The Court’s opinion is inapplicable to the case presented by the present record. We have no occasion now to define with meticulous care the ultimate boundaries of the jurisdiction of military tribunals to try persons according to the law of war. It is enough that petitioners here, upon the conceded facts, were plainly within those boundaries, and were held in good faith for trial by military commission, charged with being enemies who, with the purpose of destroying war materials and utilities, entered or after entry remained in our territory without uniform—an offense against the law of war. We hold only that those particular acts constitute an offense against the law of war which the Constitution authorizes to be tried by military commission. * * *

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Orders of the District Court affirmed and leave to file petitions for habeas corpus in the Supreme Court denied.

NOTES

1. The Constitution (Art. I, § 9, cl. 2) provides that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." President Lincoln suspended the writ by executive proclamation in 1861. In Ex parte Merryman, Fed. Cas. No. 9,487 (1861) Chief Justice Taney of the Supreme Court expressed the opinion that Congress alone possessed this power under the Constitution, and his view has been generally accepted as correct, although Lincoln's position was defended by leading Constitutional lawyers of his day. Later, in 1863, Congress authorized the President to suspend the writ whenever in his judgment the public safety might require it. In the famous case of Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 18 L. ed. 281 (1866), discussed in the principal case, a majority of the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Davis, held that in a state where the civil courts were in full operation and the federal government was unopposed, trial by a military commission could not legally be substituted for civil trial. Four justices were unwilling to go this far. Speaking for this group, Chief Justice Chase agreed that since Congress had not in fact made provision for the military tribunal in question and the trial had taken place in a locality where no hostilities were being carried on, the defendant was entitled to be released. But the minority justices took the position that Congress was not without power to deal with emergency situations of this sort. They said: "Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is, that when the nation is involved in war, and some portions of the country are invaded, and all are exposed to invasion, it is within the power of Congress to determine in what states or districts such great and imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offenses against the discipline or security of the army or against the public safety." For the historical background of the Milligan case and analysis of the issues involved, consult 3 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), ch. 29; Swisher, American Constitutional Development (1943), 285-289; Klaus, The Milligan Case (1929); Fairman, The Law of Martial Rule (2d ed. 1942); Randall, Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln (1926).

2. After the attack on Pearl Harbor the Governor of Hawaii suspended the writ of habeas corpus and placed the territory under martial law, calling upon the commanding general to exercise the powers normally exercised by the Governor and by the judicial officers of the territory. Section 67 of the Hawaiian Organic Act authorized the Governor to take this action in case of rebellion or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety required it. Pursuant to this authorization the commanding general established military tribunals to take the place of the courts. These were to try civilians charged with violating the laws of the United States and of the territory and the rules and regulations of the military government. Rules of evidence and ordinary court procedure were not to control military trials. Punishments were to be "commensurate with the offense committed" and the death penalty might be imposed "in appropriate cases." Thus the military authorities virtually took over the government of Hawaii. In Duncan v. Kahanamoku and White v. Steer, 327 U. S. 304, 90 L. ed. 688, 66 Sup. Ct. 606 (1946) the two defendants had been tried by military tribunals, without juries, without receiving written charges and without adequate time to prepare their defenses. Duncan was a civilian shipfitter employed in the Navy Yard at Honolulu. More than two years after Pearl Harbor he engaged in a brawl with two armed Marine sentries, was arrested by the military authorities, charged with assault, tried by a military tribunal, convicted and sentenced to six months imprisonment. White, a stockbroker, was charged with embezzling stock belonging to another civilian. Arrested more than eight months after Pearl Harbor, he was tried before a military tribunal, convicted and sentenced to five years imprisonment. Both defendants brought habeas corpus proceedings, challenging the authority of the military courts on both Constitutional and statutory grounds. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Black, held that the Organic Act did not give the armed forces power to supplant all civilian laws and to substitute military for judicial trials under the conditions that existed at the time defendants were tried. Said the court: "We believe that when Congress passed the Hawaiian Organic Act and authorized the establishment of 'martial law' it had in mind and did not wish to exceed the boundaries between military and civilian power, in which our people have always believed, which responsible military and executive officers had heeded, and which had become part of our political philosophy and institutions prior to the time Congress passed the Organic Act. The phrase 'martial law' as employed in that act, therefore, while intended to authorize the military to act vigorously for the maintenance of an orderly civil government and for the defense of the Islands against actual or threatened rebellion or invasion, was not intended to authorize the supplanting of courts by military tribunals." Mr. Chief Justice Stone and Mr. Justice Murphy wrote separate concurring opinions and Justices Burton and Frankfurter dissented. The court thus based its decision on the meaning and purpose of the Organic Act rather than the power of Congress under the Constitution to authorize the measures which had been taken by the military commander. See Anthony, Martial Law in Hawaii, 30 Cal. L. Rev. 371 (1942); Anthony, Martial Law, Military Government and the Writ of Habeas Corpus in Hawaii, 31 Cal. L. Rev. 477 (1943); Frank, Ex Parte Milligan v. The Five Companies: Martial Law in Hawaii, 44 Col. L. Rev. 639 (1944); Fairman, The Supreme Court on Military Jurisdiction: Martial Rule in Hawaii and the Yamashita Case, 59 Harv. L. Rev. 833 (1946).

3. Matter of Yamashita, 327 U. S. 1, 90 L. ed. 499, 66 Sup. Ct. 340 (1946) involved the case of a Japanese general who had been tried, convicted and sentenced to death by a military commission in Manila for war crimes in the Philippines. It was contended that the trial had violated various provisions of the Articles of War as well as of the Geneva Convention of 1929 relating to prisoners of war. Denying relief (Justices Murphy and Rutledge dissenting), the court held that the commission was lawfully convened and constituted, that petitioner was charged with violations of the law of war, that the commission had authority to proceed with the trial, and in so doing did not violate any military, statutory, or Constitutional command. Chief Justice Stone's opinion said: "The extent to which the power to prosecute violations of the law of war shall be exercised before peace is declared rests, not with the courts, but with the political branch of the Government, and may itself be governed by the terms of an armistice or the treaty of peace. Here, peace has not been agreed upon or proclaimed. Japan, by her acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration and her surrender, has acquiesced in the trials of those guilty of violations of the law of war. The conduct of the trial by the military commission has been authorized by the political branch of the Government, by military command, by international law and usage, and by the terms of the surrender of the Japanese government." For a complete history of the case see Reel, The Case of General Yamashita (1949).

KOREMATSU v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1944.
323 U. S. 214, 89 L. ed. 194, 65 Sup. Ct. 193.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

The petitioner, an American citizen of Japanese descent, was convicted in a federal district court for remaining in San Leandro, Califoria, a "Military Area," contrary to Civilian Exclusion Order No. 34 of the Commanding General of the Western Command, U. S. Army, which directed that after May 9, 1942, all persons of Japanese ancestry should be excluded from that area. No question was raised as to petitioner's loyalty to the United States. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, and the importance of the constitutional question involved caused us to grant certiorari.

It should be noted, to begin with, that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny. Pressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can.

In the instant case prosecution of the petitioner was begun by information charging violation of an Act of Congress, of March 21, 1942, 56 Stat. 173, 18 U. S. C. § 97a [F. C. A. 18 § 97a], which provides that "* * * whoever shall enter, remain in, leave, or commit any act in any military area or military zone prescribed, under the authority of an Executive order of the President, by the Secretary of War, or by any military commander designated by the Secretary of War, contrary to the restrictions applicable to any such area or zone or contrary to the order of the Secretary of War or any such military commander, shall, if it appears that he knew or should have known of the existence and extent of the restrictions or order and that his act was in violation thereof, be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be liable to a fine of not to exceed $5,000 or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, for each offense."

Exclusion Order No. 34, which the petitioner knowingly and admittedly violated was one of a number of military orders and proclamations, all of which were substantially based upon Executive Order No. 9066, 7 Fed. Reg. 1407. That order, issued after we were at war with Japan, declared that "the successful prosecution of the war requires every possible protection against espionage and against sabotage to national-defense material, national-defense premises, and national-defense utilities. * * *"

One of the series of orders and proclamations, a curfew order, which like the exclusion order here was promulgated pursuant to Executive Order 9066, subjected all persons of Japanese ancestry in prescribed West Coast military areas to remain in their residences from 8 p. m. to 6 a. m. As is the case with the exclusion order here, that prior curfew order was designed as a "protection against espionage and against sabotage." In Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, we sustained a conviction obtained for violation of the curfew order. The Hirabayashi conviction and this one thus rest on the same 1942 Congressional Act and the same basic executive and military orders, all of which orders were aimed at the twin dangers of espionage and sabotage.

The 1942 Act was attacked in the Hirabayashi case as an unconstitutional delegation of power; it was contended that the curfew order and other orders on which it rested were beyond the war powers of the Congress, the military authorities and of the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army; and finally that to apply the curfew order against none but citizens of Japanese ancestry amounted to a constitutionally prohibited discrimination solely on account of race. To these questions, we gave the serious consideration which their importance justified. We upheld the curfew order as an exercise of the power of government to take steps necessary to prevent espionage and sabotage in an area threatened by Japanese attack.

In the light of the principles we announced in the Hirabayashi case, we are unable to conclude that it was beyond the war power of Congress and the Executive to exclude those of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast war area at the time they did. True, exclusion from the area in which one's home is located is a far greater deprivation than constant confinement to the home from 8 p. m. to 6 a. m. Nothing short of apprehension by the proper military authorities of the gravest imminent danger to the public safety can constitutionally justify either. But exclusion from a threatened area, no less than curfew, has a definite and close relationship to the prevention of espionage and sabotage. The military authorities, charged with the primary responsibility of defending our shores, concluded that curfew provided inadequate protection and ordered exclusion. They did so, as pointed out in our Hirabayashi opinion, in accordance with Congressional authority to the military to say who should, and who should not, remain in the threatened areas.

In this case the petitioner challenges the assumptions upon which we rested our conclusions in the Hirabayashi case. He also urges that by May 1942, when Order No. 34 was promulgated, all danger of Japanese invasion of the West Coast had disappeared. After careful consideration of these contentions we are compelled to reject them.

Here, as in the Hirabayashi case, supra, (320 U. S. at page 99), “* * * we cannot reject as unfounded the judgment of the military authorities and of Congress that there were disloyal members of that population, whose number and strength could not be precisely and quickly ascertained. We cannot say that the war-making branches of the Government did not have ground for believing that in a critical hour such persons could not readily be isolated and separately dealt with, and constituted a menace to the national defense and safety, which demanded that prompt and adequate measures be taken to guard against it.”

Like curfew, exclusion of those of Japanese origin was deemed necessary because of the presence of an unascertained number of disloyal members of the group, most of whom we have no doubt were loyal to this country. It was because we could not reject the finding of the military authorities that it was impossible to bring about an immediate segregation of the disloyal from the loyal that we sustained the validity of the curfew order as applying to the whole group. In the instant case, temporary exclusion of the entire group was rested by the military on the same ground. The judgment that exclusion of the whole group was for the same reason a military imperative answers the contention that the exclusion was in the nature of group punishment based on antagonism to those of Japanese origin. That there were members of the group who retained loyalties to Japan has been confirmed by investigations made subsequent to the exclusion. Approximately five thousand American citizens of Japanese ancestry refused to swear unqualified allegiance to the United States and to renounce allegiance to the Japanese Emperor, and several thousand evacuees requested repatriation to Japan.

We uphold the exclusion order as of the time it was made and when the petitioner violated it. * * * In doing so, we are not unmindful of the hardships imposed by it upon a large group of American citizens. Cf. Ex parte Kawato, 317 U. S. 69, 73. But hardships are part of war, and war is an aggregation of hardships. All citizens alike, both in and out of uniform, feel the impact of war in greater or lesser measure. Citizenship has its responsibilities as well as its privileges, and in time of war the burden is always heavier. Compulsory exclusion of large groups of citizens from their homes, except under circumstances of direst emergency and peril, is inconsistent with our basic governmental institutions. But when under conditions of modern warfare our shores are threatened by hostile forces, the power to protect must be commensurate with the threatened danger.

It is argued that on May 30, 1942, the date the petitioner was charged with remaining in the prohibited area, there were conflicting orders outstanding, forbidding him both to leave the area and to remain there. Of course, a person cannot be convicted for doing the very thing which it is a crime to fail to do. But the outstanding orders here contained no such contradictory commands.

There was an order issued March 27, 1942, which prohibited petitioner and others of Japanese ancestry from leaving the area, but its effect was specifically limited in time "until and to the extent that a future proclamation or order should so permit or direct." 7 Fed. Reg. 2601. That "future order," the one for violation of which petitioner was convicted, was issued May 3, 1942, and it did "direct" exclusion from the area of all persons of Japanese ancestry, before 12 o'clock noon, May 9; furthermore it contained a warning that all such persons found in the prohibited area would be liable to punishment under the March 21, 1942 Act of Congress. Consequently, the only order in effect touching the petitioner's being in the area on May 30, 1942, the date specified in the information against him, was the May 3 order which prohibited his remaining there, and it was that same order, which he stipulated in his trial that he violated, knowing of its existence. There is therefore no basis for the argument that on May 30, 1942, he was subject to punishment, under the March 27 and May 3rd orders, whether he remained in or left the area.

It does appear, however, that on May 9, the effective date of the exclusion order, the military authorities had already determined that the evacuation should be effected by assembling together and placing under guard all those of Japanese ancestry, at central points, designated as "assembly centers," in order "to insure the orderly evacuation and resettlement of Japanese voluntarily migrating from military area No. 1 to restrict and regulate such migration." Public Proclamation No. 4, 7 Fed. Reg. 2601. And on May 19, 1942, eleven days before the time petitioner was charged with unlawfully remaining in the area, Civilian Restrictive Order No. 1, 8 Fed. Reg. 982, provided for detention of those of Japanese ancestry in assembly or relocation centers. It is now argued that the validity of the exclusion order cannot be considered apart from the orders requiring him, after departure from the area, to report and to remain in an assembly or relocation center. The contention is that we must treat these separate orders as one and inseparable; that, for this reason, if detention in the assembly or relocation center would have illegally deprived the petitioner of his liberty, the exclusion order and his conviction under it cannot stand.

We are thus being asked to pass at this time upon the whole subsequent detention program in both assembly and relocation centers, although the only issues framed at the trial related to petitioner's remaining in the prohibited area in violation of the exclusion order. Had petitioner here left the prohibited area and gone to an assembly center, we cannot say either as a matter of fact or law, that his presence in that center would have resulted in his detention in a relocation center. Some who did report to the assembly center were not sent to relocation centers, but were released upon condition that they remain outside the prohibited zone until the military orders were modified or lifted. This illustrates that they pose different problems and may be governed by different principles. The lawfulness of one does not necessarily determine the lawfulness of the others. This is made clear when we analyze the requirements of the separate provisions of the separate orders. These separate requirements were that those of Japanese ancestry (1) depart from the area; (2) report to and temporarily remain in an assembly center; (3) go under military control to a relocation center there to remain for an indeterminate period until released conditionally or unconditionally by the military authorities. Each of these requirements, it will be noted, imposed distinct duties in connection with the separate steps in a complete evacuation program. Had Congress directly incorporated into one Act the language of these separate orders, and provided sanctions for their violations, disobedience of any one would have constituted a separate offense. * * * There is no reason why violations of these orders, insofar as they were promulgated pursuant to congressional enactment, should not be treated as separate offenses.

Since the petitioner has not been convicted of failing to report or to remain in an assembly or relocation center, we cannot in this case determine the validity of those separate provisions of the order. It is sufficient here for us to pass upon the order which petitioner violated. To do more would be to go beyond the issues raised, and to decide momentous questions not contained within the framework of the pleadings or the evidence in this case. It will be time enough to decide the serious constitutional issues which petitioner seeks to raise when an assembly or relocation order is applied or is certain to be applied to him, and we have its terms before us.

Some of the members of the Court are of the view that evacuation and detention in an Assembly Center were inseparable. After May 3, 1942, the date of Exclusion Order No. 34, Korematsu was under compulsion to leave the area not as he would choose but via an Assembly Center. The Assembly Center was conceived as a part of the machinery for group evacuation. The power to exclude includes the power to do it by force if necessary. And any forcible measure must necessarily entail some degree of detention or restraint whatever method of removal is selected. But whichever view is taken, it results in holding that the order under which petitioner was convicted was valid.

It is said that we are dealing here with the case of imprisonment of a citizen in a concentration camp solely because of his ancestry, without evidence or inquiry concerning his loyalty and good disposition towards the United States. Our task would be simple, our duty clear, were this a case involving the imprisonment of a loyal citizen in a concentration camp because of racial prejudice. Regardless of the true nature of the assembly and relocation centers—and we deem it unjustifiable to call them concentration camps with all the ugly connotations that term implies—we are dealing specifically with nothing but an exclusion order. To cast this case into outlines of racial prejudice, without reference to the real military dangers which were presented, merely confuses the issue. Korematsu was not excluded from the Military Area because of hostility to him or his race. He was excluded because we are at war with the Japanese Empire, because the properly constituted military authorities feared an invasion of our West Coast and felt constrained to take proper security measures, because they decided that the military urgency of the situation demanded that all citizens of Japanese ancestry be segregated from the West Coast temporarily, and finally, because Congress, reposing its confidence in this time of war in our military leaders—as inevitably it must—determined that they should have the power to do just this. There was evidence of disloyalty on the part of some, the military authorities considered that the need for action was great, and time was short. We cannot—by availing ourselves of the calm perspective of hindsight—now say that at that time these actions were unjustified. Affirmed.

[MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER wrote a concurring opinion which is omitted here.]

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS, dissenting.

I dissent, because I think the indisputable facts exhibit a clear violation of Constitutional rights.

This is not a case of keeping people off the streets at night as was Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, nor a case of temporary exclusion of a citizen from an area for his own safety or that of the community, nor a case of offering him an opportunity to go temporarily out of an area where his presence might cause danger to himself or to his fellows. On the contrary it is the case of convicting a citizen as a punishment for not submitting to imprisonment in a concentration camp, based on his ancestry, and solely because of his ancestry, without evidence or inquiry concerning his loyalty and good disposition towards the United States. If this be a correct statement of the facts disclosed by this record, and facts of which we take judicial notice, I need hardly labor the conclusion that constitutional rights have been violated.

The Government's argument, and the opinion of the court, in my judgment, erroneously divide that which is single and indivisible and thus make the case appear as if the petitioner violated a Military Order, sanctioned by Act of Congress, which excluded him from his home, by refusing voluntarily to leave and, so, knowingly and intentionally, defying the order and the Act of Congress. * * *

The predicament in which the petitioner found himself was this: He was forbidden, by Military Order, to leave the zone in which he lived; he was forbidden, by Military Order, after a date fixed, to be found within that zone unless he were in an Assembly Center located in that zone. General DeWitt's report to the Secretary of War concerning the programme of evacuation and relocation of Japanese makes it entirely clear, if it were necessary to refer to that document,—and, in the light of the above recitation, I think it is not,—that an Assembly Center was a euphemism for a prison. No person within such a center was permitted to leave except by Military Order.

In the dilemma that he dare not remain in his home, or voluntarily leave the area, without incurring criminal penalties, and that the only way he could avoid punishment was to go to an Assembly Center and submit himself to military imprisonment, the petitioner did nothing.

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that had the petitioner attempted to violate Proclamation No. 4 and leave the military area in which he lived he would have been arrested and tried and convicted for violation of Proclamation No. 4. The two conflicting orders, one which commanded him to stay and the other which commanded him to go, were nothing but a cleverly devised trap to accomplish the real purpose of the military authority, which was to lock him up in a concentration camp. The only course by which the petitioner could avoid arrest and prosecution was to go to that camp according to instructions to be given him when he reported at a Civil Control Center. We know that is the fact. Why should we set up a figmentary and artificial situation instead of addressing ourselves to the actualities of the case?

These stark realities are met by the suggestion that it is lawful to compel an American citizen to submit to illegal imprisonment on the assumption that he might, after going to the Assembly Center, apply for his discharge by suing out a writ of habeas corpus, as was done in the Endo Case, supra. The answer, of course, is that where he was subject to two conflicting laws he was not bound, in order to escape violation of one or the other, to surrender his liberty for any period. Nor will it do to say that the detention was a necessary part of the process of evacuation, and so we are here concerned only with the validity of the latter. * * *

I would reverse the judgment of conviction.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, dissenting. * * *

No adequate reason is given for the failure to treat these Japanese Americans on an individual basis by holding investigations and hearings to separate the loyal from the disloyal, as was done in the case of persons of German and Italian ancestry. See House Report No. 2124 (77th Cong., 2d Sess.) 247-52. It is asserted merely that the loyalties of this group "were unknown and time was of the essence." Yet nearly four months elapsed after Pearl Harbor before the first exclusion order was issued; nearly eight months went by until the last order was issued; and the last of these "subversive" persons was not actually removed until almost eleven months had elapsed. Leisure and deliberation seem to have been more of the essence than speed. And the fact that conditions were not such as to warrant a declaration of martial law adds strength to the belief that the factors of time and military necessity were not as urgent as they have been represented to be. * * *

I dissent, therefore, from this legalization of racism. Racial discrimination in any form and in any degree has no justifiable part whatever in our democratic way of life. It is unattractive in any setting but it is utterly revolting among a free people who have embraced the principles set forth in the Constitution of the United States. All residents of this nation are kin in some way by blood or culture to a foreign land. Yet they are primarily and necessarily a part of the new and distinct civilization of the United States. They must accordingly be treated at all times as the heirs of the American experiment and as entitled to all the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, dissenting. * * *

Now, if any fundamental assumption underlies our system, it is that guilt is personal and not inheritable. Even if all one's antecedents had been convicted of treason, the Constitution forbids its penalties to be visited upon him, for it provides that "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted." But here is an attempt to make an otherwise innocent act a crime merely because this prisoner is the son of parents as to whom he had no choice, and belongs to a race from which there is no way to resign. If Congress in peace-time legislation should enact such a criminal law, I should suppose this Court would refuse to enforce it. * * *

Much is said of the danger to liberty from the Army program for deporting and detaining these citizens of Japanese extraction. But a judicial construction of the due process clause that will sustain this order is a far more subtle blow to liberty than the promulgation of the order itself. A military order, however unconstitutional, is not apt to last longer than the military emergency. Even during that period a succeeding commander may revoke it all. But once a judicial opinion rationalizes such an order to show that it conforms to the Constitution, or rather rationalizes the Constitution to show that the Constitution sanctions such an order, the Court for all time has validated the principle of racial discrimination in criminal procedure and of transplanting American citizens. The principle then lies about like a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need. Every repetition imbeds that principle more deeply in our law and thinking and expands it to new purposes. All who observe the work of courts are familiar with what Judge Cardozo described as "the tendency of a principle to expand itself to the limit of its logic." A military commander may overstep the bounds of constitutionality, and it is an incident. But if we review and approve, that passing incident becomes the doctrine of the Constitution. There it has a generative power of its own, and all that it creates will be in its own image. Nothing better illustrates this danger than does the Court's opinion in this case. * * *

I should hold that a civil court cannot be made to enforce an order which violates constitutional limitations even if it is a reasonable exercise of military authority. The courts can exercise only the judicial power, can apply only law, and must abide by the Constitution, or they cease to be civil courts and become instruments of military policy.

Of course the existence of a military power resting on force, so vagrant, so centralized, so necessarily heedless of the individual, is an inherent threat to liberty. But I would not lead people to rely on this Court for a review that seems to me wholly delusive. The military reasonableness of these orders can only be determined by military superiors. If the people ever let command of the war power fall into irresponsible and unscrupulous hands, the courts wield no power equal to its restraint. The chief restraint upon those who command the physical forces of the country, in the future as in the past, must be their responsibility to the political judgments of their contemporaries and to the moral judgments of history. * * *

NOTES

1. Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, 89 L. ed. 243, 65 Sup. Ct. 208 (1944), decided the same day as the reported case, held that an American citizen of Japanese ancestry, conceded by the Department of Justice and by the War Relocation Authority to be loyal and law-abiding, could not be detained in a relocation center. Mr. Justice Douglas, for the court, said: "Loyalty is a matter of the heart and mind, not of race, creed or color. He who is loyal is by definition not a spy or a saboteur. When the power to detain is derived from the power to protect the war effort against espionage and sabotage, detention which has no relationship to that objective is unauthorized."

2. The Alien Enemy Act of 1798 confers upon the President broad powers of apprehension, restraint and removal of enemy aliens whenever there is a "declared war" between this country and any foreign nation. Petitioner, a German enemy alien, was arrested December 8, 1941, and interned after a hearing before the Alien Enemy Hearing Board in February, 1942. By executive order in July, 1945, the President directed the removal of all enemy aliens "deemed dangerous to the public peace and safety" by the Attorney-General. In January, 1946, the Attorney-General ordered petitioner's removal. In Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U. S. 160, 92 L. ed. 1881, 68 Sup. Ct. 1429 (1948) the Supreme Court sustained denial of petitioner's writ of habeas corpus. The removal order was held not subject to judicial review. Petitioner's claim that Presidential summary power under the Act did not survive the cessation of actual hostilities was also dismissed on the ground that, under existing post-war conditions, the war could not be considered as terminated, and that in any event the question was one to be decided by the political arm of the government, not the courts. Justices Black, Douglas, Murphy and Rutledge dissented on the ground that, as regards the deportability of alien enemies, the war should be considered as terminated. Justices Douglas, Murphy and Rutledge dissented on the ground that, for purposes of review on habeas corpus, the deportation of an enemy alien is no different from that of any other deportation proceeding and is subject to the same due process requirements of reasonable notice and fair hearing.

3. In Kawakita v. United States, 343 U. S. 717, 96 L. ed. 1249, 72 Sup. Ct. 950 (1952) the Supreme Court upheld the treason conviction of defendant, a national both of the United States and of Japan, the overt acts relating to his treatment of American prisoners of war. The important issue in the case was whether defendant had renounced his United States citizenship and became expatriated by reason of acts committed in Japan during the war. He was born in this country of Japanese parents who were citizens of Japan. In 1939 he went to Japan with his father, traveling on a United States passport. In 1940 he registered with an American consul in Japan as an American citizen. Remaining in Japan, he entered Meiji University in March, 1941, taking a commercial course and military training. In April, 1941, he renewed his United States passport, once more taking the oath of allegiance. During this period he was registered as an alien with the Japanese police. Defendant became of age in 1942 and completed his schooling in 1943, at which time it was impossible for him to return to the United States. In 1943 he registered in the Koseki, a family census register. He did not join the Japanese Army but obtained employment as an interpreter. He interpreted communications between the Japanese and prisoners of war who were assigned to work at the mine and in the munitions factory of his employer. The treasonable acts for which he was convicted involved his cruel conduct toward American prisoners of war. In December, 1945, he went to the United States consul at Yokohama and applied for registration as an American citizen. He stated under oath that he was a United States citizen and had not done various acts amounting to expatriation. He was issued a passport and returned to the United States, where he was recognized by a former prisoner of war and arrested, charged with treason.

On this set of facts, Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking for a majority of the court, said that the evidence was sufficient to sustain (1) a finding that the accused had not renounced his American citizenship, and (2) a finding of adhering to the enemy during the war. "The issue of intent to betray, like the citizenship issue, was plainly one for the jury to decide. We would have to reject all the evidence adverse to petitioner and accept as the truth his protestations when the shadow of the hangman's noose was on him in order to save him from the finding that he did have the intent to betray." Chief Justice Vinson, joined by Justices Black and Burton, dissented on the ground that defendant had expatriated himself, as a matter of law, as well as that can be done.

Other recent prosecutions for treason include Cramer v. United States, 325 U. S. 1, 89 L. ed. 1441, 65 Sup. Ct. 918 (1945); Haupt v. United States, 330 U. S. 631, 91 L. ed. 1145, 67 Sup. Ct. 874 (1947); Best v. United States, 184 F. (2d) 131 (C. A. 1, 1950), cert. den. 340 U. S. 939 (1951); D'Aquino v. United States, 192 F. (2d) 338 (C. A. 9, 1951), cert. den. 343 U. S. 935 (1952). See, also, Hurst, Treason in the United States, 58 Harv. L. Rev. 226, 395, 806 (1945).

4. In Hartzel v. United States, 322 U. S. 680, 88 L. ed. 1534, 64 Sup. Ct. 1233 (1944) the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of defendant for violation of the Espionage Act of 1917 on the ground of insufficiency of evidence. Defendant had published three scurrilous articles opposing World War II as a betrayal of the country, denouncing the allies of the United States, appealing to various forms of racial prejudice and assailing the integrity and patriotism of the President. In a five-to-four decision the court concluded that there was nothing on the face of the pamphlets to indicate that defendant had intended specifically to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny or refusal of duty in the military forces or to obstruct recruiting and enlistment therein. The dissemination of such doctrines "cannot by themselves be taken as proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the petitioner had the narrow intent requisite to a violation of this statute."

WOODS v. MILLER CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1948.

The case is here on a direct appeal, Act of Aug. 24, 1937, 50 Stat. 751, 752, c. 754, 28 U. S. C. § 349(a), 8 F. C. A. title 28, § 349(a), from a judgment of the District Court holding unconstitutional Title II of the Housing and Rent Act of [June 30] 1947. Pub. Law 129, 80th Cong. 1st Sess. 5 U. S. C. § 1001, F. C. A. 50 Appx. §§ 1891-1902.

The Act became effective on July 1, 1947, and the following day the appellee demanded of its tenants increases of 40% and 60% for rental accommodations in the Cleveland Defense-Rental Area, an admitted violation of the Act and regulations adopted pursuant thereto. Appellant thereupon instituted this proceeding under § 206(b) of the Act to enjoin the violations. A preliminary injunction issued. After a hearing it was dissolved and a permanent injunction denied.

The District Court was of the view that the authority of Congress to regulate rents by virtue of the war power (see Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U. S. 503) ended with the Presidential Proclamation terminating hostilities on December 31, 1946, since that proclamation inaugurated "peace-in-fact" though it did not mark termination of the war. It also concluded that, even if the war power continues, Congress did not act under it because it did not say so, and only if Congress says so, or enacts provisions so implying, can it be held that Congress intended to exercise such power. That Congress did not so intend, said the District Court, follows from the provision that the Housing Expediter can end controls in any area without regard to the official termination of the war, and from the fact that the preceding federal rent control laws (which were concededly exercises of the war power) were neither amended nor extended. The District Court expressed the further view that rent control is not within the war power because "the emergency created by housing shortage came into existence long before the war." It held that the Act "lacks in uniformity of application and distinctly constitutes a delegation of legislative power not within the grant of Congress" because of the authorization to the Housing Expediter to lift controls in any area before the Act's expiration. It also held that the Act in effect provides "low rentals for certain groups without taking the property or compensating the owner in any way." See 74 F. Supp. 546.

We conclude, in the first place, that the war power sustains this legislation. The Court said in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U. S. 146, 161, that the war power includes the power "to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress" and continues for the duration of that emergency. Whatever may be the consequences when war is officially terminated, the war power does not necessarily end with the cessation of hostilities. We recently held that it is adequate to support the preservation of rights created by wartime legislation. Fleming v. Mohawk Wrecking & Lumber Co., 331 U. S. 111. But it has a broader sweep. In Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., supra, and Jacob Ruppert, Inc. v. Caffey, 251 U. S. 264, prohibition laws which were enacted after the Armistice in World War I were sustained as exercises of the war power because they conserved manpower and increased efficiency of production in the critical days during the period of demobilization, and helped to husband the supply of grains and cereals depleted by the war effort. Those cases followed the reasoning of Stewart v. Kahn (Stewart v. Bloom), 11 Wall. 493, which held that Congress had the power to toll the statute of limitations of the States during the period when the process of their courts was not available to litigants due to the conditions obtaining in the Civil War.

The constitutional validity of the present legislation follows a fortiori from those cases. The legislative history of the present Act makes abundantly clear that there has not yet been eliminated the deficit in housing which in considerable measure was caused by the heavy demobilization of veterans and by the cessation or reduction in residential construction during the period of hostilities due to the allocation of building materials to military projects. Since the war effort contributed heavily to that deficit, Congress has the power even after the cessation of hostilities to act to control the forces that a short supply of the needed article created. If that were not true, the Necessary and Proper Clause, Art. 1, § 8, cl. 18, would be drastically limited in its application to the several war powers. The Court has declined to follow that course in the past. Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. supra; Jacob Rupert, Inc., v. Caffey, supra. We decline to take it today. The result would be paralyzing. It would render Congress powerless to remedy conditions the creation of which necessarily followed from the mobilization of men and materials for successful prosecution of the war. So to read the Constitution would be to make it self-defeating.

We recognize the force of the argument that the effects of war under modern conditions may be felt in the economy for years and years, and that if the war power can be used in days of peace to treat all the wounds which war inflicts on our society, it may not only swallow up all other powers of Congress but largely obliterate the Ninth and the Tenth Amendments as well. There are no such implications in today's decision. We deal here with the consequences of a housing deficit greatly intensified during the period of hostilities by the war effort. Any power, of course can be abused. But we cannot assume that Congress is not alert to its constitutional responsibilities. And the question whether the war power has been properly employed in cases such as this is open to judicial inquiry. Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U. S. 146, and Jacob Rupert, Inc. v. Caffey, 251 U. S. 264, both supra.

The question of the constitutionality of action taken by Congress does not depend on recitals of the power which it undertakes to exercise. Here it is plain from the legislative history that Congress was invoking its war power to cope with a current condition of which the war was a direct and immediate cause. Its judgment on that score is entitled to the respect granted like legislation enacted pursuant to the police power. * * *

Under the present Act the Housing Expediter is authorized to remove the rent controls in any defense-rental area if in his judgment the need no longer exists by reason of new construction or satisfaction of demand in other ways. The powers thus delegated are far less extensive than those sustained in Bowles v. Willingham, supra. Nor is there here a grant of unbridled administrative discretion. The standards prescribed pass muster under our decisions. See Bowles v. Willingham, supra, and cases cited. * * *

The fact that the property regulated suffers a decrease in value is no more fatal to the exercise of the war power (Bowles v. Willingham, supra) than it is where the police power is invoked to the same end. See Block v. Hirsh, 256 U. S. 135. Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER concurs in this opinion because it decides no more than was decided in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U. S. 146, and Jacob Ruppert, Inc. v. Caffey, 251 U. S. 264, and merely applies those decisions to the situation now before the Court.

[MR. JUSTICE JACKSON wrote a concurring opinion which is omitted.]

NOTES

1. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 gave the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration broad authority to fix maximum prices on most commodities and on residential rents. The Act created a special Emergency Court of Appeals to pass upon the validity of OPA regulations. In Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 88 L. ed. 834, 64 Sup. Ct. 660 (1944) the price-fixing provisions of the statute were held valid, while in Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U. S. 503, 88 L. ed. 892, 64 Sup. Ct. 641 (1944) the rent-control sections of the act were upheld.

2. The validity of the Renegotiation Act of 1942 was sustained as an exercise of the war power in Lichter v. United States, 334 U. S. 742, 92 L. ed. 1694, 68 Sup. Ct. 1294 (1948). This legislation, which provided for the recapture by the United States of "excessive profits" on war contracts, was based on the theory that government procurement during the war proceeded with such speed and such quantity that it was impossible to determine in advance what fair prices would be. Thus some contracts were to be subject to "renegotiation" in the light of subsequent experience to determine fair prices. The statute was upheld as against contentions that it constituted an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, involved an unlawful taking of private property for public use, and could not properly be applied to contracts entered into before its enactment.

3. The treaty-making power of the national government and the conduct of foreign relations have been dealt with previously in Chapter II of this casebook. The powers to acquire and govern territory and to legislate for the District of Columbia were discussed in Chapter III. The power over aliens and the control of the naturalization process have been considered in Chapter IV. The power over elections and the enforcement of the suffrage guaranty of the Constitution are covered in Chapter IX. The commerce power of Congress is taken up in detail in the next chapter.

Limitations of space have prevented the inclusion of cases dealing with other important powers of the national government such as the bankruptcy power (Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 4), the postal power (Art. I, § 8, cl. 7), those relating to admiralty and maritime matters (Art. III, § 2, cl. 1), and those dealing with patents and copyrights (Art. I, § 8, cl. 8).

CHAPTER VI
THE REGULATION OF COMMERCE

Section 1.—What is Commerce—Interstate and Foreign?

GIBBONS v. OGDEN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1824.
9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23.

[Ogden filed a bill in the Court of Chancery of New York, setting forth that Livingston and Fulton had been granted by the legislature of New York a monopoly of navigating by fire or steam all the waters within the jurisdiction of that state; that he, Ogden, had acquired by assignment from them the privilege of operating vessels by fire or steam between Elizabethtown, New Jersey, and New York City; that defendant, Gibbons, was operating two steamboats between Elizabethtown and New York City, in violation of the monopoly, and prayed that defendant be enjoined. The defendant answered that his vessels were enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade under an act of Congress of February 18, 1793. The Chancellor granted a permanent injunction; his decree was affirmed by the Court for the Trial of Impeachments and Errors of New York, and this writ of error was taken.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellant contends that this decree is erroneous, because the laws which purport to give the exclusive privilege it sustains are repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States. * * * The words are: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." The subject to be regulated is commerce; and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration, and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more,—it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals, in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter.

If commerce does not include navigation, the government of the Union has no direct power over that subject, and can make no law prescribing what shall constitute American vessels, or requiring that they shall be navigated by American seamen. Yet this power has been exercised from the commencement of the government, has been exercised with the consent of all, and has been understood by all to be a commercial regulation. All America understands, and has uniformly understood, the word "commerce" to comprehend navigation. It was so understood, and must have been so understood, when the Constitution was framed. The power over commerce, including navigation, was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their government, and must have been contemplated in forming it. The convention must have used the word in that sense, because all have understood it in that sense; and the attempt to restrict it comes too late.

If the opinion that "commerce," as the word is used in the Constitution, comprehends navigation also, requires any additional confirmation, that additional confirmation is, we think, furnished by the words of the instrument itself. It is a rule of construction acknowledged by all, that the exceptions from a power mark its extent; for it would be absurd, as well as useless, to except from a granted power that which was not granted,—that which the words of the grant could not comprehend. If, then, there are in the Constitution plain exceptions from the power over navigation, plain inhibitions to the exercise of that power in a particular way, it is a proof that those who made these exceptions, and prescribed these inhibitions, understood the power to which they applied as being granted.

The 9th section of the 1st article declares that "no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one state over those of another." This clause cannot be understood as applicable to those laws only which are passed for the purposes of revenue, because it is expressly applied to commercial regulations; and the most obvious preference which can be given to one port over another, in regulating commerce, relates to navigation. But the subsequent part of the sentence is still more explicit. It is, "nor shall vessels bound to or from one state, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another." These words have a direct reference to navigation.

The universally acknowledged power of the government to impose embargoes must also be considered as showing that all America is united in that construction which comprehends navigation in the word "commerce." * * *

The word used in the Constitution, then, comprehends, and has been always understood to comprehend, navigation within its meaning; and a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word "commerce."

To what commerce does this power extend? The Constitution informs us, to commerce "with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. If this be the admitted meaning of the word, in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence, and remain a unit, unless there be some plain intelligible cause which alters it.

The subject to which the power is next applied is to commerce "among the several states." The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the states cannot stop at the external boundary-line of each state, but may be introduced into the interior. It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a state, or between different parts of the same state, and which does not extend to or affect other states. Such a power would be inconvenient and is certainly unnecessary.

Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more states than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a state, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended would not have been made had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be exclusively internal commerce of a state. The genius and character of the whole government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the states generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular state, which do not affect other states, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the government. The completely internal commerce of a state, then, may be considered as reserved for the state itself.

But, in regulating commerce with foreign nations, the power of Congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several states. It would be a very useless power if it could not pass those lines. The commerce of the United States with foreign nations is that of the whole United States. Every district has a right to participate in it. The deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction pass through the interior of almost every state in the Union, and furnish the means of exercising this right. If Congress has the power to regulate it, that power must be exercised whenever the subject exists. If it exists within the states, if a foreign voyage may commence or terminate at a port within a state, then the power of Congress may be exercised within a state.

This principle is, if possible, still more clear when applied to commerce "among the several states." They either join each other, in which case they are separated by a mathematical line, or they are remote from each other, in which case other states lie between them. What is commerce "among" them; and how is it to be conducted? Can a trading expedition between two adjoining states commence and terminate outside of each? And if the trading intercourse be between two states remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? Commerce among the states must, of necessity, be commerce with the states. In the regulation of trade with the Indian tribes, the action of the law, especially when the Constitution was made, was chiefly within a state. The power of Congress, then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several states. The sense of the nation on this subject is unequivocally manifested by the provisions made in the laws for transporting goods by land between Baltimore and Providence, between New York and Philadelphia, and between Philadelphia and Baltimore.

We are now arrived at the inquiry, What is this power? It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case, or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. * * * The power of Congress, then, comprehends navigation within the limits of every state in the Union, so far as that navigation may be, in any manner, connected with "commerce with foreign nations, or among the several states, or with the Indian tribes." It may, of consequence, pass the jurisdictional line of New York, and act upon the very waters to which the prohibition now under consideration applies.

But it has been urged with great earnestness that, although the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, be coextensive with the subject itself, and have no other limits than are prescribed in the Constitution, yet the states may severerally exercise the same power within their respective jurisdictions. In support of this argument, it is said that they possessed it as an inseparable attribute of sovereignty before the formation of the Constitution, and still retain it, except so far as they have surrendered it by that instrument; that this principle results from the nature of the government, and is secured by the Tenth Amendment; that an affirmative grant of power is not exclusive, unless in its own nature it be such that the continued exercise of it by the former possessor is inconsistent with the grant, and that this is not of that description. The appellant, conceding these postulates, except the last, contends that full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum; that a grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. Both parties have appealed to the Constitution, to legislative acts, and judicial decisions; and have drawn arguments from all these sources to support and illustrate the propositions they respectively maintain.

The grant of the power to lay and collect taxes is, like the power to regulate commerce, made in general terms, and has never been understood to interfere with the exercise of the same power by the states; and hence has been drawn an argument which has been applied to the question under consideration. But the two grants are not, it is conceived, similar in their terms or their nature. Although many of the powers formerly exercised by the states are transferred to the government of the Union, yet the state governments remain, and constitute a most important part of our system. The power of taxation is indispensable to their existence, and is a power which, in its own nature, is capable of residing in, and being exercised by, different authorities at the same time. We are accustomed to see it placed, for different purposes in different hands. Taxation is the simple operation of taking small portions from a perpetually accumulating mass, susceptible of almost infinite division; and a power in one to take what is necessary for certain purposes, is not in its nature incompatible with a power in another to take what is necessary for other purposes. Congress is authorized to lay and collect taxes, etc., to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. This does not interfere with the power of the states to tax for the support of their own governments; nor is the exercise of that power by the states an exercise of any portion of the power that is granted to the United States. In imposing taxes for state purposes, they are not doing what Congress is empowered to do. Congress is not empowered to tax for those purposes which are within the exclusive province of the states. When, then, each government exercises the power of taxation, neither is exercising the power of the other. But when a state proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the several states, it is exercising the very power that is granted to Congress, and is doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do. There is no analogy, then, between the power of taxation and the power of regulating commerce.

In discussing the question whether this power is still in the states, in the case under consideration, we may dismiss from it the inquiry, whether it is surrendered by the mere grant to Congress, or is retained until Congress shall exercise the power. We may dismiss that inquiry because it has been exercised, and the regulations which Congress deemed it proper to make are now in full operation. The sole question is, can a state regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states while Congress is regulating it? * * *

But the inspection laws are said to be regulations of commerce, and are certainly recognized in the Constitution as being passed in the exercise of a power remaining with the states. That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce, will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived, cannot be admitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country, to fit them for exportation, or it may be for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the states, and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a state not surrendered to a general government; all which can be most advantageously exercised by the states themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a state, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts of this mass.

No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to state legislation. If the legislative power of the Union can reach them it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose, or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given. It is obvious that the government of the Union, in the exercise of its express powers,—that, for example, of regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the states,—may use means that may also be employed by a state in the exercise of its acknowledged powers; that, for example, of regulating commerce within the state. If Congress license vessels to sail from one port to another in the same state, the act is supposed to be necessarily incidental to the power expressly granted to Congress, and implies no claim of a direct power to regulate the purely internal commerce of a state, or to act directly on its system of police. So if a state, in passing laws on subjects acknowledged to be within its control, and with a view to those subjects, shall adopt a measure of the same character with one which Congress may adopt, it does not derive its authority from the particular power which has been granted, but from some other which remains with the state, and may be executed by the same means.

All experience shows that the same measures, or measures scarcely distinguishable from each other, may flow from distinct powers; but this does not prove that the powers themselves are identical. Although the means used in their execution may sometimes approach each other so nearly as to be confounded, there are other situations in which they are sufficiently distinct to establish their individuality.

In our complex system, presenting the rare and difficult scheme of one general government whose action extends over the whole, but which possesses only certain enumerated powers; and of numerous state governments, which retain and exercise all powers not delegated to the Union, contests respecting power must arise. Were it even otherwise, the measures taken by the respective governments to execute their acknowledged powers would often be of the same description, and might sometimes interfere. This, however, does not prove that the one is exercising, or has a right to exercise the powers of the other. * * *

It has been contended by the counsel for the appellant that, as the word to "regulate" implies in its nature full power over the thing to be regulated, it excludes, necessarily, the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing. That regulation is designed for the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they were, as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched, as that on which it has operated. There is great force in this argument, and the court is not satisfied that it has been refuted. * * *

It has been said that the Constitution does not confer the right of intercourse between state and state. That right derives its source from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world. This is true. The Constitution found it an existing right, and gave to Congress the power to regulate it. In the exercise of this power, Congress has passed "An act for enrolling or licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same." The counsel for the respondent contend that this act does not give the right to sail from port to port, but confines itself to regulating a pre-existing right, so far only as to confer certain privileges on enrolled and licensed vessels in its exercise. It will at once occur that when a legislature attaches certain privileges and exemptions to the exercise of a right over which its control is absolute, the law must imply a power to exercise the right. The privileges are gone if the right itself be annihilated. * * *

The fourth section directs the proper officer to grant to a vessel qualified to receive it, "a license for carrying on the coasting trade;" and prescribes its form. * * * The word "license" means permission, or authority; and a license to do any particular thing is a permission or authority to do that thing; and if granted by a person having power to grant it, transfers to the grantee the right to do whatever it purports to authorize. It certainly transfers to him all the right which the grantor can transfer to do what is within the terms of the license. * * *

But if the license be a permit to carry on the coasting trade, the respondent denies that these boats were engaged in that trade, or that the decree under consideration has restrained them from prosecuting it. The boats of the appellant were, we are told, employed in the transportation of passengers, and this is no part of that commerce which Congress may regulate. If, as our whole course of legislation on this subject shows, the power of Congress has been universally understood in America to comprehend navigation, it is a very persuasive, if not a conclusive, argument to prove that the construction is correct; and if it be correct, no clear distinction is perceived between the power to regulate vessels employed in transporting men for hire, and property for hire. The subject is transferred to Congress, and no exception to the grant can be admitted which is not proved by the words or the nature of the thing. * * *

Steam boats may be enrolled and licensed, in common with vessels using sails, * * * and the act of a state inhibiting the use of either to any vessel having the license under the act of Congress comes, we think, in direct collision with that act. Decree reversed.

[MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON concurred on the ground that the commerce clause vested in Congress the sole power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce and of its own force, without any action taken by Congress, wholly excluded the states from regulating such commerce. In his view the act of Congress licensing vessels for the coastwise trade had no bearing.]

NOTES

1. It is axiomatic that one of the principal sources of weakness of the Articles of Confederation as the basis for a federal system was the lack of power in the central government to regulate commerce among the several states and with foreign countries. Under the Articles, the imposition by some of the states of discriminatory restrictions and burdens on goods in transit through their territories frequently caused serious disputes. The primary means through which the founding fathers sought to deal with these admitted evils was to insert a clause in the Constitution (Art. I, § 8, cl. 3) vesting in Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states." This broad affirmative grant of the commerce power to the central government has been the source, from time to time, of acute conflicts among powerful competing commercial interests within the country and between the states and the nation.

The power delegated to Congress by the commerce clause has been construed to be plenary but not unlimited, supreme but not exclusive. While state laws in conflict with a valid regulation of commerce by Congress are void, the states in many situations may deal with matters of local concern in such a way as to exercise power over interstate commerce. The grant of the commerce power to Congress has thus given rise to two principal classes of problems: (1) What is the scope of the national legislative power under the commerce clause? How is it affected by other limitations imposed by the Constitution on the federal government? (2) What is the extent of the states' power to legislate under the commerce clause? When does the national power end and the power of the states begin? What matters, if any, may be the concurrent concern of both? The tremendous importance of the Supreme Court as the arbiter of the relations between the individual and government and between the states and the nation is strikingly exemplified by its decisions under the commerce clause.

2. In the period before the Civil War one of the basic and recurrent problems before the court was the extent to which business and commercial enterprise should be protected from legislative restriction by the individual states. For example, did the commerce clause of its own force impliedly prohibit state regulation of interstate commerce, or were the states free to regulate unless prevented by affirmative congressional action? It was the negative implications of the federal commerce power—the limitations it assertedly imposed upon the states by virtue of its mere existence—which mainly occupied the attention of the court during this formative period of constitutional development. This is not surprising in view of the fact that it was not until 1887, with the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act, that Congress made any substantial attempt to exercise its powers under the commerce clause to regulate the national economy.

The history of the adoption of the commerce clause by the Constitutional Convention afforded no conclusive support for the proposition that the framers intended it to confer an exclusive power of regulation on Congress. Chief Justice Marshall, although leaving the issue undecided in Gibbons v. Ogden, inclined to this view and thought that it was the function of the Supreme Court to prevent state interference with interstate commerce even in situations where Congress had not acted and hence no conflict between state and federal power was involved. But even Marshall shrank from the full implications of his philosophy in this regard. Five years after Gibbons v. Ogden, in Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412 (1829), in the absence of any legislation by Congress on the matter, a state was permitted to dam a navigable river. The court, speaking through Marshall, reasoned that the Delaware statute authorizing the construction of the dam could not, "under all the circumstances of the case, be considered as repugnant to the power to regulate commerce in its dormant state, or as being in conflict with any law passed on the subject." Noting that the state's objectives were the improvement of the health of the inhabitants and the enhancement of property values, Marshall concluded: "Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the general government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the states." In thus recognizing the reserved power of the states, in the absence of legislation by Congress, to deal with some matters primarily of local concern, Marshall apparently did not view such action as involving state regulation of interstate commerce.

The point to be noted here is that the doctrine of the exclusive nature of the federal power over interstate commerce, to the extent that it held sway in the decisions of the court, did not operate to enhance the exercise of national power but to invalidate attempted regulation by the states and thus to leave the commercial interests involved subject to no governmental control at all.

3. Gibbons v. Ogden has been characterized as one of Chief Justice Marshall's greatest and most decisive opinions. For an excellent short discussion see Haines, The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789-1835 (1944), 488 et seq. See also, for historical background, 2 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1923), ch. 15; 4 Beveridge, The Life of John Marshall (1919), ch. 8. On the history of the commerce clause prior to Gibbons v. Ogden, see the studies of Abel, Commerce Regulation Before Gibbons v. Ogden: Interstate Transportation Facilities, 25 N. Car. L. Rev. 121 (1947); Commerce Regulation Before Gibbons v. Ogden: Interstate Transportation Enterprise, 18 Miss. L. J. 335 (1947); Commerce Regulation Before Gibbons v. Ogden: Trade and Traffic, 14 Brooklyn L. Rev. 38, 215 (1947-48). See also, Abel, The Commerce Clause in the Constitutional Convention and in Contemporary Comment, 25 Minn. L. Rev. 432 (1941). For a comprehensive presentation of the unorthodox thesis that the commerce clause, if its meaning were correctly interpreted, empowers Congress to govern "all gainful activity" throughout the country, and that the phrase "among the several states" was never intended to have the meaning "interstate," as invented and developed by the Supreme Court, see Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (2 vols. 1953).

4. For Chancellor Kent's opinion holding that the state regulation was enforceable until it came into actual conflict with the federal law, see Ogden v. Gibbons, 4 Johns. Ch. 150 (1818), affirmed by the Court of Errors, 17 Johns. 488 (1820). In Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 Johns. 507 (1812) Chancellor Kent had previously upheld the same monopoly.

5. The cases reprinted in this section and those summarized in the notes are illustrative of attempts by the Supreme Court to mark out a line between transactions which are included within the term "commerce" and those which are not, and transactions in commerce which are deemed to be "interstate" in character and those which are not. Needless to say, the court has not been altogether successful in drawing such lines and the cases are not entirely reconcilable. Sometimes, too, the court has employed the words "commerce" and "interstate commerce" interchangeably, using the former term as shorthand for the latter. Taken together, nevertheless, the cases comprise a serviceable introduction to the study of the paramount problems posed in the following sections relating to the scope of federal legislative power under the commerce clause and the limit of the states' power to enact laws which affect the conduct of interstate commerce. In reading the cases the student should bear in mind that the extent of congressional power to enact legislation under the commerce clause regulative of the national economy is no longer delimited by determining whether the transactions or activities involved are themselves commerce, or, if commerce, whether they are interstate or intrastate in nature. The test (as will more fully appear in the succeeding section) is whether the activities, even if confined to a single state, have such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that their regulation is essential to protect such commerce from burdens and obstructions. While the interstate element must be present to support legislative action by Congress, the sweep of its power to regulate is not curtailed by the fact that the activities sought to be controlled, when separately viewed, are purely local or intrastate.

For a short discussion of many of the cases reprinted in this section or summarized in the notes, see Carpenter and Mardian, What is Commerce? 22 So. Cal. L. Rev. 398 (1949), and When is Commerce Interstate? 22 So. Cal. L. Rev. 406 (1949).

UNITED STATES v. SIMPSON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920.

This is an indictment under § 5 of the Act of March 3, 1917, known as the Reed Amendment, 39 Stat. 1069, c. 162, which declares that—

"Whoever shall * * * cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce, except for scientific, sacramental, medicinal, and mechanical purposes, into any state * * * the laws of which * * * prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be punished," etc.

And the question for decision is whether the statute was applicable where the liquor—five quarts of whisky—was transported by its owner in his own automobile and was for his personal use and not for an excepted purpose. The District Court answered the question in the negative and on that ground sustained a demurrer to the third count, which is all that is here in question and discharged the accused. 257 Fed. 860.

We think the question should have been answered the other way. The evil against which the statute was directed was the introduction of intoxicating liquor into a prohibition state from another state for purposes other than those specially excepted—a matter which Congress could and the states could not control. Danciger v. Cooley, 248 U. S. 319, 323. The introduction could be effected only through transportation, and whether this took one form or another it was transportation in interstate commerce. Kelley v. Rhoads, 188 U. S. 1; United States v. Chavez, 228 U. S. 525, 532-533; United States v. Mesa, 228 U. S. 533; Pipe Line Cases, 234 U. S. 548, 560; United States v. Hill, 248 U. S. 420. The statute makes no distinction between different modes of transportation and we think it was intended to include them all, that being the natural import of its words. Had Congress intended to confine it to transportation by railroads and other common carriers it well may be assumed that other words appropriate to the expression of that intention would have been used. And it also may be assumed that Congress foresaw that if the statute were thus confined it could be so readily and extensively evaded by the use of automobiles, auto-trucks and other private vehicles that it would not be of much practical benefit. See Kirmeyer v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 568. At all events we perceive no reason for rejecting the natural import of its words and holding that it was confined to transportation for hire or by public carriers.

The published decisions show that a number of the federal courts have regarded the statute as embracing transportation by automobile, and have applied it in cases where the transportation was personal and private, as here. Ex parte Westbrook, 250 Fed. 636; Malcolm v. United States, 256 Fed. 363; Jones v. United States, 259 Fed. 104; Berryman v. United States, 259 Fed. 208.

That the liquor was intended for the personal use of the person transporting it is not material, so long as it was not for any of the purposes specially excepted. This was settled in United States v. Hill, supra.

We conclude that the District Court erred in construing the statute and sustaining the demurrer. Judgment reversed.

[Mr. JUSTICE CLARKE dissented.]

NOTES

1. In United States v. Hill, 248 U. S. 420, 63 L. ed. 337, 39 Sup. Ct. 143 (1919) it was held that the same statute applied to the case of a defendant who rode in a street car from Kentucky to West Virginia with a quart of intoxicating liquor on his person, which he had bought in Kentucky for his personal use. It had previously been decided that transportation of beer across a state boundary for sale is interstate commerce, though the beer is carried by the owner in his own wagon. Kirmeyer v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 568, 59 L. ed. 721, 35 Sup. Ct. 419 (1915).

2. The act of driving a stolen car constitutes commerce. In Brooks v. United States, 267 U. S. 432, 69 L. ed. 699, 45 Sup. Ct. 345, 37 A. L. R. 1407 (1925) the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act, making the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce a federal offense, was held constitutional.

3. Where the carriage is by independent carrier, for hire, the carriage is interstate commerce even though the purpose at the destination is not commercial. Caminetti v. United States, 242 U. S. 470, 61 L. ed. 442, 37 Sup. Ct. 192, L. R. A. 1917F, 502 (1917) (holding that the Mann White Slave Traffic Act applies to the transportation in interstate commerce of a woman for purposes of private immorality, with no commercial vice in the case.)

4. In Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 38 L. ed. 962, 14 Sup. Ct. 1087 (1894), holding that a single state has no power to regulate tolls upon a bridge connecting it with another state without the assent of Congress and the concurrence of such other state, the court said that "the thousands of people who daily pass and repass over this bridge may be as truly said to be engaged in commerce as if they were shipping cargoes of merchandise from New York to Liverpool."

5. The transmission of intelligence from state to state is interstate commerce regardless of the means through which it is effected. In International Text Book Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 54 L. ed. 678, 30 Sup. Ct. 481, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 493 (1910) it was held that the business of the International Correspondence Schools in transporting books, apparatus and papers to students in another state and in receiving papers and contracts from them in return constituted interstate commerce. The physical activities of radio broadcasting and the projection of motion pictures across state lines have been held to be interstate commerce. Fisher's Blend Station v. State Tax Commission, 297 U. S. 650, 80 L. ed. 956, 56 Sup. Ct. 608 (1936); Pantomimic Corporation v. Malone, 238 Fed. 135 (C. C. A. 2d 1916). By its nature broadcasting transcends state lines and is within the protection, and subject to the control, of the commerce clause. See Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U. S. 266, 77 L. ed. 1166, 53 Sup. Ct. 627, 89 A. L. R. 406 (1933), sustaining, as against due process objections, the Commission's broad powers over the allocation of wave lengths.

7. In Kelley v. Rhoads, 188 U. S. 1, 47 L. ed. 359, 23 Sup. Ct. 259 (1903) the driving of sheep across state lines was held to constitute interstate commerce. The same result was reached as regards cattle which were only ranging across state lines. Thornton v. United States, 271 U. S. 414, 70 L. ed. 1013, 46 Sup. Ct. 585 (1926).

8. Dealing in fraudulent interstate bills of lading in the absence of any commodities has been held to constitute interstate commerce. United States v. Ferger, 250 U. S. 199, 63 L. ed. 936, 39 Sup. Ct. 445 (1919). But in Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. 73, 12 L. ed. 992 (1850) a state tax on money and exchange brokers who dealt in the purchase and sale of foreign bills of exchange was sustained as not in conflict with the commerce power of Congress, the court saying that such persons are "not engaged in commerce, but in supplying an instrument of commerce."

UNITED STATES v. SOUTH-EASTERN UNDERWRITERS ASSN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1944.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

For seventy-five years this Court has held, whenever the question has been presented, that the Commerce Clause of the Constitution does not deprive the individual states of power to regulate and tax specific activities of foreign insurance companies which sell policies within their territories. Each state has been held to have this power even though negotiation and execution of the companies' policy contracts involved communications of information and movements of persons, moneys, and papers across state lines. Not one of all these cases, however, has involved an Act of Congress which required the Court to decide the issue of whether the Commerce Clause grants to Congress the power to regulate insurance transactions stretching across state lines. Today for the first time in the history of the Court that issue is squarely presented and must be decided.

Appellees—the South-Eastern Underwriters Association (S. E. U. A.), and its membership of nearly 200 private stock fire insurance companies, and 27 individuals—were indicted in the District Court for alleged violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The indictment alleges two conspiracies. The first, in violation of § 1 of the Act, was to restrain interstate trade and commerce by fixing and maintaining arbitrary and non-competitive premium rates on fire and specified "allied lines" of insurance in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia; the second, in violation of § 2, was to monopolize trade and commerce in the same lines of insurance in and among the same states. * * *

The kind of interference with the free play of competitive forces with which the appellees are charged is exactly the type of conduct which the Sherman Act has outlawed for American "trade or commerce" among the states. Appellees have not argued otherwise. Their defense, set forth in a demurrer, has been that they are not required to conform to the standards of business conduct established by the Sherman Act because "the business of fire insurance is not commerce."

Sustaining the demurrer, the District Court held that "the business of insurance is not commerce, either intrastate or interstate"; it "is not interstate commerce or interstate trade, though it might be considered a trade subject to local laws, either State or Federal, where the commerce clause is not the authority relied upon." 51 F. Supp. 712, 713, 714. * * *

The record, then, presents two questions and no others: (1) Was the Sherman Act intended to prohibit conduct of fire insurance companies which restrains or monopolizes the interstate fire insurance trade? (2) If so, do fire insurance transactions which stretch across state lines constitute "Commerce among the several States" so as to make them subject to regulation by Congress under the Commerce Clause? Since it is our conclusion that the Sherman Act was intended to apply to the fire insurance business we shall, for convenience of discussion, first consider the latter question.

Ordinarily courts do not construe words used in the Constitution so as to give them a meaning more narrow than one which they had in the common parlance of the times in which the Constitution was written. To hold that the word "commerce" as used in the Commerce Clause does not include a business such as insurance would do just that. Whatever other meanings "commerce" may have included in 1787, the dictionaries, encyclopedias, and other books of the period show that it included trade: business in which persons bought and sold, bargained and contracted. And this meaning has persisted to modern times. Surely, therefore, a heavy burden is on him who asserts that the plenary power which the Commerce Clause grants to Congress to regulate "Commerce among the several States" does not include the power to regulate trading in insurance to the same extent that it includes power to regulate other trades or businesses conducted across state lines.

The modern insurance business holds a commanding position in the trade and commerce of our Nation. Built upon the sale of contracts of indemnity, it has become one of the largest and most important branches of commerce. Its total assets exceed $37,000,000,000, or the approximate equivalent of the value of all farm lands and buildings in the United States. Its annual premium receipts exceed $6,000,000,000, more than the average annual revenue receipts of the United States Government during the last decade. Included in the labor force of insurance are 524,000 experienced workers, almost as many as seek their livings in coal mining or automobile manufacturing. Perhaps no modern commercial enterprise directly affects so many persons in all walks of life as does the insurance business. Insurance touches the home, the family, and the occupation or the business of almost every person in the United States.

This business is not separated into 48 distinct territorial compartments which function in isolation from each other. Interrelationship, interdependence, and integration of activities in all the states in which they operate are practical aspects of the insurance companies' methods of doing business. A large share of the insurance business is concentrated in a comparatively few companies located, for the most part, in the financial centers of the East. Premiums collected from policyholders in every part of the United States flow into these companies for investment. As policies become payable, checks and drafts flow back to the many states where the policyholders reside. The result is a continuous and indivisible stream of intercourse among the states composed of collections of premiums, payments of policy obligations, and the countless documents and communications which are essential to the negotiation and execution of policy contracts. Individual policyholders living in many different states who own policies in a single company have their separate interests blended in one assembled fund of assets upon which all are equally dependent for payment of their policies. The decisions which that company makes at its home office—the risks it insures, the premiums it charges, the investments it makes, the losses it pays—concern not just the people of the state where the home office happens to be located. They concern people living far beyond the boundaries of that state.

That the fire insurance transactions alleged to have been restrained and monopolized by appellees fit the above described pattern of the national insurance trade is shown by the indictment before us. Of the nearly 200 combining companies, chartered in various states and foreign countries, only 18 maintained their home offices in one of the six states in which the S. E. U. A. operated; and 127 had headquarters in either New York, Pennsylvania, or Connecticut. During the period 1931-1941 a total of $488,000,000 in premiums was collected by local agents in the six states, most of which was transmitted to home offices in other states; while during the same period $215,000,000 in losses was paid by checks or drafts sent from the home offices to the companies' local agents for delivery to the policyholders. Local agents solicited prospects, utilized policy forms sent from home offices, and made regular reports to their companies by mail, telephone or telegraph. Special traveling agents supervised local operations. The insurance sold by members of S. E. U. A. covered not only all kinds of fixed local properties, but also such properties as steamboats, tugs, ferries, shipyards, warehouses, terminals, trucks, busses, railroad equipment and rolling stock, and movable goods of all types carried in interstate and foreign commerce by every media of transportation.

Despite all of this, despite the fact that most persons, speaking from common knowledge, would instantly say that of course such a business is engaged in trade and commerce, the District Court felt compelled by decisions of this Court to conclude that the insurance business can never be trade or commerce within the meaning of the Commerce Clause. We must therefore consider these decisions.

In 1869 this Court held, in sustaining a statute of Virginia which regulated foreign insurance companies, that the statute did not offend the Commerce Clause because "issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce." Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 183. Since then, in similar cases, this statement has been repeated, and has been broadened. In Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 654, 655, decided in 1895, the Paul statement was reaffirmed, and the Court added that, "The business of insurance is not commerce." In 1913 the New York Life Insurance Company, protesting against a Montana tax, challenged these broad statements, strongly urging that its business, at least, was so conducted as to be engaged in interstate commerce. But the Court again approved the Paul statement and held against the company, saying that "contracts of insurance are not commerce at all, neither state nor interstate." New York Life Ins. Co. v. Deer Lodge County, 231 U. S. 495, 503-504, 510.

In all cases in which the Court has relied upon the proposition that "the business of insurance is not commerce," its attention was focused on the validity of state statutes—the extent to which the Commerce Clause automatically deprived states of the power to regulate the insurance business. Since Congress had at no time attempted to control the insurance business, invalidation of the state statutes would practically have been equivalent to granting insurance companies engaged in interstate activities a blanket license to operate without legal restraint. As early as 1866 the insurance trade, though still in its infancy, was subject to widespread abuses. To meet the imperative need for correction of these abuses the various state legislatures, including that of Virginia, passed regulatory legislation. Paul v. Virginia upheld one of Virginia's statutes. To uphold insurance laws of other states, including tax laws, Paul v. Virginia's generalization and reasoning have been consistently adhered to.

Today, however, we are asked to apply this reasoning, not to uphold another state law, but to strike down an Act of Congress which was intended to regulate certain aspects of the methods by which interstate insurance companies do business; and, in so doing, to narrow the scope of the federal power to regulate the activities of a great business carried on back and forth across state lines. But past decisions of this Court emphasize that legal formulae devised to uphold state power cannot uncritically be accepted as trustworthy guides to determine Congressional power under the Commerce Clause. Furthermore, the reasons given in support of the generalization that "the business of insurance is not commerce" and can never be conducted so as to constitute "Commerce among the States" are inconsistent with many decisions of this Court which have upheld federal statutes regulating interstate commerce under the Commerce Clause.

One reason advanced for the rule in the Paul case has been that insurance policies "are not commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one State to another." But both before and since Paul v. Virginia this Court has held that Congress can regulate traffic though it consist of intangibles. Another reason much stressed has been that insurance policies are mere personal contracts subject to the laws of the state where executed. But this reason rests upon a distinction between what has been called "local" and what "interstate," a type of mechanical criterion which this Court has not deemed controlling in the measurement of federal power. Cf. Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U. S. 111, 119-120; Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341, 360. We may grant that a contract of insurance, considered as a thing apart from negotiation and execution, does not itself constitute interstate commerce. Cf. Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 557-558. But it does not follow from this that the Court is powerless to examine the entire transaction, of which that contract is but a part, in order to determine whether there may be a chain of events which becomes interstate commerce. Only by treating the Congressional power over commerce among the states as a "technical legal conception" rather than as a "practical one, drawn from the course of business" could such a conclusion be reached. Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 398. In short, a nationwide business is not deprived of its interstate character merely because it is built upon sales contracts which are local in nature. Were the rule otherwise, few businesses could be said to be engaged in interstate commerce.

Another reason advanced to support the result of the cases which follow Paul v. Virginia has been that, if any aspects of the business of insurance be treated as interstate commerce, "then all control over it is taken from the States and the legislative regulations which this Court has heretofore sustained must be declared invalid." Accepted without qualification, that broad statement is inconsistent with many decisions of this Court. It is settled that, for Constitutional purposes, certain activities of a business may be intrastate and therefore subject to state control, while other activities of the same business may be interstate and therefore subject to federal regulation. And there is a wide range of business and other activities which, though subject to federal regulation, are so intimately related to local welfare that, in the absence of Congressional action, they may be regulated or taxed by the states. In marking out these activities the primary test applied by the Court is not the mechanical one of whether the particular activity affected by the state regulation is part of interstate commerce, but rather whether, in each case, the competing demands of the state and national interests involved can be accommodated. And the fact that particular phases of an interstate business or activity have long been regulated or taxed by states has been recognized as a strong reason why, in the continued absence of conflicting Congressional action, the state regulatory and tax laws should be declared valid.

The real answer to the question before us is to be found in the Commerce Clause itself and in some of the great cases which interpret it.

Many decisions make vivid the broad and true meaning of that clause. It is interstate commerce subject to regulation by Congress to carry lottery tickets from state to state. Lottery Case, 188 U. S. 321, 355. So also is it interstate commerce to transport a woman from Louisiana to Texas in a common carrier, Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 320-323; to carry across a state line in a private automobile five quarts of whiskey intended for personal consumption, United States v. Simpson, 252 U. S. 465; to drive a stolen automobile from Iowa to South Dakota, Brooks v. United States, 267 U. S. 432, 436-439. Diseased cattle ranging between Georgia and Florida are in commerce, Thorn-ton v. United States, 271 U. S. 414, 425; and the transmission of an electrical impulse over a telegraph line between Alabama and Florida is intercourse and subject to paramount federal regulation, Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 96 U. S. 1, 11. Not only, then, may transactions be commerce though non-commercial; they may be commerce though illegal and sporadic, and though they do not utilize common carriers or concern the flow of anything more tangible than electrons and information. These activities having already been held to constitute interstate commerce, and persons engaged in them therefore having been held subject to federal regulation, it would indeed be difficult now to hold that no activities of any insurance company can ever constitute interstate commerce so as to make it subject to such regulation;—activities which, as part of the conduct of a legitimate and useful commercial enterprise, may embrace integrated operations in many states and involve the transmission of great quantities of money, documents, and communications across dozens of state lines.

The precise boundary between national and state power over commerce has never yet been, and doubtless never can be, delineated by a single abstract definition. The most widely accepted general description of that part of commerce which is subject to the federal power is that given in 1824 by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 189-190: "Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches. * * *" Commerce is interstate, he said, when it "concerns more States than one." Id., 194. No decision of this Court has ever questioned this as too comprehensive a description of the subject matter of the Commerce Clause. To accept a description less comprehensive, the Court has recognized, would deprive the Congress of that full power necessary to enable it to discharge its Constitutional duty to govern commerce among the states.

The power confined to Congress by the Commerce Clause is declared in The Federalist to be for the purpose of securing the "maintenance of harmony and proper intercourse among the States." But its purpose is not confined to empowering Congress with the negative authority to legislate against state regulations of commerce deemed inimical to the national interest. The power granted Congress is a positive power. It is the power to legislate concerning transactions which, reaching across state boundaries, affect the people of more states than one;—to govern affairs which the individual states, with their limited territorial jurisdictions, are not fully capable of governing. This federal power to determine the rules of intercourse across state lines was essential to weld a loose confederacy into a single, indivisible Nation; its continued existence is equally essential to the welfare of that Nation.

Our basic responsibility in interpreting the Commerce Clause is to make certain that the power to govern intercourse among the states remains where the Constitution placed it. That power, as held by this Court from the beginning, is vested in the Congress, available to be exercised for the national welfare as Congress shall deem necessary. No commercial enterprise of any kind which conducts its activities across state lines has been held to be wholly beyond the regulatory power of Congress under the Commerce Clause. We cannot make an exception of the business of insurance.

We come then to the contention, earnestly pressed upon us by appellees, that Congress did not intend in the Sherman Act to exercise its power over the interstate insurance trade. * * *

[The Court considered and rejected this contention in the portion of the opinion omitted here.]

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS and MR. JUSTICE REED took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

[MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE and JUSTICES FRANKFURTER and JACKSON dissented on the question of statutory construction.]

NOTES

1. Following the decision in the principal case, in order to set at rest doubts as to the continued validity of state laws regulating insurance companies, Congress enacted the Ferguson-McCarran Act of 1945, declaring that "the continued regulation and taxation by the several states of the business of insurance is in the public interest, and that silence on the part of the Congress shall not be construed to impose any barrier to the regulation or taxation of such business by the several states" and providing that: "The business of insurance, and every person engaged therein, shall be subject to the laws of the several states which relate to the regulation or taxation of such business."

In Prudential Insurance Co. v. Benjamin, 328 U. S. 408, 90 L. ed. 1342, 66 Sup. Ct. 1142, 164 A. L. R. 476 (1946), the Supreme Court sustained a South Carolina tax on premiums received by foreign insurance companies from business done in that state, without reference to its interstate or local character, the tax being imposed as a condition of doing business in South Carolina and no similar tax being required of domestic corporations. Noting the fact that there have been Supreme Court decisions holding that the silence of Congress was to be construed as forbidding state action, only to have Congress later disclaim the prohibition or undertake to nullify it and that the court had never held such disclaimer invalid but had always given effect to the congressional judgment, the court said that "Congress intended to declare, and in effect declared, that uniformity of regulation, and of state taxation, are not required in reference to the business of insurance by the national public interest." The court viewed the Ferguson-McCarran Act as a "determination by Congress that state taxes, which in its silence might be held invalid as discriminatory, do not place on interstate insurance business a burden which it is unable generally to bear or should not bear in the competition with local business." The decision thus upholds the power of Congress, under the commerce clause, to enact legislation which sanctions state laws which in effect discriminate against interstate commerce. See Note, Congressional Consent to Discriminatory State Legislation, 45 Col. L. Rev. 927 (1945).

2. In Polish National Alliance v. National Labor Relations Board, 322 U. S. 643, 88 L. ed. 1509, 64 Sup. Ct. 1196 (1944), decided on the same day as the principal case, the Supreme Court, with eight justices participating, held that insurance employees were subject to the National Labor Relations Act, which was enacted in order to protect interstate commerce from "unfair labor practices affecting commerce." For further discussion of the cases see Powell, Insurance as Commerce in Constitution and Statute, 57 Harv. L. Rev. 937 (1944).

3. In Federal Baseball Club of Baltimore v. National League, 259 U. S. 200, 66 L. ed. 898, 42 Sup. Ct. 465 (1922) it was held that the business of providing public baseball games for profit between clubs of professional baseball players was not within the scope of the federal anti-trust laws. In Toolson v. New York Yankees, 346 U. S. 356, 98 L. ed. 64, 74 Sup. Ct. 78 (1953) the Supreme Court refused to overrule this decision. Pointing out that Congress has had the previous ruling under consideration for more than thirty years but has not seen fit to bring such business under these laws by legislation having prospective effect, the court said, in a per curiam opinion: "We think that if there are evils in this field which now warrant application to it of the anti-trust laws it should be by legislation." Justices Burton and Reed, dissenting, thought that in the light of existing conditions it was a contradiction in terms to say that those participating in organized professional baseball were not engaged in interstate trade or commerce, as those terms are used in the Constitution and in the Sherman Act.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. SPEIGHT.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a suit brought in a state court by the respondent against the petitioner, the Telegraph Company, to recover for mental suffering caused by a mistake in delivering a telegraphic message. The message handed to the defendant was "Father died this morning. Funeral tomorrow, 10:10 a. m.," and was dated January 24. As delivered to the plaintiff on January 24 it was dated January 23 and thus caused her to fail to attend the funeral which otherwise she would have done. The message was from Greenville, North Carolina to Rosemary in the same state, and was transmitted from Greenville through Richmond, Virginia, and Norfolk, to Roanoke Rapids, the delivery point for Rosemary. This seems to have been the route ordinarily used by the company for years, and the company defends on the ground that the message was sent in interstate commerce, and that therefore a suit could not be maintained for mental suffering alone. Southern Express Co.

v. Byers, 240 U. S. 612. The jury found that the message was sent out of North Carolina into Virginia for the purpose of fraudulently evading liability under the law of North Carolina and gave the plaintiff a verdict. The presiding judge then set the verdict aside "as a matter of law" and ordered a non-suit. But on appeal the supreme court of the state set aside the non-suit and directed that a judgment be entered on the verdict.

We are of opinion that the judge presiding at the trial was right and that the supreme court was wrong. Even if there had been any duty on the part of the telegraph company to confine the transmission to North Carolina, it did not do so. The transmission of a message through two states is interstate commerce as a matter of fact. Hanley v. Kansas City Southern Ry. Co., 187 U. S. 617. The fact must be tested by the actual transaction. Kirmeyer v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 568, 572.

As the line was arranged and had been arranged for many years, ever since Roanoke Rapids had been an independent office, Richmond was the relay point from Greenville to the latter place. The message went through Weldon, North Carolina, and was telegraphed back from Richmond, as Weldon business also was. It would have been possible, physically, to send direct from Weldon but would have required a rearrangement of the wires and more operators. The course adopted was more convenient and less expensive for the company and there was nothing to show motives except the facts. As things were, the message was sent in the quickest way. The court below did not rely primarily upon the finding of the jury as to the purpose of the arrangement but held that when as here the termini were in the same state the business was intrastate unless it was necessary to cross the territory of another state in order to reach the final point. This, as we have said, is not the law. It did however lay down that the burden was on the company to show that what was done "was not done to evade the jurisdiction of the state." If the motive were material, as to which we express no opinion, this again is a mistake. The burden was in the plaintiff to make out her case. Moreover the motive would not have made the business intrastate. If the mode of transmission adopted had been unreasonable as against the plaintiff, a different question would arise, but in that case the liability, if it existed, would not be a liability for an intrastate transaction that never took place but for the unwarranted conduct and the resulting loss. Judgment reversed.

MR. JUSTICE PITNEY concurs in the result.

NOTES

1. In Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Stroud, 267 U. S. 404, 69 L. ed. 683, 45 Sup. Ct. 243 (1925) it was held that a state statute regulating the furnishing of cars to shippers could not apply to a shipment from Oxy to St. Louis, both in Missouri, over a route that was partly in Illinois.

2. In Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co., 187 U. S. 617, 47 L. ed. 333, 23 Sup. Ct. 214 (1903) it was held that a shipment of goods between two cities in Arkansas, but passing through Indian Territory, is interstate commerce and the state could not enforce local rates.

3. In The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999 (1871) it was held that the Daniel Ball, though navigating the waters of the Grand River in Michigan and operating wholly within the state, was engaged in interstate commerce insofar as it received goods from other states and transported goods going to other states.

4. In Lord v. Steamship Co., 102 U. S. 541, 26 L. ed. 224 (1881) it was held that a steamship employed in navigation between San Francisco and San Diego was engaged in foreign commerce, such navigation being a matter affecting the nation in its external affairs and subject to national regulation.

5. Logs taken from the place of cutting and left on the river banks in readiness for floating downstream to another state were held not yet in interstate commerce and therefore subject to state taxation. Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. 475 (1886). But where logs placed in a river to be floated downstream to another state are detained temporarily in the state of origin to await subsidence of the high water, they are in interstate commerce and not subject to local taxation. Here, since the interception was to promote safe and convenient transit, the continuity of the interstate journey was not broken. Champlain Realty Co. v. Brattleboro, 260 U. S. 366, 67 L. ed. 309, 43 Sup. Ct. 146, 25 A. L. R. 1195 (1922).

DAHNIKE-WALKER MILLING CO. v. BONDURANT.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1921.
257 U. S. 282, 66 L. ed. 239, 42 Sup. Ct. 106.

This was an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of a crop of wheat estimated at 14,000 bushels. The plaintiff was a Tennessee corporation engaged in operating a flour and feed mill at Union City, in that state. The defendant was a resident of Hickman, Kentucky, and extensively engaged in farming in that vicinity. They were the parties to the contract. It was made at Hickman and the wheat was to be delivered and paid for there. But the delivery was to be on board the cars of a common carrier, and the plaintiff intended to ship the wheat to its mill in Tennessee. A small part of the crop was delivered as agreed, but delivery of the rest was refused, although the plaintiff was prepared and expecting to receive and pay for it. A payment advanced on the crop more than covered what was delivered. At the time for delivery wheat had come to be worth several cents per bushel more than the price fixed by the contract. The action was brought in a state court in Kentucky.

The principal defense interposed—the only one which we have occasion to notice—was to the effect that the plaintiff had not complied, as was the fact, with a statute of Kentucky (Ky. Stats. 1915, § 571) prescribing the conditions on which corporations of other states might do business in that state, and that the contract was therefore not enforceable. To this the plaintiff replied that the only business done by it in Kentucky consisted in purchasing wheat and other grain in that state for immediate shipment to its Tennessee mill and then shipping the same there; that the contract in question was made in the course of this business and with the purpose of forwarding the wheat to the mill as soon as it was delivered on board the cars; that this transaction was in interstate commerce and as to it the statute of Kentucky whose application was invoked by the defendant was invalid because in conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

The cause was tried twice. On the first trial the plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment, the court ruling that the statute could not constitutionally be applied to the transaction in question. But the Court of Appeals of the state, while conceding the invalidity of the statute as respects transactions in interstate commerce, held the transaction in question was not in such commerce, declared the statute valid and properly enforceable as to that transaction and reversed the judgment with a direction for a new trial. That court proceeded on the theory that, as the contract was made in Kentucky, related to property then in that state and was to be wholly performed therein, the transaction was strictly intrastate and not within the reach or protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. * * *

Where goods in one state are transported into another for purposes of sale the commerce does not end with the transportation, but embraces as well the sale of the goods after they reach their destination and while they are in the original packages. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 446-447; American Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed, 192 U. S. 500, 519. On the same principle, where goods are purchased in one state for transportation to another the commerce includes the purchase quite as much as it does the transportation. * * *

There is no controversy about the facts bearing on the character of the transaction in question. It had been the practice of the plaintiff to go into Kentucky to purchase grain to be transported to and used in its mill in Tennessee. On different occasions it had purchased from the defendant—at one time 13,000 bushels of corn. This contract was made in continuance of that practice, the plaintiff intending to forward the grain to its mill as soon as the delivery was made. In keeping with that purpose the delivery was to be on board the cars of a public carrier. Applying to these facts the principles before stated, we think the transaction was in interstate commerce. The state court, stressing the fact that the contract was made in Kentucky and was to be performed there, put aside the further facts that the delivery was to be on board the cars and that the plaintiff, in continuance of its prior practice, was purchasing the grain for shipment to its mill in Tennessee. We think the facts so neglected had a material bearing and should have been considered. They showed that what otherwise seemed an intrastate transaction was a part of interstate commerce. See Swift & Co. v.

United States, 196 U. S. 375, 398; United States v. Reading Co., 226 U. S. 324, 367; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Clark Brothers Coal Mining Co., 238 U. S. 456-468; Eureka Pipe Line Co. v. Hallanan, 251 U. S. 265. The state court also attached some importance to the fact that after the grain was delivered on the cars the plaintiff might have changed its mind and have sold the grain at the place of delivery or have shipped it to another point in Kentucky. No doubt this was possible, but it also was improbable. With equal basis it could be said that a shipment of merchandise billed to a point beyond the state of its origin might be halted by the shipper in the exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu before it got out of that state. The essential character of the transaction as otherwise fixed is not changed by a mere possibility of that sort. * * *

For these reasons we are of opinion that the transaction was a part of interstate commerce, in which the plaintiff lawfully could engage without any permission from the State of Kentucky, and that the statute in question, which concededly imposed burdensome conditions, was as to that transaction invalid because repugnant to the commerce clause.

Judgment reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS, with whom concurred MR. JUSTICE CLARKE, dissenting [on a question of jurisdiction which is omitted above].

NOTES

1. In Eureka Pipe Line Co. v. Hallanan, 257 U. S. 265, 66 L. ed. 227, 42 Sup. Ct. 101 (1921), holding that oil held in the tanks of a pipe line company subject to order of the producer might not be taxed by a state though the producer could order it delivered either within or without the state, the court said: "It appears to us as a practical matter that the transmission of this stream of oil was interstate commerce from the beginning of the flow, and that it was none the less so that if different orders had been received by the pipe line it would have changed the destination upon which the oil was started and at which it in fact arrived. We repeat that the pipe line company not the producer was the master of the destination of any specific oil. Therefore its intent and action determined the character of the movement from its beginning, and neither the intent nor the direction of the movement changed."

2. Labor agents who hire laborers for employment outside the state are not engaged in interstate commerce, though interstate transportation must follow. Williams v. Fears, 179 U. S. 270, 45 L. ed. 186, 21 Sup. Ct. 128 (1900). But drummers who solicit orders in one state for sellers located in another (as distinguished from peddlers who carry their wares with them) are engaged in interstate commerce because of the close relationship between the sale and the interstate transportation which follows. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing District, 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 7 Sup. Ct. 592 (1887), reversing a state court conviction of defendant for drumming without a license on evidence that he solicited buyers for a firm whose place of business was outside the state, the court saying that "if a state can, in this way, impose restrictions upon interstate commerce for the benefit and protection of its own citizens, we are brought back to the condition of things which existed before the adoption of the Constitution, and which was one of the principal causes that led to it."

3. Even though interstate movement of a commodity is ended, activities which are reasonably appropriate to the purposes of the interstate commerce contract may still be held to be a part of the interstate transaction. Thus, in York Manufacturing Co. v. Colley, 247 U. S. 21, 62 L. ed. 963, 38 Sup. Ct. 430, 11 A. L. R. 611 (1918), where some three weeks were consumed in erecting the machinery for an ice manufacturing plant and another week in testing it, all in accordance with the terms of the contract, the purchaser being in no position to accept delivery until he saw the plant in operation, it was held that the selling company, a Pennsylvania corporation, was doing an interstate commerce business in Texas when its engineer and workmen set up and tested the plant in that state. But in Browning v. Waycross, 233 U. S. 16, 58 L. ed. 828, 34 Sup. Ct. 578 (1914) the business of installing lightning rods for purchasers from an out-of-state seller, was held to be local in character and hence subject to a city occupation tax, despite the fact that the contract under which the rods were shipped bound the seller at his own expense to attach the rods to the houses of persons who ordered them.

Section 2.—The Commerce Power of Congress.

IN RE DEBS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1895.
158 U. S. 564, 39 L. ed. 1092, 15 Sup. Ct. 900.

[During the great railroad strike in Chicago in 1894 the United States, by the United States district attorney for the Northern District of Illinois, filed a bill in the federal court for that district complaining that Debs and others, officers and members of the American Railway Union, on account of a dispute between the Pullman Company and its employees, conspired to prevent the hauling of Pullman cars by railroads, induced railroad employees to go out on strike, and by acts of violence prevented railroads from employing substitute workers, and by various acts of violence obstructed, derailed, wrecked and stopped trains, both passenger and freight, engaged in interstate commerce and in transporting United States mails. On the same day, July 2, 1894, the court issued a decree enjoining further obstruction or interference with such trains. On July 17 Debs and three other officers of the union were arrested, brought before the court, found guilty of contempt of the injunction and sentenced to imprisonment. They now petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus alleging unlawfulness of their detention.]

MR. JUSTICE BREWER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The case presented by the bill is this: The United States, finding that the interstate transportation of persons and property, as well as the carriage of the mails, is forcibly obstructed, and that a combination and conspiracy exists to subject the control of such transportation to the will of the conspirators, applied to one of their courts, sitting as a court of equity, for an injunction to restrain such obstruction and prevent carrying into effect such conspiracy. Two questions of importance are presented: First. Are the relations of the general government to interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails such as authorize a direct interference to prevent a forcible obstruction thereof? Second. If authority exists, as authority in governmental affairs implies both power and duty, has a court of equity jurisdiction to issue an injunction in aid of the performance of such duty?

As, under the Constitution, power over interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails is vested in the national government, and Congress, by virtue of such grant, has assumed actual and direct control, it follows that the national government may prevent any unlawful and forcible interference therewith. But how shall this be accomplished? Doubtless, it is within the competency of Congress to prescribe by legislation that any interferences with these matters shall be offenses against the United States, and prosecuted and punished by indictment in the proper courts. But is that the only remedy? Have the vast interests of the nation in interstate commerce, and in the transportation of the mails, no other protection than lies in the possible punishment of those who interfere with it? To ask the question is to answer it. * * *

* * * The entire strength of the nation may be used to enforce in any part of the land the full and free exercise of all national powers and the security of all rights intrusted by the Constitution to its care. The strong arm of the national government may be put forth to brush away all obstructions to the freedom of interstate commerce or the transportation of the mails. If the emergency arises, the army of the nation, and all its militia, are at the service of the nation, to compel obedience to its laws.

But, passing to the second question, is there no other alternative than the use of force on the part of the executive authorities whenever obstructions arise to the freedom of interstate commerce or the transportation of the mails? Is the army the only instrument by which rights of the public can be enforced, and the peace of the nation preserved? Grant that any public nuisance may be forcibly abated, either at the instance of the authorities, or by any individual suffering private damage therefrom. The existence of this right of forcible abatement is not inconsistent with, nor does it destroy, the right of appeal, in an orderly way, to the courts for a judicial determination, and an exercise of their powers, by writ of injunction and otherwise, to accomplish the same result. * * *

Neither can it be doubted that the government has such an interest in the subject-matter as enables it to appear as party plaintiff in this suit. It is said that equity only interferes for the protection of property, and that the government has no property interest. A sufficient reply is that the United States have a property in the mails, the protection of which was one of the purposes of this bill. * * * We do not care to place our decision upon this ground alone. Every government, intrusted by the very terms of its being with powers and duties to be exercised and discharged for the general welfare, has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance in the exercise of the one and the discharge of the other, and it is not sufficient answer to its appeal to one of those courts that it has no pecuniary interest in the matter. The obligations which it is under to promote the interest of all and to prevent the wrongdoing of one, resulting in injury to the general welfare, is often of itself sufficient to give it a standing in court. * * * While it is not the province of the government to interfere in any mere matter of private controversy between individuals, or to use its great powers to enforce the rights of one against another, yet, whenever the wrongs complained of are such as affect the public at large, and are in respect of matters which by the Constitution are intrusted to the care of the nation, and concerning which the nation owes the duty to all the citizens of securing to them their common rights, then the mere fact that the government has no pecuniary interest in the controversy is not sufficient to exclude it from the courts, or prevent it from taking measures therein to fully discharge those constitutional duties.

The national government, given by the Constitution power to regulate interstate commerce, has by express statute assumed jurisdiction over such commerce when carried upon railroads. It is charged, therefore, with the duty of keeping those highways of interstate commerce free from obstruction, for it has always been recognized as one of the powers and duties of a government to remove obstructions from the highways under its control. * * * Indeed, the obstruction of a highway is a public nuisance (4 Bl. Comm. 167), and a public nuisance has always been held subject to abatement at the instance of the government. * * *

It is said that the jurisdiction heretofore exercised by the national government over highways has been in respect to waterways,—the natural highways of the country,—and not over artificial highways, such as railroads; but * * * the same fullness of control exists in the one case as in the other, and the same power to remove obstructions from the one as from the other. * * *

Petition denied.

NOTE

1. Note that there was no legislation of Congress covering the situation involved in the principal case. Does the case exemplify the power of the federal judiciary to enjoin conduct which adversely affects interstate commerce, even in the absence of legislation, or is it explainable on other grounds?

NORTHERN SECURITIES CO. v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1904.
193 U. S. 197, 48 L. ed. 679, 24 Sup. Ct. 436.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for Minnesota to review a decree enforcing, as against the defendants, the provisions of the Anti-Trust Act against combinations in restraint of interstate or foreign commerce.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN announced the affirmance of the decree of the Circuit Court and delivered the following opinion:

This suit was brought by the United States against the Northern Securities Company, a corporation of New Jersey; the Great Northern Railway Company, a corporation of Minnesota; the Northern Pacific Railway Company, a corporation of Wisconsin; James J. Hill, a citizen of Minnesota; and William P. Clough, D. Willis James, John S. Kennedy, J. Pierpont Morgan, Robert Bacon, George F. Baker, and Daniel S. Lamont, citizens of New York.

Its general object was to enforce, as against the defendants, the provisions of the statute of July 2d, 1890, commonly known as the Anti-Trust Act, and entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies." 26 Stat. 209. By the decree below the United States was given substantially the relief asked by it in the bill. * * *

The Government charges that if the combination was held not to be in violation of the act of Congress, then all efforts of the national government to preserve to the people the benefits of free competition among carriers engaged in interstate commerce will be wholly unavailing, and all transcontinental lines, indeed, the entire railway systems of the country, may be absorbed, merged, and consolidated, thus placing the public at the absolute mercy of the holding corporation.

The several defendants denied all the allegations of the bill imputing to them a purpose to evade the provisions of the act of Congress, or to form a combination or conspiracy having for its object either to restrain or to monopolize commerce or trade among the states or with foreign nations. They denied that any combination or conspiracy was formed in violation of the act.

In our judgment, the evidence fully sustains the material allegations of the bill, and shows a violation of the act of Congress, in so far as it declares illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of commerce among the several states and with foreign nations, and forbids attempts to monopolize such commerce or any part of it.

Summarizing the principal facts, it is indisputable upon this record that under the leadership of the defendants Hill and Morgan the stockholders of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway corporations, having competing and substantially parallel lines from the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean at Puget Sound combined and conceived the scheme of organizing a corporation under the laws of New Jersey which should hold the shares of the stock of the constituent companies; such shareholders, in lieu of their shares in those companies, to receive, upon an agreed basis of value, shares in the holding corporation; that pursuant to such combination the Northern Securities Company was organized as the holding corporation through which the scheme should be executed; and under that scheme such holding corporation has become the holder—more properly speaking, the custodian—of more than nine tenths of the stock of the Northern Pacific, and more than three-fourths of the stock of the Great Northern, the stockholders of the companies who delivered their stock receiving upon the agreed basis shares of stock in the holding corporation. The stockholders of these two competing companies disappeared, as such, for the moment, but immediately reappeared as stockholders of the holding company, which was thereafter to guard the interests of both sets of stockholders as a unit, and to manage, or cause to be managed, both lines of railroad as if held in one ownership. Necessarily by this combination or arrangement the holding company in the fullest sense dominates the situation in the interest of those who were stockholders of the constituent companies; as much so, for every practical purpose, as if it had been itself a railroad corporation which had built, owned, and operated both lines for the exclusive benefit of its stockholders. Necessarily, also, the constituent companies ceased, under such a combination, to be in active competition for trade and commerce along their respective lines, and have become, practically, one powerful consolidated corporation, by the name of a holding corporation, the principal, if not the sole, object for the formation of which was to carry out the purpose of the original combination, under which competition between the constituent companies would cease. Those who were stockholders of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific and became stockholders in the holding company are now interested in preventing all competition between the two lines, and, as owners of stock or of certificates of stock in the holding company, they will see to it that no competition is tolerated. They will take care that no persons are chosen directors of the holding company who will permit competition between the constituent companies. The result of the combination is that all the earnings of the constituent companies make a common fund in the hands of the Northern Securities Company, to be distributed, not upon the basis of the earnings of the respective constituent companies, each acting exclusively in its own interests, but upon the basis of the certificates of stock issued by the holding company. No scheme or device could more certainly come within the words of the act—"combination in the form of a trust or otherwise * * * in restraint of commerce among the several states or with foreign nations,"—or could more effectively and certainly suppress free competition between the constituent companies.

This combination is, within the meaning of the act, a "trust"; but if not, it is a combination in restraint of interstate and international commerce; and that is enough to bring it under the condemnation of the act. The mere existence of such a combination, and the power acquired by the holding company as its trustee, constitute a menace to, and a restraint upon, that freedom of commerce which Congress intended to recognize and protect, and which the public is entitled to have protected. * * *

Such being the case made by the record, what are the principles that must control the decision of the present case? Do former adjudications determine the controlling questions raised by the pleadings and proofs? * * * Does the act of Congress prescribe, as a rule for interstate or international commerce, that the operation of the natural laws of competition between those engaged in such commerce shall not be restricted or interfered with by any contract, combination, or conspiracy? How far may Congress go in regulating the affairs or conduct of state corporations engaged as carriers in commerce among the states or of state corporations which, although not directly engaged themselves in such commerce, yet have control of the business of interstate carriers? If state corporations, or their stockholders, are found to be parties to a combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, which restrains interstate or international commerce, may they not be compelled to respect any rule for such commerce that may be lawfully prescribed by Congress? * * *

[After citing earlier cases arising under the Anti-Trust Act] It is sufficient to say that from the decisions in the above cases certain propositions are plainly deducible and embrace the present case. Those propositions are:

That although the act of Congress known as the Anti-Trust Act has no reference to the mere manufacture or production of articles or commodities within the limits of the several States, it does embrace and declare to be illegal every contract, combination or conspiracy, in whatever form, of whatever nature and whoever may be parties to it, which directly or necessarily operates in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. * * *

That railroad carriers engaged in interstate or international trade or commerce are embraced by the act;

That combinations, even among private manufacturers or dealers, whereby interstate or international commerce is restrained, are equally embraced by the act;

That Congress has the power to establish rules by which interstate and international commerce shall be governed, and, by the Anti-Trust Act, has prescribed the rule of free competition among those engaged in such commerce;

That every combination or conspiracy which would extinguish competition between otherwise competing railroads engaged in interstate trade or commerce, and which would in that way restrain such trade or commerce, is made illegal by the act;

That the natural effect of competition is to increase commerce, and an agreement whose direct effect is to prevent this play of competition restrains instead of promotes trade and commerce; * * *

That under its power to regulate commerce among the several states and with foreign nations, Congress had authority to enact the statute in question.

No one, we assume, will deny that these propositions were distinctly announced in the former decisions of this court. * * * In our opinion, the recognition of the principles announced in former cases must, under the conceded facts, lead to an affirmance of the decree below, unless the special objections, or some of them, which have been made to the application of the act of Congress to the present case, are of a substantial character. We will now consider those objections.

Underlying the argument in behalf of the defendants is the idea that, as the Northern Securities Company is a state corporation, and as its acquisition of the stock of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway Companies is not inconsistent with the powers conferred by its charter, the enforcement of the act of Congress, as against those corporations, will be an unauthorized interference by the national government with the internal commerce of the states creating those corporations. This suggestion does not at all impress us. * * * By its very terms the act regulates only commerce among the states and with foreign states. * * *

It is said that whatever may be the power of a state over such subjects, Congress cannot forbid single individuals from disposing of their stock in a state corporation, even if such corporation be engaged in interstate and international commerce; that the holding or purchase by a state corporation, for whatever purpose, are matters in respect of which Congress has no authority under the Constitution; that, so far as the power of Congress is concerned, citizens and state corporations are subject, if to any authority, only to the lawful authority of the state in which such citizens reside or under whose laws such corporations are organized. It is unnecessary in this case to consider such abstract, general questions. * * *

In this connection, it is suggested that the contention of the government is that the acquisition and ownership of stock in a state railroad corporation is itself interstate commerce if that corporation be engaged in interstate commerce. * * * We do not understand that the government makes any such contentions or takes any such positions as those statements imply. It does not contend that Congress may control the mere acquisition or the mere ownership of stock in a state corporation engaged in interstate commerce. Nor does it contend that Congress can control the organization of state corporations authorized by their charters to engage in interstate and international commerce. But it does contend that Congress may protect the freedom of interstate commerce by any means that are appropriate and that are lawful, and not prohibited by the Constitution. It does contend that no state corporation can stand in the way of the enforcement of the national will, legally expressed. What the government particularly complains of, indeed, all that it complains of here, is the existence of a combination among the stockholders of competing railroad companies which, in violation of the act of Congress, restrains interstate and international commerce through the agency of a common corporate trustee, designated to act for both companies in repressing free competition between them. Independently of any question of the mere ownership of stock or of the organization of a state corporation, can it in reason be said that such a combination is not embraced by the very terms of the Anti-Trust Act? May not Congress declare that combination to be illegal? If Congress legislates for the protection of the public, may it not proceed on the ground that wrongs, when effected by a powerful combination, are more dangerous and require more stringent supervision than when they are to be effected by a single person? * * *

The means employed in respect to the combinations forbidden by the Anti-Trust Act, and which Congress deemed germane to the end to be accomplished, was to prescribe as a rule for interstate and international commerce (not for domestic commerce) that it should not be vexed by combinations, conspiracies, or monopolies which restrain commerce by destroying or restricting competition. * * *

Now the Court is asked to adjudge that, if held to embrace the case before us, the Anti-Trust Act is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. In this view we are unable to concur. The contention of the defendants could not be sustained without, in effect, overruling the prior decisions of this Court as to the scope and validity of the Anti-Trust Act. * * *

Assuming, without further discussion, that the case before us is within the terms of the act, and that the act is not in excess of the powers of Congress, we recur to the question, how far may the courts go in reaching and suppressing the combination described in the bill? All will agree that if the Anti-Trust Act be constitutional, and if the combination in question be in violation of its provisions, the courts may enforce the provisions of the statute by such orders and decrees as are necessary or appropriate to that end and as may be consistent with the fundamental rules of legal procedure. And all, we take it, will agree, as established firmly by the decisions of this Court, that the power of Congress over commerce extends to all the instrumentalities of such commerce, and to every device that may be employed to interfere with the freedom of commerce among the states and with foreign nations. Equally, we assume, all will agree that the Constitution and the legal enactments of Congress are, by express words of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution and laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding. Nevertheless, the defendants, strangely enough, invoke in their behalf the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution, * * *. No such view can be entertained for a moment. * * * No state can, by merely creating a corporation, or in any other mode, project its authority into other states, and across the continent, so as to prevent Congress from exerting the power it possesses under the Constitution over interstate and international commerce, or so as to exempt its corporation engaged in interstate commerce from obedience to any rule lawfully established by Congress for such commerce. It cannot be said that any state may give a corporation, created under its laws, authority to restrain interstate or international commerce against the will of the nation as lawfully expressed by Congress. Every corporation created by a state is necessarily subject to the supreme law of the land. * * * The federal court may not have power to forfeit the charter of the Securities Company; it may not declare how its shares of stock may be transferred on its books, nor diminish or increase, its capital stock. All these and like matters are to be regulated by the state which created the company. But to the end that effect be given to the national will, lawfully expressed, Congress may prevent that company, in its capacity as a holding corporation and trustee, from carrying out the purposes of a combination formed in restraint of interstate commerce. The Securities Company is itself a part of the present combination; its head and front; its trustee. It would be extraordinary if the court, in executing the act of Congress, could not lay hands upon that company and prevent it from doing that which, if done, will defeat the act of Congress. Upon like grounds the court can, by appropriate orders, prevent the two competing railroad companies here involved from co-operating with the Securities Company in restraining commerce among the states. In short, the court may make any order necessary to bring about the dissolution or suppression of an illegal combination that restrains interstate commerce. All this can be done without infringing in any degree upon the just authority of the states. The affirmation of the judgment below will only mean that no combination, however powerful, is stronger than the law, or will be permitted to avail itself of the pretext that to prevent it doing that which, if done, would defeat a legal enactment of Congress, is to attack the reserved rights of the states. * * *

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom concurred MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER, MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM, and MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, dissenting.

in state corporations, because such corporations may be in part engaged in interstate commerce? * * * I think the ownership of stock in a state corporation cannot be said to be in any sense traffic between the states or intercourse between them. * * * Can the ownership of stock in a state corporation, by the most latitudinarian construction, be embraced by the words "commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations?" * * * Can it in reason be maintained that to prescribe rules governing the ownership of stock within a state, in a corporation created by it, is within the power to prescribe rules for the regulation of intercourse between citizens of different states?

But if the question be looked at with reference to the powers of the federal and state governments,—the general nature of the one and the local character of the other which it was the purpose of the Constitution to create and perpetuate,—it seems to me evident that the contention that the authority of the national government under the commerce clause gives the right to Congress to regulate the ownership of stock in railroads chartered by state authority is absolutely destructive of the Tenth Amendment. * * * This must follow, since the authority of Congress to regulate on the subject can, in reason, alone rest upon the proposition that its power over commerce embraces the right to control the ownership of railroads doing in part an interstate commerce business. But power to control the ownership of all such railroads would necessarily embrace their organization. Hence it would result that it would be in the power of Congress to abrogate every such railroad charter granted by the states from the beginning if Congress deemed that the rights conferred by such state charters tended to restrain commerce between the states or to create a monopoly concerning the same. * * *

Being of the opinion * * * that Congress was without power to regulate the acquisition and ownership of the stock in question by the Northern Securities Company, and because I think even if there were such power in Congress, it has not been exercised by the Anti-Trust Act, as shown in the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes, I dissent.

[MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, with whom concurred MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER, MR. JUSTICE WHITE, and MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM, also delivered a dissenting opinion which is omitted.]

NOTES

1. It was not until the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 and the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890 that Congress made any significant effort to exercise its powers under the commerce clause to regulate the national economy. The predominant purpose of the former statute was to prevent unreasonable and discriminatory rates. The constitutional basis for the enactment of anti-trust legislation is the power to protect interstate commerce from burdens and obstructions. Its principal objective was to check the growth of industrial trusts. But in the first important case to arise under it the Supreme Court held that its provisions could not be constitutionally applied to a gigantic monopoly in the manufacture of sugar, since manufacture is not commerce and its regulation is a matter solely within the competence of the states. As regards the possible effects of monopolistic practices in manufacturing or production upon interstate commerce, the court said: "Contracts, combinations, or conspiracies to control domestic enterprise in manufacture, agriculture, mining, production in all its forms, or to raise or lower prices or wages, might unquestionably tend to restrain external as well as domestic trade, but the restraint would be an indirect result, however inevitable and whatever its extent, and such result would not necessarily determine the object of the contract, combination, or conspiracy." United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. ed. 325, 15 Sup. Ct. 249 (1895).

But in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. 96 (1899) it was held that a combination in the manufacture, sale and transportation of iron pipe, where the purpose was to fix the price of the goods sold, was invalid under the Sherman Act, the court saying that "anything which directly obstructs and thus regulates that commerce which is carried on among the states, whether it is state legislation or private contracts between individuals or corporations, should be subject to the power of Congress in the regulation of that commerce." And in Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 49 L. ed. 518, 25 Sup. Ct. 276 (1905), where there was a combination of the large meat packers to restrain open bidding in the purchase of livestock in the stockyards, it was held by a unanimous court that there was a violation of the Sherman Act. Justice Holmes, distinguishing the Knight case, pointed out that even though the transactions involved standing alone were transactions in intrastate commerce, they were nevertheless caught up in that "current of commerce" flowing from the farms through the stockyards and slaughterhouses to the consuming public throughout the states of the union, the purchase of the cattle being a part and incident of such commerce.

In Mandeville Island Farms v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U. S. 219, 92 L. ed. 1328, 68 Sup. Ct. 996 (1948), holding that the Sherman Act covered an agreement in restraint of trade among California sugar beet refiners who constituted the only available market for sugar beets grown in their locality, so as to render the participants liable in treble damages to a sugar beet grower injured in consequence of such agreement, the court, through Justice Rutledge, reviewed the decisions under the act and made it clear that the rationale of the Knight case had been abandoned. He said: "The Knight decision made the statute a dead letter for more than a decade and, had its full force remained unmodified, the act today would be a weak instrument, as would also the power of Congress, to reach evils in all the vast operations of our gigantic national industrial system antecedent to interstate sale and transportation of manufactured products. Indeed, it and succeeding decisions, embracing the same artificially drawn lines, produced a series of consequences for the exercise of national power over industry conducted on a national scale which the evolving nature of our industrialism foredoomed to reversal."

2. In Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 55 L. ed. 619, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734 (1911) and American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 106, 55 L. ed. 663, 31 Sup. Ct. 632 (1911), the Supreme Court applied the so-called "rule of reason" to the construction of the first section of the Sherman Act, holding that, as the words "restraint of trade" at common law and in the law of this country at the time of the adoption of the statute embraced only contracts or combinations which injured the public by unduly restricting competition, or unduly obstructing the natural course of trade, the language of the Act was intended by the lawmakers to have the same effect. See generally, Corwin, The Anti-Trust Acts and the Constitution, 18 Va. L. Rev. 355 (1932).

3. Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U. S. 143, 96 L. ed. 162, 72 Sup. Ct. 181 (1951) held that a newspaper's conduct in forcing local advertisers to boycott a competing radio station for the purpose of eliminating the station and thereby regaining its monopoly of interstate commerce in the locality, constituted a violation of the Sherman Act and justified injunctive relief.

BROOKS v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1925.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a writ of error to the District Court for the District of South Dakota brought by Rae Brooks to reverse a judgment against him of conviction under two indictments for violation of the Act of Congress, of October, 1919, known as the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act. The writ of error issued under § 238 of the Judicial Code, because the case involves the construction or application of the Constitution, in that the chief assignment of error is the invalidity of the Act. The Act became effective October 29, 1919 (41 Stat. 324), and is as follows:

"Chap. 89.—An Act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce. * * *

"Sec. 3. That whoever shall transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce a motor vehicle, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

"Sec. 4. That whoever shall receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, or dispose of any motor vehicle, moving as, or which is a part of, or which constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

"Sec. 5. That any person violating this act may be punished in any district in or through which such motor vehicle has been transported or removed by such offender."

The objection to the act cannot be sustained. Congress can certainly regulate interstate commerce to the extent of forbidding and punishing the use of such commerce as an agency to promote immorality, dishonesty or the spread of any evil or harm to the people of other states from the state of origin. In doing this it is merely exercising the police power, for the benefit of the public, within the field of interstate commerce. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 215. In Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 137, it was held that Congress could pass a law excluding diseased stock from interstate commerce in order to prevent its use in such a way as thereby to injure the stock of other states. In the Lottery Case [Champion v. Ames], 188 U. S. 321, it was held that Congress might pass a law punishing the transmission of lottery tickets from one state to another, in order to prevent the carriage of those tickets to be sold in other states and thus demoralize, through a spread of the gambling habit, individuals who were likely to purchase. In Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45, it was held that it was within the regulatory power of Congress to punish the transportation in interstate commerce of adulterated articles which, if sold in other states than the one from which they were transported, would deceive or injure persons who purchased such articles. In Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, and Caminetti v. United States, 242 U. S. 470, the so-called White Slave Traffic Act, which was construed to punish any person engaged in enticing a woman from one state to another for immoral ends, whether for commercial purposes or otherwise, was valid because it was intended to prevent the use of interstate commerce to facilitate prostitution or concubinage, and other forms of immorality. In Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railway Co., 242 U. S. 311, it was held that Congress had power to forbid the introduction of intoxicating liquors into any state in which their use was prohibited, in order to prevent the use of interstate commerce to promote that which was illegal in the state. In Weber v. Freed, 239 U. S. 325, it was held that Congress had power to prohibit the importation of pictorial representations of prize fights designed for public exhibition, because of the demoralizing effect of such exhibitions in the state of destination.

In Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251, it was held that a federal law forbidding the transportation of articles manufactured by child labor in one state to another was invalid because it was really not a regulation of interstate commerce but a congressional attempt to regulate labor in the state of origin by an embargo on its external trade. Articles made by child labor and transported into other states were harmless and could be properly transported without injuring any person who either bought or used them. In referring to the cases already cited, upon which the argument for the validity of the Child Labor Act (Comp. St. §§ 8819a-8819f) was based, this court pointed out that in each of them the use of interstate commerce had contributed to the accomplishment of harmful results to people of other states, and that the congressional power over interstate transportation in such cases could only be effectively exercised by prohibiting it. The clear distinction between authorities first cited and the Child Labor Case leaves no doubt where the right lies in this case. It is known of all men that the radical change in transportation of persons and goods effected by the introduction of the automobile, the speed with which it moves, and the ease with which evil-minded persons can avoid capture have greatly encouraged and increased crimes. One of the crimes which have been encouraged is the theft of the automobiles themselves and their immediate transportation to places remote from homes of the owners. Elaborately organized conspiracies for the theft of automobiles and the spiriting them away into some other state and their sale or other disposition far away from the owner and his neighborhood have roused Congress to devise some method for defeating the success of these widely spread schemes of larceny. The quick passage of the machines into another state helps to conceal the trail of the thieves, gets the stolen property into another police jurisdiction and facilitates the finding of a safer place in which to dispose of the booty at a good price. This is a gross misuse of interstate commerce. Congress may properly punish such interstate transportation by any one with knowledge of the theft, because of its harmful result and its defeat of the property rights of those whose machines against their will are taken into other jurisdictions. * * *

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NOTES

1. That the power to regulate interstate commerce includes not only the power to protect such commerce by the removal of burdens or obstructions from its channels but the power to prohibit the interstate transportation of certain interdicted articles or persons altogether is illustrated by the principal case. This power may be exercised, as in the principal case, in order to give effect to the policy of Congress, or, as the two cases which follow bring out, to assist the states in the execution of certain of their internal policies.

The Federal Kidnaping Act of 1932 makes it a crime knowingly to transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce persons unlawfully seized by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward or otherwise. The Federal Stolen Property Act of 1934 forbids the transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of stolen or fraudulently taken goods, securities or money of the value of $5,000 or more, knowing the same to have been stolen. The Fleeing Felon Act of 1934 makes it a federal offense for any person to move or travel in interstate or foreign commerce with intent to avoid prosecution for certain specified felonies, or to avoid giving testimony in any criminal proceeding in which the commission of a felony is charged. The National Firearms Act of 1934, regulating and taxing the transfer of certain types of firearms, penalizes the transportation in interstate commerce of unregistered firearms. The constitutional validity of these and other important statutes enacted under this interpretation of the commerce power of Congress has been upheld.

On the power of Congress to prohibit interstate commerce, see generally, Corwin, Congress's Power to Prohibit Commerce—A Crucial Constitutional Issue, 18 Corn. L. Q. 477 (1933), 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 103.

2. United States v. Five Gambling Devices, 346 U. S. 441, 98 L. ed. 179, 74 Sup. Ct. 190 (1953) were unsuccessful attempts, by two different procedures, to enforce the view of the Department of Justice that Congress had the power, in enacting the Act of January 2, 1951 (15 U. S. C. §§ 1171-1177; F. C. A. 15 §§ 1171-1177) prohibiting shipment of gambling devices in interstate commerce, to require, under criminal sanctions, dealers in such devices to register and to file information as to their sale, irrespective of whether the sales were made and the gambling devices moved in interstate commerce. Indictments charging dealers with violations of the act without alleging that the dealers moved gambling devices in interstate commerce or that the devices involved so moved were dismissed by a federal district court. In another proceeding the government brought a libel to forfeit gambling machines seized by federal agents; the libel did not show that these machines were at any time transported in interstate commerce. It also was dismissed. These dismissals were affirmed by a sharply divided court, the justices in the majority being unable to agree as to the ground of decision. The dissenting justices (Warren, C. J., Reed, Burton and Clark) took the view that the statute was applicable, irrespective of any relation to interstate commerce of the dealers or devices involved, that it was not unconstitutionally vague, and was within the power of Congress over interstate commerce, since the regulation of the intrastate activities involved were appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, i. e., the exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce.

CLARK DISTILLING CO. v. WESTERN MARYLAND R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1917.

1218, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 845.

[Appeals from the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland questioning the validity of the Webb-Kenyon Act (Act of Congress of March 1, 1913, 37 Stat. 699), stated in the opinion, and the validity of a statute of West Virginia which forbade any common carrier, for hire, and any other person, for hire or without hire, to carry or bring intoxicating liquor into the state.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * [After (1) interpreting the West Virginia statute as prohibiting receipt within the state, whether for personal use or otherwise, and (2) holding that it did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment by so doing, the opinion continues:]

This brings us to consider whether the Webb-Kenyon Law has so regulated interstate commerce as to give the state the power to do what it did in enacting the prohibition law and cause its provisions to be applicable to shipments of intoxicants in interstate commerce, thus saving that law from repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States, which is the third proposition for consideration.

3. Assuming the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon Act, what is its true meaning and its operation upon the prohibitions contained in the West Virginia law?

Omitting words irrelevant to the subject now under consideration, the title and text of the Webb-Kenyon Act are as follows:

"An Act divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

"* * * That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, * * * into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, * * * which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, * * * is hereby prohibited."

As the state law forbade the shipment into or transportation of liquor in the state whether from inside or out, and all receipt and possession of liquor so transported without regard to the use to which the liquor was to be put, and as the Webb-Kenyon Act prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of all liquor "intended * * * to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State," there would seem to be no room for doubt that the prohibitions of the state law were made applicable by the Webb-Kenyon Law. If that law was valid, therefore, the state law was not repugnant to the commerce clause. * * *

To correct the great evil which was asserted to arise from the right to ship liquor into a state through the channels of interstate commerce and there receive and sell the same in the original package in violation of state prohibitions, was indisputably the purpose which led to the enactment of the Wilson Law (Act of Congress of August 8, 1890, 26 Stat. 313) * * *. And this was recognized by the long line of decisions which upheld that law and pointed out that it permitted the state prohibitions to take away from interstate commerce shipments a right which they otherwise would have embraced, that is, the right to sell after receipt in the original package, any state law to the contrary notwithstanding. At the same time it was recognized, however, that as the right to receive liquor was not affected by the Wilson Act, such receipt and the possession following from it and the resulting right to use remained protected by the commerce clause even in a state where what is known as the dispensary system prevailed. Vance v. Vandercook Company, 170 U. S. 438. Reading the Webb-Kenyon Law in the light thus thrown upon it by the Wilson Act and the decisions of this Court which sustained and applied it, there is no room for doubt that it was enacted simply to extend that which was done by the Wilson Act, that is to say, its purpose was to prevent the immunity characteristic of interstate commerce from being used to permit the receipt of liquor through such commerce in states contrary to their laws, and thus in effect afford a means by subterfuge and indirection to set such laws at naught. In this light it is clear that the Webb-Kenyon Act, if effect is to be given to its text, but operated so as to cause the prohibitions of the West Virginia law against shipment, receipt and possession to be applicable and controlling * * *.

The movement of liquor in interstate commerce and the receipt and possession and right to sell prohibited by the state law having been in express terms divested by the Webb-Kenyon Act of their interstate commerce character, it follows that if that act was within the power of Congress to adopt, there is no possible reason for holding that to enforce the prohibitions of the state law would conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution; and this brings us to the last question, which is:

4. Did Congress have power to enact the Webb-Kenyon Law? * * *

It is not in the slightest degree disputed that if Congress had prohibited the shipment of all intoxicants in the channels of interstate commerce and therefore had prevented all movement between the several states, such action would have been lawful because within the power to regulate which the Constitution conferred. Lottery Case, 188 U. S. 321; Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308. The issue, therefore, is not one of an absence of authority to accomplish in substance a more extended result than that brought about by the Webb-Kenyon Law, but of a want of power to reach the result accomplished because of the method resorted to for that purpose. This is certain since the sole claim is that the act was not within the power given to Congress to regulate because it submitted liquors to the control of the states by subjecting interstate commerce in such liquors to present and future state prohibitions, and hence in the nature of things was wanting in uniformity. Let us test the contentions by reason and authority. * * *

The argument as to delegation to the states rests upon a mere misconception. It is true the regulation which the Webb-Kenyon Act contains permits state prohibitions to apply to movements of liquor from one state into another, but the will which causes the prohibition to be applicable is that of Congress, since the application of state prohibitions would cease the instant the act of Congress ceased to apply. * * *

So far as uniformity is concerned, there is no question that the act uniformly applies to the conditions which call its provisions into play—that its provisions apply to all the states,—so that the question really is a complaint as to the want of uniform existence of things to which the act applies and not to an absence of uniformity in the act itself. But aside from this it is obvious that the argument seeks to engraft upon the Constitution a restriction not found in it, that is, that the power to regulate conferred upon Congress obtains subject to the requirement that regulations enacted shall be uniform throughout the United States. In view of the conceded power on the part of Congress to prohibit the movement of intoxicants in interstate commerce, we cannot admit that because it did not exert its authority to the full limit, but simply regulated to the extent of permitting the prohibitions in one state to prevent the use of interstate commerce to ship liquor from another state, Congress exceeded its authority to regulate. We can see, therefore, no force in the argument relied upon tested from the point of view of reason, and we come to the question of authority.

It is settled, says the argument, that interstate commerce is divided into two great classes, one embracing subjects which do not exact uniformity and which, although subject to the regulation of Congress, are in the absence of such regulation subject to the control of the several states (Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299), and the other embracing subjects which do require uniformity and which in the absence of regulation by Congress remain free from all state control (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100). As to the first, it is said, Congress may, when regulating, to the extent it deems wise to do so permit state legislation enacted or to be enacted to govern, because to do so would only be to do that which would exist if nothing had been done by Congress. As to the second class, the argument is, that in adopting regulations Congress is wholly without power to provide for the application of state power to any degree whatever, because in the absence of the exertion by Congress of power to regulate, the subject matter would have been free from state control, and because, besides, the recognition of state power under such circumstances would be to bring about a want of uniformity. But granting the accuracy of the two classifications which the proposition states, the limitation upon the power of Congress to regulate which is deduced from the classifications finds no support in the authority relied upon to sustain it. Let us see if this is not the case by examining the authority relied upon. What is that authority? The ruling in Leisy v. Hardin, supra. But that case, instead of supporting the contention, plainly refutes it for the following reasons: Although Leisy v. Hardin declared in express terms that the movement of intoxicants in interstate commerce belonged to that class which was free from all interference by state control in the absence of regulation by Congress, it was at the same time in the most explicit terms declared that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce in intoxicants embraced the right to subject such movement to state prohibitions and that the freedom of intoxicants to move in interstate commerce and the protection over it from state control arose only from the absence of congressional regulation and would endure only until Congress had otherwise provided. * * *

And finally, after pointing out that the states had no power to interfere with the movement of goods in interstate commerce before they had been commingled with the property of the state, it was said that this limitation obtained "in the absence of congressional permission" to the state (p. 124). * * *

As we have already pointed out, the very regulation made by Congress in enacting the Wilson Law to minimize the evil resulting from violating prohibitions of state law by sending liquor through interstate commerce into a state and selling it in violation of such law was to divest such shipments of their interstate commerce character and to strip them of the right to be sold in the original package free from state authority which otherwise would have obtained. And that Congress had the right to enact this legislation making existing and future state prohibitions applicable, was the express result of the decided cases to which we have referred, beginning with In re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545. As the power to regulate which was manifested in the Wilson Act and that which was exerted in enacting the Webb-Kenyon Law are essentially identical, the one being but a larger degree of exertion of the identical power which was brought into play in the other, we are unable to understand upon what principle we could hold that the one was not a regulation without holding that the other had the same infirmity. * * *

We can see no reason for saying that although Congress in view of the nature and character of intoxicants had a power to forbid their movement in interstate commerce, it had not the authority to so deal with the subject as to establish a regulation (which is what was done by the Webb-Kenyon Law) making it impossible for one state to violate the prohibitions of the laws of another through the channels of interstate commerce. Indeed, we can see no escape from the conclusion that if we accepted the proposition urged, we would be obliged to announce the contradiction in terms that because Congress had exerted a regulation lesser in power than it was authorized to exert, therefore its action was void for excess of power. * * *

1. The history of liquor legislation affords an interesting demonstration of the necessity and effectiveness of cooperation between the federal government and the states in regulating subjects which the states deem objectionable. In Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 8 Sup. Ct. 689 (1888) the Supreme Court held invalid under the commerce clause an Iowa statute, enacted in furtherance of the state's prohibition policy, prohibiting the transportation by a common carrier of intoxicating liquor into the state. Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 10 Sup. Ct. 681 (1890) further limited the power of the states by holding that intoxicating liquor shipped into a state was not within the reach of state laws prohibiting sale until after the original package was broken or sold by the consignee, the opinion adding, "unless placed there by congressional action." These cases led the advocates of prohibition to act upon the suggestion of the court that Congress supply a legislative remedy for the enforcement difficulties which its own decisions had created. The Wilson Act of 1890 provided that interstate shipments of liquor into any state should "upon arrival in such state" be subject to the police powers of the state, regardless of whether or not they remained in the original packages. This statute was upheld in In re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. 865 (1891), the court ruling that the act merely divested liquor transported in interstate commerce of its interstate character, leaving it subject to the power of the states over their internal commerce. "In so doing," said the court, "Congress has not attempted to delegate the power to regulate commerce, or to exercise any power reserved to the states, or to grant a power not possessed by the states, or to adopt state laws. It has taken its own course, and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in state laws in dealing with such property."

As the opinion in the principal case indicates, however, the Wilson Act was interpreted quite literally to mean that state laws could take effect upon an interstate shipment of liquor only after arrival and delivery to the consignee. Thus while the consignee might be prohibited from selling it, he was free to have it shipped into the state for his own consumption. Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. ed. 1088, 18 Sup. Ct. 664 (1898). The next step in the legislative drive to assist the states in their efforts to enforce a prohibition policy was the enactment of the Webb-Kenyon Act, held valid in the principal case.

In 1917, with the Reed "Bone-Dry" Amendment, Congress went still further by forbidding the shipment for personal use of intoxicating liquor into any state which forbade its manufacture or sale, even though the state permitted its introduction for such purpose in limited quantity. The effect of this legislation was thus to make the prohibition states more prohibitory than they elected to be. In sustaining this law the Supreme Court said that while Congress may use its commerce powers in aid of state policy, "it is equally clear that the policy of Congress, acting independently of the states, may induce legislation without reference to the particular policy or law of any given state." United States v. Hill, 248 U. S. 420, 63 L. ed. 337, 39 Sup. Ct. 143 (1919). For the legislative history of the Wilson and Webb-Kenyon Acts, see Dowling and Hubbard, Divesting an Article of its Interstate Character, 5 Minn. L. Rev. 100, 253 (1921).

The Twenty-first Amendment (§ 2) removes all limitations on the power of the states previously placed upon them by the commerce clause in legislating with respect to the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquor for delivery or use within their borders. The Amendment has been held to validate a state statute levying a license fee for the privilege of importing beer into the state, even though the state permits the domestic manufacture of beer. State Board of Equalization of California v. Young's Market Co., 299 U. S. 59, 81 L. ed. 38, 57 Sup. Ct. 77 (1936). A state retaliatory or protective law which forbids sale in the state of beer made in any other state the laws of which discriminate against beer made in the former state, is valid, a state's power to prohibit or regulate the importation of liquor being no longer limited by the commerce clause. Indianapolis Brewing Co. v. Liquor Control Commission, 305 U. S. 391, 83 L. ed. 243, 59 Sup. Ct. 254 (1939). State statutes similar in nature regulating, with penal sanctions, the transportation of intoxicating liquor through the states were sustained as against objections that they encroached upon the commerce power of Congress, in Duckworth v. Arkansas, 314 U. S. 390, 86 L. ed. 294, 62 Sup. Ct. 311, 138 A. L. R. 1144 (1941) and Carter v. Virginia, 321 U. S. 131, 88 L. ed. 605, 64 Sup. Ct. 464 (1944). These decisions, however, were not rested on the Twenty-first Amendment. Ziffrin v. Reeves, 308 U. S. 132, 84 L. ed. 128, 60 Sup. Ct. 163 (1939) sustained a Kentucky statute which forbade transportation of whiskey from the state, as well as in the state, by any carrier not licensed by the state. For a discussion of how the Twenty-first Amendment made a fundamental change in the constitutional relations between the states and the nation with respect to the control of the liquor traffic, see United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, 324 U. S. 293, 89 L. ed. 951, 65 Sup. Ct. 661 (1945). See also, Note, The Twenty-first Amendment Versus the Interstate Commerce Clause, 55 Yale L. J. 815 (1946).

KENTUCKY WHIP & COLLAR CO. v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1937.
299 U. S. 334, 81 L. ed. 270, 57 Sup. Ct. 277.

This controversy relates to the constitutional validity of the Act of Congress of July 24, 1935, known as the Ashurst-Sumners Act. 49 Stat. 494.

The Act makes it unlawful knowingly to transport in interstate or foreign commerce goods made by convict labor into any State where the goods are intended to be received, possessed, sold, or used in violation of its laws. Goods made by convicts on parole or probation, or made in federal penal and correctional institutions for use by the Federal Government, are excepted. Packages containing convict-made goods must be plainly labeled so as to show the names and addresses of shipper and consignee, the nature of the contents, and the name and location of the penal or reformatory institution where produced. Violation is punished by fine and forfeiture.

Petitioner manufactures in Kentucky, with convict labor, horse collars, harness and strap goods which it markets in various States. It tendered to respondent, a common carrier, twenty-five separate shipments for transportation in interstate commerce, of which ten were consigned to customers in States whose laws prohibited the sale of convict-made goods within their respective borders, five to States whose laws did not prohibit such sale but required that the goods should be plainly marked so as to show that they were made by convicts, and the remaining ten to States whose laws imposed no restriction upon sale or possession. None of the packages were labeled as required by the Act of Congress and, in obedience to the Act, respondent refused to accept the shipments.

Petitioner then brought this suit for a mandatory injunction to compel the transportation. The District Court dismissed the bill and the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the decree. The District Court declared the Act to be invalid so far as it prohibited transportation of convict-made goods into States which proscribed sale or possession, but sustained the provision which required labeling. 12 Fed. Supp. 37. The Circuit Court of Appeals sustained the Act in its entirety. 84 F. (2d) 168. This Court granted certiorari.

Petitioner contends (1) that the Congress is without constitutional authority to prohibit the movement in interstate commerce of useful and harmless articles made by convict labor and (2) that the Congress has no power to exclude from interstate commerce convict-made goods which are not labeled as such.

First.—The commerce clause (Art. 1, sec. 8, par. 3) confers upon the Congress "the power to regulate, that is, prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." This power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution." Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 196. By the Act now before us, the Congress purports to establish a rule governing interstate transportation, which is unquestionably interstate commerce. The question is whether this rule goes beyond the authority to "regulate."

Petitioner's argument necessarily recognizes that in certain circumstances an absolute prohibition of interstate transportation is constitutional regulation. The power to prohibit interstate transportation has been upheld by this Court in relation to diseased livestock, lottery tickets, commodities owned by the interstate carrier transporting them, except such as may be required in the conduct of its business as a common carrier, adulterated and misbranded articles, under the Pure Food and Drugs Act, women, for immoral purposes, intoxicating liquors, diseased plants, stolen motor vehicles and kidnaped persons. [Citations omitted.]

The decisions sustaining this variety of statutes disclose the principles deemed to be applicable. We have frequently said that in the exercise of its control over interstate commerce, the means employed by the Congress may have the quality of police regulations. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 215; Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 323; Seven Cases v. United States, 239 U. S. 510, 515. The power was defined in broad terms in Brooks v. United States, 267 U. S. 432, 436, 437: "Congress can certainly regulate interstate commerce to the extent of forbidding and punishing the use of such commerce as an agency to promote immorality, dishonesty or the spread of any evil or harm to the people of other States from the State of origin. In doing this it is merely exercising the police power for the benefit of the public, within the field of interstate commerce."

The anticipated evil or harm may proceed from something inherent in the subject of transportation as in the case of diseased or noxious articles, which are unfit for commerce. Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45; Oregon-Washington R. & N. Co. v. Washington, 270 U. S. 87, 99. Or the evil may lie in the purpose of the transportation, as in the case of lottery tickets, or the transportation of women for immoral purposes. Champion v. Ames, 188 U. S. 321, 358; Hoke v. United States, supra; Cincinnati v. United States, 242 U. S. 470, 486. The prohibition may be designed to give effect to the policies of the Congress in relation to the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, as in the case of commodities owned by interstate carriers. United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366, 415. And, while the power to regulate interstate commerce resides in the Congress, which must determine its own policy, the Congress may shape that policy in the light of the fact that the transportation in interstate commerce, if permitted, would aid in the frustration of valid state laws for the protection of persons and property. Brooks v. United States, supra; Gooch v. United States, 297 U. S. 124.

The contention is inadmissible that the Act of Congress is invalid merely because the horse collars and harness which petitioner manufactures and sells are useful and harmless articles. The motor vehicles, which are the subject of the transportation prohibited in the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act, are in themselves useful and proper subjects of commerce, but their transportation by one who knows they have been stolen is "a gross misuse of interstate commerce" and the Congress may properly punish it "because of its harmful result and its defeat of the property rights of those whose machines against their will are taken into other jurisdictions." Brooks v. United States, supra, p. 439. Similarly, the object of the Federal Kidnaping Act is to aid in the protection of the personal liberty of one who has been unlawfully seized or carried away. Gooch v. United States, supra; compare United States v. Wheeler, 254 U. S. 281.

On the same general principle, the Congress may prevent interstate transportation from being used to bring into a State articles the traffic in which the State has constitutional authority to forbid, and has forbidden, in its internal commerce. In that view, we sustained the acts of Congress designed to prevent the use of interstate transportation to hamper the execution of state policy with respect to traffic in intoxicating liquors. This was not because intoxicating liquors were not otherwise legitimate articles of commerce. On the contrary they were recognized as such "by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress and the decisions of courts". * * *

The course of congressional legislation with respect to convict-made goods has followed closely the precedents as to intoxicating liquors. By the Hawes-Cooper Act of January 19, 1929, the Congress provided that convict-made goods (with certain exceptions) transported into any State should be subject upon arrival, whether in the original packages or otherwise, to the operation of state laws as if produced within the State. In Whitfield v. Ohio, 297 U. S. 431, petitioner was charged in the state court in Ohio with selling convict-made goods in violation of the state law. It appeared that the goods had been sold in the original packages as shipped in interstate commerce and that there was "nothing harmful, injurious or deleterious" about them. But this Court said that the view of the State of Ohio, that the sale of convict-made goods in competition with the products of free labor was an evil, found ample support in fact and in the similar legislation of a preponderant number of other States. The Court observed that the Congress had prohibited the importation of the products of convict labor. All such legislation, state and federal, proceeded upon the view "that free labor, properly compensated, cannot compete successfully with the enforced and unpaid or underpaid convict labor of the prison." The Court upheld the power of the State, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, to base nondiscriminatory legislation upon that conception, and as it appeared that the Ohio statute would be unassailable if made to take effect after sale in the original package, the statute was held to be equally unassailable in the light of the provisions of the Hawes-Cooper Act. As to the validity of the latter Act, the Court followed the decision in In re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, in relation to the Wilson Act.

The Ashurst-Sumners Act as to interstate transportation of convict-made goods has substantially the same provisions as the Webb-Kenyon Act as to intoxicating liquors and finds support in similar considerations. The subject of the prohibited traffic is different, the effects of the traffic are different, but the underlying principle is the same. The pertinent point is that where the subject of commerce is one as to which the power of the State may constitutionally be exerted by restriction or prohibition in order to prevent harmful consequences, the Congress may, if it sees fit, put forth its power to regulate interstate commerce so as to prevent that commerce from being used to impede the carrying out of the state policy.

In the congressional action there is nothing arbitrary or capricious bringing the statute into collision with the requirements of due process of law. The Congress in exercising the power confided to it by the Constitution is as free as the States to recognize the fundamental interests of free labor. Nor has the Congress attempted to delegate its authority to the States. The Congress has not sought to exercise a power not granted or to usurp the police powers of the States. It has not acted on any assumption of a power enlarged by virtue of state action. The Congress has exercised its plenary power which is subject to no limitation other than that which is found in the Constitution itself. The Congress has formulated its own policy and established its own rule. The fact that it has adopted its rule in order to aid the enforcement of valid state laws affords no ground for constitutional objection.

Second.—As the Congress could prohibit the interstate transportation of convict-made goods as provided in section one of the Act, the Congress could require packages containing convict-made goods to be labeled as required by section two. The requirement of labels, disclosing the nature of the contents, the name and location of the penal institution where the goods were produced, and the names and addresses of shippers and consignees, was manifestly reasonable and appropriate for the carrying out of the prohibition. Seven Cases v. United States, supra; Freeman v. United States, 239 U. S. 117; Weeks v. United States, 245 U. S. 618, 622. * * *

The decree is affirmed.

2. In a case arising out of a suit by which the State of Washington sought to collect from the International Shoe Company a contribution or tax payable into the state's unemployment insurance fund, the tax to be equivalent to a stated percentage of the wages paid the employees, it appeared that the only employees this company had in the state were agents that did nothing but solicit orders for goods to be subsequently shipped into the state from this foreign corporation's factory in another state. Admittedly the employees' acts in the state were exclusively acts of interstate commerce, and the claim was made that this exaction of contributions to the fund imposed a burden on such commerce. But the Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Stone, after pointing out that the federal statute (26 U. S. C. § 1606 (a); F. C. A. 26 § 1606 (a)) provides that "no person required under a state law to make payments to an unemployment fund shall be relieved from compliance therewith on the ground that he is engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or that the state law does not distinguish between employees engaged in interstate or foreign commerce and those engaged in intrastate commerce," said: "It is no longer debatable that Congress, in the exercise of the commerce power, may authorize the states, in specified ways, to regulate interstate commerce or impose burdens upon it." Among the several cases cited in support of this statement was the Kentucky Whip and Collar Co. case. International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U. S. 310, 90 L. ed. 95, 66 Sup. Ct. 154, 161 A. L. ## SECOND EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES.

[Error to the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut and to the United States Circuit Courts for the Districts of Minnesota and Massachusetts. The three cases were suits against railroads for personal injuries to employees, brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act of 1908 (35 Stat. 65, c. 149) which declared that "every common carrier by railroad, while engaging in commerce between any of the several states or territories, * * * shall be liable in damages [for injury or death suffered by any person] while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, * * * such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, road-bed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment." Beneficiaries of the action were designated in case of death, and provision was made for survival of the action to designated persons. The defenses of fellow service, contributory negligence, and assumed risk were abrogated or modified, as indicated in the opinion. The Connecticut court declared the Act invalid and the other courts upheld it.]

1. The term "commerce" comprehends more than the mere exchange of goods. It embraces commercial intercourse in all its branches, including transportation of passengers and property by common carriers, whether carried on by water or by land.

2. The phrase "among the several states" marks the distinction, for the purpose of governmental regulation, between commerce which concerns two or more states and commerce which is confined to a single state and does not affect other states, the power to regulate the former being conferred upon Congress and the regulation of the latter remaining with the states severally.

3. "To regulate," in the sense intended, is to foster, protect, control, and restrain, with appropriate regard for the welfare of those who are immediately concerned and of the public at large.

4. This power over commerce among the states, so conferred upon Congress, is complete in itself, extends incidentally to every instrument and agent by which such commerce is carried on, may be exerted to its utmost extent over every part of such commerce, and is subject to no limitations save such as are prescribed in the Constitution. But, of course, it does not extend to any matter or thing which does not have a real or substantial relation to some part of such commerce.

5. Among the instruments and agents to which the power extends are the railroads, over which transportation from one state to another is conducted, the engines and cars by which such transportation is effected, and all who are in any wise engaged in such transportation, whether as common carriers or as their employees.

6. The duties of common carriers in respect of the safety of their employees, while both are engaged in commerce among the states, and the liability of the former for injuries sustained by the latter, while both are so engaged, have a real or substantial relation to such commerce, and therefore are within the range of this power. * * *

In view of these settled propositions, it does not admit of doubt that * * * Congress, in the exertion of its power over interstate commerce, may regulate the relations of common carriers by railroad and their employees while both are engaged in such commerce, subject always to the limitations prescribed in the Constitution, and to the qualification that the particulars in which those relations are regulated must have a real or substantial connection with the interstate commerce in which the carriers and their employees are engaged.

We come, then, to inquire whether Congress has exceeded its power in that regard by prescribing the regulations embodied in the present act. It is objected that it has, (1) because the abrogation of the fellow-servant rule, the extension of the carrier's liability to cases of death, and the restriction of the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk, have no tendency to promote the safety of the employees, or to advance the commerce in which they are engaged; (2) because the liability imposed for injuries sustained by one employee through the negligence of another, although confined to instances where the injured employee is engaged in interstate commerce, is not confined to instances where both employees are so engaged. * * *

Briefly stated, the departures from the common law made by the portions of the act against which the first objection is leveled are these: (a) The rule that the negligence of one employee resulting in injury to another was not to be attributed to their common employer is displaced by a rule imposing upon the employer responsibility for such an injury, as was done at common law when the injured person was not an employee; (b) the rule exonerating an employer from liability for injury sustained by an employee through the concurring negligence of the employer and the employee is abrogated in all instances where the employer's violation of a statute enacted for the safety of his employees contributes to the injury, and in other instances is displaced by the rule of comparative negligence, whereby the exoneration is only from a proportional part of the damages corresponding to the amount of negligence attributable to the employee; (c) the rule that an employee was deemed to assume the risk of injury, even if due to the employer's negligence, where the employee voluntarily entered or remained in the service with an actual or presumed knowledge of the conditions out of which the risk arose, is abrogated in all instances where the employer's violation of a statute enacted for the safety of his employees contributed to the injury; and (d) the rule denying a right of action for the death of one person, caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, is displaced by a rule vesting such a right of action in the personal representatives of the deceased, for the benefit of designated relatives. * * *

Of the objection to these changes it is enough to observe: * * *

Second. The natural tendency of the changes described is to impel the carriers to avoid or prevent the negligent acts and omissions which are made the bases of the rights of recovery which the statute creates and defines; and as whatever makes for that end tends to promote the safety of the employees and to advance the commerce in which they are engaged, we entertain no doubt that in making those changes Congress acted within the limits of the discretion confided to it by the Constitution. * * *

We are not unmindful that that end was being measurably attained through the remedial legislation of the several states, but that legislation has been far from uniform, and it undoubtedly rested with Congress to determine whether a national law, operating uniformly in all the states, upon all carriers by railroad engaged in interstate commerce, would better subserve the needs of that commerce. * * *

The second objection proceeds upon the theory that, even although Congress has power to regulate the liability of a carrier for injuries sustained by one employee in interstate commerce, that power does not embrace instances where the negligent employee is engaged in intrastate commerce. But this is a mistaken theory, in that it treats the source of the injury, rather than its effect upon interstate commerce, as the criterion of congressional power. As was said in Southern Railway Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20, 27, that power is plenary, and competently may be exerted to secure the safety of interstate transportation and of those who are employed therein, no matter what the source of the dangers which threaten it. The present act, unlike the one condemned in Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463, deals only with the liability of a carrier engaged in interstate commerce for injuries sustained by its employees while engaged in such commerce. And this being so, it is not a valid objection that the act embraces instances where the casual negligence is that of an employee engaged in intrastate commerce; for such negligence, when operating injuriously upon an employee engaged in interstate commerce, has the same effect upon that commerce as if the negligent employee were also engaged therein. * * *

[The judgment of the Connecticut court was reversed and those of the Circuit Courts of the United States for Minnesota and Massachusetts were affirmed.]

NOTES

1. The first Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1906 was held unconstitutional because it made employers responsible not only to employees engaged in interstate commerce, but to any employees, whether engaged in interstate or intrastate commerce. Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. 141 (1908).

2. The Hours of Service Act of 1907, which forbade the employment of railroad trainmen, engaged in interstate transportation, more than sixteen consecutive hours, was sustained in Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 55 L. ed. 878, 31 Sup. Ct. 621 (1911). The court said that the length of hours of service has "direct relation to the efficiency of the human agencies upon which protection to life and property necessarily depends" and that it was competent for Congress to consider, and attempt to curtail, the dangers to employees incident to the strain of excessive hours of duty.

3. Congress can prescribe the number of hours per day or week that railway employees shall be permitted to work in interstate commerce, and prescribe the wages to be paid them during a period of emergency, when because of a failure of employers and employees to agree upon a scale of wages a strike of such employees throughout the United States is threatened, which would stop interstate transportation. Wilson v. New, 243 U. S. 332, 61 L. ed. 755, 37 Sup. Ct. 298, L. R. A. 1917E, 938, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 1024 (1917).

SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1911.
222 U. S. 20, 56 L. ed. 72, 32 Sup. Ct. 2.

Error to the District Court of the United States.

[This was a civil action by the United States to recover penalties for hauling five cars having defective couplers in violation of the federal Safety Appliance Act, which as amended March 2, 1903, 32 Stat. 943, c. 976, applied to all cars used on "any railroad engaged in interstate commerce." The defendant's road was used for both interstate and intrastate transportation. The trial court gave judgment for penalties as to all five cars, three of which were moving intrastate traffic only and it did not appear that they were being hauled in connection with any car or cars moving interstate traffic.]

* * *

It must be held that the original act, as enlarged by the amendatory one, is intended to embrace all locomotives, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railroad which is a highway of interstate commerce.

We come, then, to the question whether these acts are within the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution, considering that they are not confined to vehicles used in moving interstate traffic, but embrace vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic. The answer to this question depends upon another, which is, Is there a real or substantial relation or connection between what is required by these acts in respect of vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic, and the object which the acts obviously are designed to attain; namely, the safety of interstate commerce and of those who are employed in its movement? Or, stating it in another way, Is there such a close or direct relation or connection between the two classes of traffic, when moving over the same railroad, as to make it certain that the safety of the interstate traffic and of those who are employed in its movement will be promoted in a real or substantial sense by applying the requirements of these acts to vehicles used in moving the traffic which is intrastate as well as to those used in moving that which is interstate? If the answer to this question, as doubly stated, be in the affirmative, then the principal question must be answered in the same way. And this is so, not because Congress possesses any power to regulate intrastate commerce as such, but because its power to regulate interstate commerce is plenary, and competently may be exerted to secure the safety of the persons and property transported therein and of those who are employed in such transportation, no matter what may be the source of the dangers which threaten it. That is to say, it is no objection to such an exertion of this power that the dangers intended to be avoided arise, in whole or in part, out of matters connected with intrastate commerce.

Speaking only of railroads which are highways of both interstate and intrastate commerce, these things are of common knowledge: Both classes of traffic are at times carried in the same car, and when this is not the case, the cars in which they are carried are frequently commingled in the same train and in the switching and other movements at terminals. Cars are seldom set apart for exclusive use in moving either class of traffic, but generally are used interchangeably in moving both; and the situation is much the same with trainmen, switchmen, and like employees, for they usually, if not necessarily, have to do with both classes of traffic. Besides, the several trains on the same railroad are not independent in point of movement and safety, but are interdependent; for whatever brings delay or disaster to one, or results in disabling one of its operatives, is calculated to impede the progress and imperil the safety of other trains. And so the absence of appropriate safety appliances from any part of any train is a menace not only to that train, but to others.

These practical considerations make it plain, as we think, that the questions before stated must be answered in the affirmative.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE

1. When Congress, in 1934, passed an act establishing a compulsory retirement and pension system for employees of railroads subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, to be financed by the carriers and their employees and administered by a federal agency, the Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, held the statute void as not falling within the congressional power to regulate commerce and as violative of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Co., 295 U. S. 330, 79 L. ed. 1468, 55 Sup. Ct. 758 (1935). The majority opinion, by Justice Roberts, said that the purpose of the legislation was outside the scope of the commerce clause because the employment of superannuated trainmen did not endanger efficiency of operations and that there was no relationship between the assurance of security for the workers' old age and employee morale. Chief Justice Hughes, dissenting with the concurrence of Justices Brandeis, Stone and Cardozo, said that this result was "a departure from sound principles and places an unwarranted limitation upon the commerce clause of the Constitution." To the dissenting justices it was clear that the morale of railroad employees has an important bearing upon the efficiency of the interstate transportation service, and that a reasonable pension plan by its assurance of security is an appropriate means to that end. At best, the question as to the extent of superannuation, and its effect, was a debatable one, and hence one upon which Congress was entitled to form a legislative judgment. See Powell, Commerce, Pensions, and Codes, 49 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 193 (1935).

Following the decision in the Alton case, Congress passed two acts, one imposing excise taxes upon railroad carriers and their employees, the money to be paid into the treasury of the United States but not to be set up as a separate fund, the other providing for payment of annuities to railroad employees from the treasury. These acts sought to avoid the exercise of the commerce power and to rely upon the taxing and spending powers of Congress. This legislation was revised in 1946 (26 U. S. C. § 1500 et seq.; F. C. A. 26 § 1500 et seq.) and the validity of the earlier legislative technique was never judicially tested.

The rationale of the Alton decision was repudiated in United States v. Lowden, 308 U. S. 225, 84 L. ed. 208, 60 Sup. Ct. 248 (1939), where the court sustained the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a railroad consolidation proceeding under the Transportation Act of 1920, to require as a condition for approval of a lease of railroad property by one railroad company to another that the lessee comply with certain terms intended to distribute part of the savings of the new operating arrangement to those workers who would incur financial loss from its being put into effect. Such losses included salary reductions incident to seniority shifts affecting retained employees, reimbursement of the moving expenses of employees transferred to new locations, together with losses incurred by the latter group through being forced to sell their homes. The court, through Justice Stone, said: "One must disregard the entire history of railroad labor relations in the United States to be able to say that the just and reasonable treatment of railroad employees in mitigation of the hardship imposed upon them in carrying out the national policy of railway consolidation, has no bearing on the successful prosecution of that policy and no relationship to the maintenance of an adequate and efficient transportation system." Referring to the Alton case the court said that "notwithstanding what was said there" it could not say that the "congressional judgment that those conditions have a relation to the public interest as defined by the statute is without rational basis."

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN v. CHICAGO,
BURLINGTON & QUINCY R. CO.

The proceeding out of which this case has grown, known as the "Wisconsin Passenger Fares," began in an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, under paragraphs 3 and 4 of § 13 of the Interstate Commerce Act as amended by § 416 of the Transportation Act of 1920 (41 Stat. 484), into alleged undue and unreasonable discrimination against interstate commerce arising out of intrastate railroad rates in Wisconsin. The interstate carriers by steam railroad of the state were made respondents, and the Governor and State Railroad Commission were duly notified. The Interstate Commerce Commission made its report and order November 27, 1920. Wisconsin Passenger Fares, 59 I. C. C. 391.

The Commission had investigated the interstate rates of carriers in the United States, in a proceeding known as Ex parte 74, Increased Rates, 58 I. C. C. 220, for the purpose of complying with § 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by § 422 of the Transportation Act of 1920 (41 Stat. 488). That section requires that the Commission so adjust rates that the revenues of the carriers shall enable them as a whole or by groups to earn a fixed net income on their railway property. The Commission ordered an increase for the carriers in the group of which the Wisconsin carriers were a part, of 35 per cent. in interstate freight rates, and 20 per cent. in interstate passenger fares and excess baggage charges, and a surcharge upon passengers in sleeping cars amounting to 50 per cent. of the charge for space in such cars to accrue to the rail carriers. Thereupon the carriers applied to the Wisconsin Railroad Commission for corresponding increases in intrastate rates. The state commission granted increases in intrastate freight rates of 35 per cent., but denied any in intrastate passenger fares and charges on the sole ground that a state statute prescribed a maximum for passengers of 2 cents a mile.

In the Wisconsin Passenger Fares, the Interstate Commerce Commission found that all of the respondent carriers of Wisconsin transported both intrastate and interstate passengers on the same train, with the same service and accommodations; that the state passenger paying the lower rate rode on the same train, in the same car, and perhaps in the same seat with the interstate passenger who paid the higher rate; that the circumstances and conditions were substantially similar for interstate as for intrastate passenger service in Wisconsin; that travelers destined to, or coming from, points outside the state, found it cheaper to pay the intrastate fare within Wisconsin and the interstate fare beyond the border than to pay the through interstate fare; that undue preference and prejudice were shown by the falling off of sales of tickets from border line points in Minnesota and Michigan to stations in Wisconsin, and by a marked increase in sales of local tickets from corresponding border line points in Wisconsin to stations in Wisconsin; that the evidence as to the practice with respect to passenger fares applied in like manner to the surcharge upon passengers in sleeping and parlor cars and to excess baggage charges.

The Commission further found that the fare necessary to fulfil the requirement as to net income of this interstate railroad group under § 15a was 3.6 cents per mile, and that this was reasonable, that the direct revenue loss to the Wisconsin carriers, due to their failure to secure the 20 per cent. increase in intrastate fares, would approximate $2,400,000 per year if the 3-cent fare fixed by the President under federal war control were continued, and $6,000,000 per year if the 2-cent fare named in the state statute should become effective.

[Thereupon the Commission fixed a minimum for intrastate passenger fares in Wisconsin at 3.6 cents per mile. The carriers filed bills in the United States District Court to enjoin the State Railroad Commission and other state officials from interference with their charging the rates thus fixed, and applied for an interlocutory injunction. From a decree granting the latter this appeal was taken.]

Paragraph 4 of § 13 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by the Transportation Act of 1920 * * * authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission, after a prescribed investigation, to remove "Any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference, or prejudice as between persons or localities in intrastate commerce on the one hand and interstate or foreign commerce on the other hand, or any undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce." * * *

Second. The report of the Commission shows that if the intrastate passenger fares in Wisconsin are to be limited by the statute of that state to 2 cents per mile, and charges for extra baggage and sleeping car accommodations are to be reduced in corresponding degree, the net income of the interstate carriers of the state will be cut six millions of dollars below what it would be under intrastate rates on the same level with interstate rates. Under * * * the Transportation Act of 1920 are such reduction and disparity an "undue, unreasonable or unjust discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce" which the Interstate Commerce Commission may remove by raising the intrastate fares? A short reference to the circumstances inducing the legislation and a summary of its relevant provisions will aid the answer to this question.

The Interstate Commerce Act of 1887, 24 Stat. 379, was enacted by Congress to prevent interstate railroad carriers from charging unreasonable rates and from unjustly discriminating between persons and localities. The railroads availed themselves of the weakness and cumbrous machinery of the original law to defeat its purpose, and this led to various amendments culminating in the amending Act of 1910, 36 Stat. 539, in which the authority of the Commission in dealing with the carriers was made summary and effectively complete. Whatever the causes, the fact was that the carrying capacity of the railroads did not thereafter develop proportionately with the growth of the country, and it became difficult for them to secure additional investment of capital on feasible terms. When the extraordinary demand for transportation arose in 1917, the Congress and the President concluded to take over all the railroads into the management of the federal government, and by joint use of facilities, which the Anti-Trust Law was thought to forbid under private management, and by use of government credit, to increase their effectiveness. This was done by appropriate legislation and executive action under the war power. From January 1, 1918, until March 1, 1920, when the Transportation Act went into effect, the common carriers by steam railroad of the country were operated by the federal government. Due to the rapid rise in the prices of material and labor in 1918 and 1919, the expense of their operation had enormously increased by the time it was proposed to return the railroads to their owners. The owners insisted that their properties could not be turned back to them by the government for useful operation without provision to aid them to meet a situation in which they were likely to face a demoralizing lack of credit and income. Congress acquiesced in this view. The Transportation Act of 1920 was the result. It was adopted after elaborate investigations by the Interstate Commerce Committees of the two Houses.

Under Title II it made provision for the termination of federal control March 1, 1920, for the refunding of the carriers' indebtedness to the United States, and for a guaranty for six months to the carriers of an income equal to the war-time rental for their properties, and directed that for two years following the termination of federal control, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon certificate of the Commission might make loans to the carriers not exceeding the maximum amount recommended in the certificate, out of a revolving fund of $300,000,000.

Under Title IV amendments were made to the Interstate Commerce Act which included § 13, paragraphs 3 and 4, and § 15a, \* \* \*. The former for the first time authorizes the Commission to deal directly with intrastate rates where they are unduly discriminating against interstate commerce—a power already indirectly exercised as to persons and localities, with approval of this court in the Shreveport and other cases. The latter, the most novel and most important feature of the act, requires the Commission so to prescribe rates as to enable the carriers as a whole or in groups selected by the Commission, to earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal to a fair return on the aggregate value of the railway property used in transportation. For two years, the return is to be  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., with  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. for improvements, and thereafter is to be fixed by the Commission.

The act sought to avoid excessive incomes accruing, under the operation of § 15a, to the carriers better circumstanced by using the excess for loans to the others and for other purposes. The act further put under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, 1st, the issuing of future railroad securities by the interstate carriers; 2nd, the regulation of their car supply and distribution and the joint use of terminals; and, 3rd, their construction of new lines, and their abandonment of old lines. The validity of some of these provisions has been questioned. Upon that we express no opinion. We only refer to them to show the scope of the congressional purpose in the act.

It is manifest from this very condensed recital that the act made a new departure. Theretofore the control which Congress through the Interstate Commerce Commission exercised was primarily for the purpose of preventing injustice by unreasonable or discriminatory rates against persons and localities, and the only provisions of the law that inured to the benefit of the carriers were the requirement that the rates should be reasonable in the sense of furnishing an adequate compensation for the particular service rendered and the abolition of rebates. The new measure imposed an affirmative duty on the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates and to take other important steps to maintain an adequate railway service for the people of the United States. This is expressly declared in § 15a to be one of the purposes of the bill.

Intrastate rates and the income from them must play a most important part in maintaining an adequate national railway system. Twenty per cent. of the gross freight receipts of the railroads of the country are from intrastate traffic, and 50 per cent. of the passenger receipts. The ratio of the gross intrastate revenue to the interstate revenue is a little less than one to three. If the rates, on which such receipts are based, are to be fixed at a substantially lower level than in interstate traffic, the share which the intrastate traffic will contribute will be proportionately less. If the railways are to earn a fixed net percentage of income, the lower the intrastate rates, the higher the interstate rates may have to be. The effective operation of the act will reasonably and justly require that intrastate traffic should pay a fair proportionate share of the cost of maintaining an adequate railway system. Section 15a confers no power on the Commission to deal with intrastate rates. What is done under that section is to be done by the Commission "in the exercise of its powers to prescribe just and reasonable rates," i. e., powers derived from previous amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act, which have never been construed or used to embrace the prescribing of intrastate rates. When we turn to paragraph 4, § 13, however, and find the Commission for the first time vested with a direct power to remove "any undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce," it is impossible to escape the dovetail relation between that provision and the purpose of § 15a. If that purpose is interfered with by a disparity of intrastate rates, the Commission is authorized to end the disparity by directly removing it, because it is plainly an "undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce," within the ordinary meaning of those words. * * *

It is objected here, as it was in the Shreveport Case, that orders of the Commission which raise the intrastate rates to a level of the interstate structure violate the specific proviso of the original Interstate Commerce Act repeated in the amending acts, that the Commission is not to regulate traffic wholly within a state. To this, the same answer must be made as was made in the Shreveport Case (234 U. S. 342, 358), that such orders as to intrastate traffic are merely incidental to the regulation of interstate commerce and necessary to its efficiency. Effective control of the one must embrace some control over the other in view of the blending of both in actual operation. The same rails and the same cars carry both. The same men conduct them. Commerce is a unit and does not regard state lines, and while, under the Constitution, interstate and intrastate commerce are ordinarily subject to regulation by different sovereignties, yet when they are so mingled together that the supreme authority, the nation, cannot exercise complete effective control over interstate commerce without incidental regulation of intrastate commerce, such incidental regulation is not an invasion of state authority or a violation of the proviso. * * *

Counsel for the appellants have not contested the constitutional validity of the statute construed as we have construed it, although the counsel for the state commissions whom we permitted to file briefs as amici curiae have done so. The principles laid down by this court in the Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, 432, 433, the Shreveport Case, 234 U. S. 342, 351, and the Illinois Central Case, 245 U. S. 493, 506, which are rates cases, and in the analogous cases of Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 618; Southern Ry. Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20, 26, 27; Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 48, 51, we think, leave no room for discussion on this point. Congress in its control of its interstate commerce system is seeking in the Transportation Act to make the system adequate to the needs of the country by securing for it a reasonable compensatory return for all the work it does. The states are seeking to use that same system for intrastate traffic. That entails large duties and expenditures on the interstate commerce system which may burden it unless compensation is received for the intrastate business reasonably proportionate to that for the interstate business. Congress as the dominant controller of interstate commerce may, therefore, restrain undue limitation of the earning power of the interstate commerce system in doing state work. The affirmative power of Congress in developing interstate commerce agencies is clear. Wilson v.

Shaw, 204 U. S. 24; Luxton v. North River Bridge Co., 153 U. S. 525; California v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 39. In such development, it can impose any reasonable condition on a state's use of interstate carriers for intrastate commerce, it deems necessary or desirable. This is because of the supremacy of the national power in this field. * * *

It is said that our conclusion gives the Commission unified control of interstate and intrastate commerce. It is only unified to the extent of maintaining efficient regulation of interstate commerce under the paramount power of Congress. It does not involve general regulation of intrastate commerce. Action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in this regard should be directed to substantial disparity which operates as a real discrimination against, and obstruction to, interstate commerce, and must leave appropriate discretion to the state authorities to deal with intrastate rates as between themselves on the general level which the Interstate Commerce Commission has found to be fair to interstate commerce. * * *

The order of the District Court granting the interlocutory injunction is Affirmed.

NOTES

1. Federal regulation of intrastate railroad rates where necessary in order to remove discriminations against interstate commerce resulting from the level at which such rates are maintained by the states is an application of the principle that Congress may protect interstate commerce not merely from the activities of those directly engaged therein but also from adverse state action. Houston, East & West Texas R. Co. v. United States, 234 U. S. 342, 58 L. ed. 1341, 34 Sup. Ct. 833 (1914)—the Shreveport Rate Case—was the first decision of the Supreme Court upholding the exertion of federal power in this respect.

2. In Dayton-Goose Creek R. Co. v. United States, 263 U. S. 456, 68 L. ed. 388, 44 Sup. Ct. 169, 33 A. L. R. 472 (1924), in sustaining the "recapture clause" of the Transportation Act of 1920, which provided for the use of the excess profits of some railroads for the benefit of those which were unable to get a fair return on their investment under the rates established for them by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the court said: "If the weaker roads were permitted to charge higher rates than their competitors, the business would seek the stronger roads with the lower rates, and congestion would follow. The directions given to the Commission in fixing uniform rates will tend to put them on a scale enabling a railroad of average efficiency among all the carriers of the section to earn the prescribed maximum return. Those who earn more must hold one-half of the excess primarily to preserve their sound economic condition and avoid wasteful expenditures and unwise dividends. Those who earn less are to be given help by credit secured through a fund made up of the other half of the excess. By the recapture clauses Congress is enabled to maintain uniform rates for all shippers and yet keep the net returns of railways, whether strong or weak, to the varying percentages which are fair respectively for them. The recapture clauses are thus the key provision of the whole plan." See also Colorado v. United States, 271 U. S. 153, 70 L. ed. 878, 46 Sup. Ct. 452 (1926), upholding the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to authorize an interstate rail carrier to abandon an unprofitable intrastate branch line of its operations.

STAFFORD v. WALLACE.

[These cases were appeals from orders of the United States District Court for the northern district of Illinois refusing to grant interlocutory injunctions against the Secretary of Agriculture. They involved the constitutionality of the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, so far as that Act provided for the supervision by the federal government of the business of the commission men and livestock dealers in the great stockyards of the country.]

The Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 seeks to regulate the business of the packers done in interstate commerce and forbids them to engage in unfair, discriminatory, or deceptive practices in such commerce, or to subject any person to unreasonable prejudice therein, or to do any of a number of acts to control prices or establish a monopoly in the business. It constitutes the Secretary of Agriculture a tribunal to hear complaints and make findings thereon, and to order the packers to cease any forbidden practice. An appeal is given to the Circuit Court of Appeals from these findings and orders. They are to be enforced by the District Court by penalty if not appealed from and if disobeyed. Title III concerns the stockyards and provides for the supervision and control of the facilities furnished therein in connection with the receipt, purchase, sale on commission basis, or otherwise, of livestock, and its care, shipment, weighing, or handling in interstate commerce. A stockyard is defined to be a place conducted for profit as a public market, with pens in which livestock are received and kept for sale or shipment in interstate commerce. Yards with a superficial area less than 20,000 square feet are not within the Act. Stockyard owners, commission men, and dealers are recognized and defined, and the two latter are required to register. The Act requires that all rates and charges for services and facilities in the stockyards and all practices in connection with the livestock passing through the yards shall be just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and nondeceptive, and that a schedule of such charges shall be kept open for public inspection, and only be changed after ten days' notice to the Secretary of Agriculture, who is made a tribunal to inquire as to the justice, reasonableness, and nondiscriminatory or nondeceptive character of every charge and practice, and to order that it cease, if found to offend, with the same provisions for appeal and enforcement in court as in the case of offending packers. The Secretary is given power to make rules and regulations to carry out the provisions, to fix rates, or a minimum or maximum thereof, and to prescribe how every packer, stockyard owner, commission man, and dealer shall keep accounts. * * *

The object to be secured by the Act is the free and unburdened flow of livestock from the ranges and farms of the West and the Southwest through the great stockyards and slaughtering centers on the borders of that region, and thence in the form of meat products to the consuming cities of the country in the Middle West and East, or, still, as livestock, to the feeding places and fattening farms in the Middle West or East for further preparation for the market.

The chief evil feared is the monopoly of the packers, enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to lower prices to the shipper, who sells, and unduly and arbitrarily to increase the price to the consumer, who buys. Congress thought that the power to maintain this monopoly was aided by control of the stockyards. Another evil, which it sought to provide against by the act, was exorbitant charges, duplication of commissions, deceptive practices in respect of prices, in the passage of the livestock through the stockyards, all made possible by collusion between the stockyards management and the commission men, on the one hand, and the packers and dealers, on the other. Expenses incurred in the passage through the stockyards necessarily reduce the price received by the shipper, and increase the price to be paid by the consumer. If they be exorbitant or unreasonable, they are an undue burden on the commerce which the stockyards are intended to facilitate. Any unjust or deceptive practice or combination that unduly and directly enhances them is an unjust obstruction to that commerce. The shipper, whose livestock are being cared for and sold in the stockyards market, is ordinarily not present at the sale, but is far away in the West. He is wholly dependent on the commission men. The packers and their agents and the dealers, who are the buyers, are at the elbow of the commission men, and their relations are constant and close. The control that the packers have had in the stockyards by reason of ownership and constant use, the relation of landlord and tenant between the stockyards owner, on the one hand, and the commission men and the dealers, on the other, the power of assignment of pens and other facilities by that owner to commission men and dealers, all create a situation full of opportunity and temptation, to the prejudice of the absent shipper and owner in the neglect of the livestock, in the mala fides of the sale, in the exorbitant prices obtained, and in the unreasonableness of the charges for services rendered.

The stockyards are not a place of rest or final destination. Thousands of head of livestock arrive daily by carload and trainload lots, and must be promptly sold and disposed of and move out, to give place to the constantly flowing traffic that presses behind. The stockyards are but a throat through which the current flows, and the transactions which occur therein are only incident to this current from the West to the East, and from one state to another. Such transactions cannot be separated from the movement to which they contribute and necessarily take on its character. The commission men are essential in making the sales, without which the flow of the current would be obstructed, and this, whether they are made to packers or dealers. The dealers are essential to the sales to the stock farmers and feeders. The sales are not in this aspect merely local transactions. They create a local change of title, it is true, but they do not stop the flow; they merely change the private interests in the subject of the current, not interfering with, but, on the contrary, being indispensable to, its continuity. The origin of the livestock is in the West; its ultimate destination, known to, and intended by, all engaged in the business, is in the Middle West and East, either as meat products or stock for feeding and fattening. This is the definite and well-understood course of business. The stockyards and the sales are necessary factors in the middle of this current of commerce.

The Act, therefore, treats the various stockyards of the country as great national public utilities to promote the flow of commerce from the ranges and farms of the West to the consumers in the East. It assumes that they conduct a business affected by a public use of a national character and subject to national regulation. * * * The only question here is whether the business done in the stockyards, between the receipt of the livestock in the yards and the shipment of them therefrom, is a part of interstate commerce, or is so associated with it as to bring it within the power of national regulation. A similar question has been before this Court and had great consideration in Swift v. United States, 196 U. S. 375. * * * [There the Court said:]

"Commerce among the states is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business. When cattle are sent for sale from a place in one state, with the expectation that they will end their transit, after purchase, in another, and when in effect they do so, with only the interruption necessary to find a purchaser at the stockyards, and when this is a typical, constantly recurring course, the current thus existing is a current of commerce among the states, and the purchase of the cattle is a part and incident of such commerce. What we say is true at least of such a purchase by residents in another state from that of the seller and of the cattle."

The application of the commerce clause of the Constitution in the Swift Case was the result of the natural development of interstate commerce under modern conditions. It was the inevitable recognition of the great central fact that such streams of commerce from one part of the country to another, which are ever flowing, are in their very essence the commerce among the states and with foreign nations, which historically it was one of the chief purposes of the Constitution to bring under national protection and control. This Court declined to defeat this purpose in respect of such a stream and take it out of complete national regulation by a nice and technical inquiry into the noninterstate character of some of its necessary incidents and facilities, when considered alone and without reference to their association with the movement of which they were an essential but subordinate part.

The principles of the Swift Case have become a fixed rule of this court in the construction and application of the commerce clause. Its latest expression on the subject is found in Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co., 258 U. S. 50. In that case it was held, on the authority of the Swift Case, that the delivery and sale of wheat by farmers to local grain elevators in North Dakota, to be shipped to Minneapolis, when practically all the wheat purchased by such elevators was so shipped, and the price was fixed by that in the Minneapolis market, less profit and freight, constituted a course of business, and determined the interstate character of the transaction. Accordingly a state statute, which sought to regulate the price and profit of such sales, and was found to interfere with the free flow of interstate commerce, was declared invalid as a violation of the commerce clause. * * *

Of course, what we are considering here is not a bill in equity or an indictment charging conspiracy to obstruct interstate commerce, but a law. The language of the law shows that what Congress had in mind primarily was to prevent such conspiracies by supervision of the agencies which would be likely to be employed in it. If Congress could provide for punishment or restraint of such conspiracies after their formation through the Anti-Trust Law as in the Swift Case, certainly it may provide regulation to prevent their formation. The reasonable fear by Congress that such acts, usually lawful and affecting only intrastate commerce when considered alone, will probably and more or less constantly be used in conspiracies against interstate commerce or constitute a direct and undue burden on it, expressed in this remedial legislation, serves the same purpose as the intent charged in the Swift indictment to bring acts of a similar character into the current of interstate commerce for federal restraint. Whatever amounts to more or less constant practice, and threatens to obstruct or unduly to burden the freedom of interstate commerce is within the regulatory power of Congress under the commerce clause, and it is primarily for Congress to consider and decide the fact of the danger and meet it. This Court will certainly not substitute its judgment for that of Congress in such a matter unless the relation of the subject to interstate commerce and its effect upon it are clearly nonexistent.

In United States v. Ferger, 250 U. S. 199, the validity of an act of Congress punishing forgery and utterance of bills of lading for fictitious shipments in interstate commerce was in question. It was contended that there was and could be no commerce in a fraudulent and fictitious bill of lading, and therefore that the power of Congress could not embrace such pretended bill. In upholding the act, this court, speaking through Chief Justice White, answered the objection by saying:

"But this mistakenly assumes that the power of Congress is to be necessarily tested by the intrinsic existence of commerce in the particular subject dealt with, instead of by the relation of that subject to commerce and its effect upon it. We say mistakenly assumes, because we think it clear that if the proposition were sustained, it would destroy the power of Congress to regulate, as obviously that power, if it is to exist, must include the authority to deal with obstructions to interstate commerce (In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564), and with a host of other acts which, because of their relation to and influence upon interstate commerce, come within the power of Congress to regulate, although they are not interstate commerce in and of themselves." * * *

As already noted, the word "commerce," when used in the Act, is defined to be interstate and foreign commerce. Its provisions are carefully drawn to apply only to those practices and obstructions which in the judgment of Congress are likely to affect interstate commerce prejudicially. Thus construed and applied, we think the Act clearly within Congressional power and valid. * * *

The orders of the District Court refusing the interlocutory injunctions are Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS dissents.

NOTES

1. The Grain Futures Act of 1922, regulating boards of trade and members thereof engaged in sales of grain for future delivery, was upheld as a valid regulation of interstate commerce in Board of Trade v. Olsen, 262 U. S. 1, 67 L. ed. 839, 43 Sup. Ct. 470 (1923). In sustaining the law, the court noted the findings of congressional committees that such trading in "futures" is affected with a national public interest and that it results in unreasonable fluctuation in the price structure, thus acting as an obstruction to and burden upon such commerce.

2. The federal government may fix the rate of commission to be charged by stockyards commission-men on sales of cattle made by them as agents. Tagg Bros. & Moorhead v. United States, 280 U. S. 420, 74 L. ed. 524, 50 Sup. Ct. 220 (1930), the court saying: "Plaintiffs perform an indispensable service in the interstate commerce in livestock. They enjoy a substantial monopoly at the Omaha stockyards. They had eliminated rate competition and had substituted therefor rates fixed by agreement among themselves, without consulting the shippers and others who pay the rates. They had bound themselves to maintain uniform charges, regardless of the differences in experience, skill, and industry. The purpose of the regulation attacked is to prevent their service from thus becoming an undue burden upon, and obstruction of, that commerce."

3. Acting under authority of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, the Secretary of Agriculture issued an order regulating the handling of milk in the New York metropolitan area. This order was based upon findings that two-thirds of the milk produced for the New York marketing area moved in interstate commerce and that the remaining one-third produced within New York was "physically and inextricably intermingled" with the interstate milk; and that all was handled either in the current of interstate commerce or so as to affect such commerce in milk and its products. The Secretary's order fixing a minimum price for milk was sustained in United States v. Rock Royal Co-Operative, 307 U. S. 533, 83 L. ed. 1446, 59 Sup. Ct. 993 (1939), the court holding that in interstate commerce Congress has the same power as that enjoyed by the states in the regulation of prices for the handling and selling of commodities within their internal commerce. Three years later it was held that this act validly authorized the fixing of minimum producer prices for milk destined for consumption in the same state, the reason being that the regulation of the price of milk moving in interstate commerce extends to such control of intrastate transactions as is necessary to make the act effective and includes the authority to make regulations for the marketing of intrastate milk where its sale and competition with interstate milk affects the general price structure, thus interfering with congressional policy. United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., 315 U. S. 110, 86 L. ed. 726, 62 Sup. Ct. 523 (1942). Federal control of production through establishing marketing quotas in interstate commerce, as provided for in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, was sustained in Mulford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38, 83 L. ed. 1092, 59 Sup. Ct. 648 (1939).

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD v. JONES & LAUGHLIN STEEL CORPORATION.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1937.

In a proceeding under the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, the National Labor Relations Board found that the petitioner, Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, had violated the Act by engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce. The proceeding was instituted by the Beaver Valley Lodge No. 200, affiliated with the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers of America, a labor organization. The unfair labor practices charged were that the corporation was discriminating against members of the union with regard to hire and tenure of employment, and was coercing and intimidating its employees in order to interfere with their self-organization. The discriminatory and coercive action alleged was the discharge of certain employees.

The National Labor Relations Board, sustaining the charge, ordered the corporation to cease and desist from such discrimination and coercion, to offer reinstatement to ten of the employees named, to make good their losses in pay, and to post for thirty days notices that the corporation would not discharge or discriminate against members, or those desiring to become members, of the labor union. As the corporation failed to comply, the Board petitioned the Circuit Court of Appeals to enforce the order. The court denied the petition, holding that the order lay beyond the range of federal power. 83 F. (2d) 998. We granted certiorari.

The scheme of the National Labor Relations Act—which is too long to be quoted in full—may be briefly stated. The first section sets forth findings with respect to the injury to commerce resulting from the denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and from the refusal of employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining. There follows a declaration that it is the policy of the United States to eliminate these causes of obstruction to the free flow of commerce. The Act then defines the terms it uses, including the terms "commerce" and "affecting commerce." Sec. 2. It creates the National Labor Relations Board and prescribes its organization. Secs. 3-6. It sets forth the right of employees to self-organization and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. Sec. 7. It defines "unfair labor practices." Sec. 8. It lays down rules as to the representation of employees for the purpose of collective bargaining. Sec. 9. The Board is empowered to prevent the described unfair labor practices affecting commerce and the Act prescribes the procedure to that end. The Board is authorized to petition designated courts to secure the enforcement of its order. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, are to be conclusive. If either party on application to the court shows that additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearings before the Board, the court may order the additional evidence to be taken. Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board may obtain a review in the designated courts with the same procedure as in the case of an application by the Board for the enforcement of its order. * * *

Contesting the ruling of the Board, the respondent argues (1) that the Act is in reality a regulation of labor relations and not of interstate commerce; (2) that the Act can have no application to the respondent's relations with its production employees because they are not subject to regulation by the federal government; * * *

The facts as to the nature and scope of business of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation have been found by the Labor Board and, so far as they are essential to the determination of this controversy, they are not in dispute. The Labor Board has found: The corporation is organized under the laws of Pennsylvania and has its principal office at Pittsburgh. It is engaged in the business of manufacturing iron and steel in plants situated in Pittsburgh and nearby Aliquippa, Pennsylvania. It manufactures and distributes a widely diversified line of steel and pig iron, being the fourth largest producer of steel in the United States. With its subsidiaries—nineteen in number—it is a completely integrated enterprise, owning and operating ore, coal and limestone properties, lake and river transportation facilities and terminal railroads located at its manufacturing plants. It owns or controls mines in Michigan and Minnesota. It operates four ore steamships on the Great Lakes, used in the transportation of ore to its factories. It owns coal mines in Pennsylvania. It operates towboats and steam barges used in carrying coal to its factories. It owns limestone properties in various places in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. It owns the Monongahela connecting railroad which connects the plants of the Pittsburgh works and forms an interconnection with the Pennsylvania, New York Central and Baltimore and Ohio Railroad systems. It owns the Aliquippa and Southern Railroad Company which connects the Aliquippa works with the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, part of the New York Central system. Much of its product is shipped to its warehouses in Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Memphis,—to the last two places by means of its own barges and transportation equipment. In Long Island City, New York, and in New Orleans it operates structural steel fabricating shops in connection with the warehousing of semi-finished materials sent from its works. Through one of its wholly-owned subsidiaries it owns, leases and operates stores, warehouses and yards for the distribution of equipment and supplies for drilling and operating oil and gas mills and for pipe lines, refineries and pumping stations. It has sales offices in twenty cities in the United States and a wholly-owned subsidiary which is devoted exclusively to distributing its product in Canada. Approximately 75 per cent. of its product is shipped out of Pennsylvania.

Summarizing these operations, the Labor Board concluded that the works in Pittsburgh and Aliquippa "might be likened to the heart of a self-contained, highly integrated body. They draw in the raw materials from Michigan, Minnesota, West Virginia, Pennsylvania in part through arteries and by means controlled by the respondent; they transform the materials and then pump them out to all parts of the nation through the vast mechanism which the respondent has elaborated."

To carry on the activities of the entire steel industry, 33,000 men mine ore, 44,000 men mine coal, 4,000 men quarry limestone, 16,000 men manufacture coke, 343,000 men manufacture steel, and 83,000 men transport its product. Respondent has about 10,000 employees in its Aliquippa plant, which is located in a community of about 30,000 persons. * * *

First. The scope of the Act.—The Act is challenged in its entirety as an attempt to regulate all industry, thus invading the reserved power of the States over their local concerns. * * *

We think it clear that the National Labor Relations Act may be construed so as to operate within the sphere of constitutional authority. The jurisdiction conferred upon the Board, and invoked in this instance, is found in Section 10(a), which provides:

"Sec. 10(a). The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in section 8) affecting commerce."

The critical words of this provision, prescribing the limits of the Board's authority in dealing with the labor practices, are "affecting commerce." The Act specifically defines the "commerce" to which it refers (sec. 2 (6)):

"The term 'commerce' means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country."

There can be no question that the commerce thus contemplated by the Act (aside from that within a Territory or the District of Columbia) is interstate and foreign commerce in the constitutional sense. The Act also defines the term "affecting commerce" (sec. 2(7)):

"The term 'affecting commerce' means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce."

This definition is one of exclusion as well as inclusion. The grant of authority to the Board does not purport to extend to the relationship between all industrial employees and employers. Its terms do not impose collective bargaining upon all industry regardless of effects upon interstate or foreign commerce. It purports to reach only what may be deemed to burden or obstruct that commerce and, thus qualified, it must be construed as contemplating the exercise of control within constitutional bounds. It is a familiar principle that acts which directly burden or obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, or its free flow, are within the reach of the congressional power. Acts having that effect are not rendered immune because they grow out of labor disputes. * * * Whether or not particular action does affect commerce in such a close and intimate fashion as to be subject to federal control, and hence to lie within the authority conferred upon the Board, is left by the statute to be determined as individual cases arise. We are thus to inquire whether in the instant case the constitutional boundary has been passed.

Respondent says that whatever may be said of employees engaged in interstate commerce, the industrial relations and activities in the manufacturing department of respondent's enterprise are not subject to federal regulation. The argument rests upon the proposition that manufacturing in itself is not commerce. [Citing decisions.] * * *

[Respondent also contended that the "stream" or "flow" of commerce cases, such as Stafford v. Wallace, were not controlling because:]

The raw materials which are brought to the [Aliquippa] plant are delayed for long periods and, after being subjected to manufacturing processes "are changed substantially as to character, utility and value." The finished products which emerge "are to a large extent manufactured without reference to pre-existing orders and contracts and are entirely different from the raw materials which enter at the other end." * * *

We do not find it necessary to determine whether these features of defendant's business dispose of the asserted analogy to the "stream of commerce" cases. The instances in which that metaphor has been used are but particular, and not exclusive, illustrations of the protective power which the Government invokes in support of the present Act. The congressional authority to protect interstate commerce from burdens and obstructions is not limited to transactions which can be deemed to be an essential part of a "flow" of interstate or foreign commerce. Burdens and obstructions may be due to injurious action springing from other sources. The fundamental principle is that the power to regulate commerce is the power to enact "all appropriate legislation" for "its protection and advancement" * * * Although activities may be intrastate in character when separately considered, if they have such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that their control is essential or appropriate to protect that commerce from burdens and obstructions, Congress cannot be denied the power to exercise that control. * * *

That intrastate activities, by reason of close and intimate relations to interstate commerce, may fall within federal control is demonstrated in the case of carriers who are engaged in both interstate and intrastate transportation. There federal control has been found essential to secure the freedom of interstate traffic from interference or unjust discrimination and to promote the efficiency of the interstate service. [Citations omitted.] * * *

The close and intimate effect which brings the subject within the reach of federal power may be due to activities in relation to productive industry although the industry when separately viewed is local. This has been abundantly illustrated in the application of the federal Anti-Trust Act. In the Standard Oil and American Tobacco cases, 221 U. S. 1, 106, that statute was applied to combinations of employers engaged in productive industry. * * *

Upon the same principle, the Anti-Trust Act has been applied to the conduct of employees engaged in production. Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274; Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 268 U. S. 295; Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Stonecutters Association, 274 U. S. 29. See, also, Local 167 v. United States, 291 U. S. 293, 297; Schechter Corporation v. United States, 295 U. S. 495. The decisions dealing with the question of that application illustrate both the principle and its limitation. Thus, in the first Coronado case, the Court held that mining was not interstate commerce, that the power of Congress did not extend to its regulation as such, and that it had not been shown that the activities there involved—a local strike—brought them within the provisions of the Anti-Trust Act, notwithstanding the broad terms of that statute. A similar conclusion was reached in United Leather Workers v. Herkert, 265 U. S. 457; Industrial Association v. United States, 268 U. S. 64, and Levering & Garrigues Co. v. Morrin, 289 U. S. 103, 107. But in the first Coronado case the Court also said that "if Congress deems certain recurring practices, though not really part of interstate commerce, likely to obstruct, restrain or burden it, it has the power to subject them to national supervision and restraint." 259 U. S. p. 408. And in the second Coronado case the Court ruled that while the mere reduction in the supply of an article to be shipped in interstate commerce by the illegal or tortious prevention of its manufacture or production is ordinarily an indirect and remote obstruction to that commerce, nevertheless when the "intent of those unlawfully preventing the manufacture or production is shown to be to restrain or control the supply entering and moving in interstate commerce, or the price of it in interstate markets, their action is a direct violation of the Anti-Trust Act." 268 U. S. p. 310. And the existence of that intent may be a necessary inference from proof of the direct and substantial effect produced by the employees' conduct. Industrial Association v. United States, 268 U. S. p. 81. What was absent from the evidence in the first Coronado case appeared in the second and the Act was accordingly applied to the mining employees.

It is thus apparent that the fact that the employees here concerned were engaged in production is not determinative. The question remains as to the effect upon interstate commerce of the labor practice involved. In the Schechter case, supra, we found that the effect there was so remote as to be beyond the federal power. To find "immediacy or directness" there was to find it "almost everywhere," a result inconsistent with the maintenance of our federal system. In the Carter case, supra, the Court was of the opinion that the provisions of the statute relating to production were invalid upon several grounds—that there was improper delegation of legislative power, and that the requirements not only went beyond any sustainable measure of protection of interstate commerce but were also inconsistent with due process. These cases are not controlling here.

Fourth. Effects of the unfair labor practice in respondent's enterprise.—Giving full weight to respondent's contention with respect to a break in the complete continuity of the "stream of commerce" by reason of respondent's manufacturing operations, the fact remains that the stoppage of those operations by industrial strife would have a most serious effect upon interstate commerce. In view of respondent's far-flung activities, it is idle to say that the effect would be indirect or remote. It is obvious that it would be immediate and might be catastrophic. We are asked to shut our eyes to the plainest facts of our national life and to deal with the question of direct and indirect effects in an intellectual vacuum. Because there may be but indirect and remote effects upon interstate commerce in connection with a host of local enterprises throughout the country, it does not follow that other industrial activities do not have such a close and intimate relation to interstate commerce as to make the presence of industrial strife a matter of the most urgent national concern. When industries organize themselves on a national scale, making their relation to interstate commerce the dominant factor in their activities, how can it be maintained that their industrial labor relations constitute a forbidden field into which Congress may not enter when it is necessary to protect interstate commerce from the paralyzing consequences of industrial war? We have often said that interstate commerce itself is a practical conception. It is equally true that interferences with that commerce must be appraised by a judgment that does not ignore actual experience.

Experience has abundantly demonstrated that the recognition of the right of employees to self-organization and to have representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of collective bargaining is often an essential condition of industrial peace. Refusal to confer and negotiate has been one of the most prolific causes of strife. This is such an outstanding fact in the history of labor disturbances that it is a proper subject of judicial notice and requires no citation of instances. The opinion in the case of Virginian Railway Co. v. System Federation, No. 40, 300 U. S. 515, points out that, in the case of carriers, experience has shown that before the amendment, of 1934, of the Railway Labor Act "when there was no dispute as to the organizations authorized to represent the employees and when there was a willingness of the employer to meet such representative for a discussion of their grievances, amicable adjustment of differences had generally followed and strikes had been avoided." That, on the other hand, "a prolific source of dispute had been the maintenance by the railroad of company unions and the denial by railway management of the authority of representatives chosen by their employees." The opinion in that case also points to the large measure of success of the labor policy embodied in the Railway Labor Act. But with respect to the appropriateness of the recognition of self-organization and representation in the promotion of peace, the question is not essentially different in the case of employees in industries of such a character that interstate commerce is put in jeopardy from the case of employees of transportation companies. And of what avail is it to protect the facility of transportation, if interstate commerce is throttled with respect to the commodities to be transported!

These questions have frequently engaged the attention of Congress and have been the subject of many inquiries. The steel industry is one of the great basic industries of the United States, with ramifying activities affecting interstate commerce at every point. The Government aptly refers to the steel strike of 1919-1920 with its far-reaching consequences. The fact that there appears to have been no major disturbance in that industry in the more recent period did not dispose of the possibilities of future and like dangers to interstate commerce which Congress was entitled to foresee and to exercise its protective power to forestall. It is not necessary again to detail the facts as to respondent's enterprise. Instead of being beyond the pale, we think that it presents in a most striking way the close and intimate relation which a manufacturing industry may have to interstate commerce and we have no doubt that Congress had constitutional authority to safeguard the right of respondent's employees to self-organization and freedom in the choice of representatives for collective bargaining. * * *

Our conclusion is that the order of the Board was within its competency and that the Act is valid as here applied. The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS delivered the following dissenting opinion.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER, MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND, MR. JUSTICE BUTLER and I are unable to agree with the decisions just announced [including with the Jones & Laughlin Case, the decisions in National Labor Relations Board v. Fruehauf Trailer Co. and National Labor Relations Board v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co.] * * *

The Court as we think departs from well-established principles followed in Schechter v. United States, 295 U. S. 495 and Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U. S. 238. Upon the authority of those decisions, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth, Sixth and Second Circuits in the causes now before us have held the power of Congress under the commerce clause does not extend to relations between employers and their employees engaged in manufacture, and therefore the Act conferred upon the National Labor Relations Board no authority in respect of matters covered by the questioned orders. * * * No decision or judicial opinion to the contrary has been cited, and we find none. Every consideration brought forward to uphold the Act before us was applicable to support the Acts held unconstitutional in causes decided within two years. And the lower courts rightly deemed them controlling. * * *

The three respondents happen to be manufacturing concerns—one large, two relatively small. The Act is now applied to each upon grounds common to all. Obviously what is determined as to these concerns may gravely affect a multitude of employers who engage in a great variety of private enterprises—mercantile, manufacturing, publishing, stock-raising, mining, etc. It puts into the hands of a Board power of control over purely local industry beyond anything heretofore deemed permissible. * * *

That Congress has power by appropriate means, not prohibited by the Constitution, to prevent direct and material interference with the conduct of interstate commerce is settled doctrine. But the interference struck at must be direct and material, not some mere possibility contingent on wholly uncertain events; and there must be no impairment of rights guaranteed. A state by taxation on property may indirectly but seriously affect the cost of transportation; it may not lay a direct tax upon the receipts from interstate transportation. The first is an indirect effect, the other direct. * * *

The things inhibited by the Labor Act relate to the management of a manufacturing plant—something distinct from commerce and subject to the authority of the state. And this may not be abridged because of some vague possibility of distant interference with commerce. * * *

The right to contract is fundamental and includes the privilege of selecting those with whom one is willing to assume contractual relations. This right is unduly abridged by the Act now upheld. A private owner is deprived of power to manage his own property by freely selecting those to whom his manufacturing operations are to be entrusted. We think this cannot lawfully be done in circumstances like those here disclosed.

It seems clear to us that Congress has transcended the powers granted.

NOTES

1. Two years before the decision in the principal case the Supreme Court held without dissent that the Codes of Fair Competition, each proposed by members of an industry to be governed by it, and to become operative when approved by the President, were void because the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, in authorizing that method of code-making, did not prescribe any standard to limit the exercise of executive discretion as to the contents of a code, and therefore the statute had attempted an unconstitutional delegation by Congress of its legislative power. A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States, 295 U. S. 495, 79 L. ed. 1570, 55 Sup. Ct. 837, 97 A. L. R. 947 (1935). What we are concerned with at this point, however, is that the court, without dissent, held as an alternative ground of decision that Congress had no power under the commerce clause, even by a proper delegation or by direct legislation, to enact the provisions of the code for the live poultry industry of the metropolitan area in and about New York City, outlawing certain unfair trade practices and setting minimum wages and maximum hours of employees in this industry. The significance of this decision turns on the facts about this industry. These were that the members of the industry were wholesalers who sold live poultry, and after slaughtering it delivered it to retailers in the area. Ninety-six per cent of the live poultry handled by these wholesalers was shipped into New York from other states. The out-of-state sellers, however, shipped to commission men from whom the wholesalers bought after arrival in New York. The court took the view that neither the wholesalers' purchases nor their resales were interstate commerce transactions, declaring that the "current" or "flow" doctrine was inapplicable since the flow of commerce had ceased prior to the transactions involved. The remaining question was, did the practices of these wholesalers sufficiently affect interstate commerce to bring them within the regulatory power of Congress. That depended, said Chief Justice Hughes, with six justices concurring, upon whether these practices "directly" affected interstate commerce. The opinion stated: "In determining how far the federal government may go in controlling intrastate transactions upon the ground that they 'affect' interstate commerce, there is a necessary and well-established distinction between direct and indirect effects. The precise line can be drawn only as individual cases arise, but the distinction is clear in principle." Purporting to apply this clear principle, the conclusion was that unfair sales practices of these wholesalers and possible underpay and overwork of their employees would have no "direct" effect upon the movement of chickens from out-of-state producers to the consumers in New York. Justice Cardozo, joined by Justice Stone, concurred, saying that the commerce clause objection was "far-reaching and incurable, aside from any defect of unlawful delegation." The Schechter case and subsequent major decisions involving the scope of the commerce power of Congress are discussed in Stern, The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933-1946, 59 Harv. L. Rev. 645, 883 (1946).

2. In Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U. S. 238, 80 L. ed. 1160, 56 Sup. Ct. 855 (1936) a six-to-three majority of the court held that Congress had no power to establish collective bargaining in coal mines or to regulate the hours and wages of coal miners, as it had attempted to do in the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935. The act provided for the establishment of a Bituminous Coal Commission with authority to formulate a code fixing prices, when deemed necessary in the public interest, and declared, among other labor provisions, that wage contracts negotiated between specified percentages of the producers and mine workers should be accepted by all the code members. Justice Sutherland, for the court, after stating that the distinction between a "direct" and "indirect" effect upon interstate commerce is not "formal" but "substantial in the highest degree," said: "Much stress is put upon the evils which come from the struggle between employers and employees over the matter of wages, working conditions, the right of collective bargaining, etc., and the resulting strikes, curtailment and irregularity of production and effect on prices; and it is insisted that interstate commerce is greatly affected thereby. But * * * the conclusive answer is that the evils are all local evils over which the federal government has no legislative control. The relation of employer and employee is a local relation." The majority held, further, that the price-fixing provisions of the code were so related to and dependent upon the labor provisions that the invalidity of the latter infected the former, in spite of the inclusion of a separability clause in the statute. Chief Justice Hughes, concurring as regards the labor provisions, thought that the price-fixing provisions were separable and constitutional. Justices Cardozo, Brandeis and Stone also thought the price-fixing provisions valid and the suits premature insofar as they sought a decision as to the validity of the labor provisions.

The Bituminous Coal Act of 1937, which provided for the fixing of minimum prices but omitted all labor provisions, was sustained in Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381, 84 L. ed. 1263, 60 Sup. Ct. 907 (1940).

3. The Supreme Court having upheld the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act in the principal case, it remains a question of fact in each case whether a particular person, firm or corporation falls within the interstate commerce jurisdictional limitations of the act and whether the unfair labor practices prohibited by the act as constituting obstructions to commerce have been carried on. Two other cases decided the same day involved much smaller industrial units than that of Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation.

National Labor Relations Board v. Fruehauf Trailer Co., 301 U. S. 49, 81 L. ed. 918, 57 Sup. Ct. 642 (1937) sustained the applicability of the Act to the labor relations of the respondent company and its employees in its manufacturing plant in Detroit. The findings of the National Labor Relations Board were that the company was the largest manufacturer of automobile trailers in the United States; that it maintained thirty-one branch sales offices in twelve states; that 50 per cent in value of the materials used and most of its lumber were transported from other states to Detroit; that more than 80 per cent of its products were shipped to other states and to foreign countries. The Board also had found that respondent had "determined to put a stop to all attempts on the part of its factory workers to form an efficient independent bargaining agency and in furtherance of that purpose summarily discharged nine men and threatened three others with discharge." The case was held to be governed by the principles laid down in the Jones & Laughlin decision, the same justices dissenting as dissented in that case.

In National Labor Relations Board v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co., 301 U. S. 58, 81 L. ed. 921, 57 Sup. Ct. 645 (1937) the findings were that respondent company was engaged, at Richmond, Virginia, in the purchase of raw materials, principally woolen and worsted goods, and in the manufacture, sale and distribution of men's clothing; that most of these materials came from states other than Virginia and 82.8 per cent of the garments were shipped outside the state; that the men's clothing industry is nearly entirely dependent in its operations upon sales and transportation in interstate commerce; that the industry had been marked for years by costly strikes; and that respondent had shown antagonism to union organization of its employees and discharged employees because of membership in labor organizations. The court held (the same justices dissenting) that the findings of the Board were supported by evidence and that the act was applicable to the labor relations of the company and its production employees.

On the same day, by the same division, it was held that the National Labor Relations Act could validly be applied to the editorial staff of the Associated Press, a membership corporation whose business was the collection of news from members and other sources throughout the United States and abroad, selecting, editing, rewriting the collected news and distributing it to its members. Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U. S. 103, 81 L. ed. 953, 57 Sup. Ct. 650 (1937). The dispute arose over the discharge of an editorial employee. On complaint of the American Newspaper Guild, a labor organization, the Labor Relations Board found that the Associated Press was engaged in interstate commerce, that the activities of its editorial employees directly affected interstate commerce, that the employee had been discharged in violation of the Act, and on the basis of these findings ordered his reinstatement. The Supreme Court sustained the lower court's decree ordering compliance with the Board's order.

In Washington, V. & M. Coach Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U. S. 142, 81 L. ed. 965, 57 Sup. Ct. 648 (1937)—the last of the cases decided on this day—the act was held to apply to a motor bus company engaged in interstate transportation which had discharged and refused to reinstate certain drivers and garage workmen because of their membership in a labor union. In this case there was no dissent since no contention was made that the company was other than an instrumentality of interstate commerce.

4. The National Labor Relations Act was not the first congressional legislation under the commerce clause which sought to insure better labor-management relations. The objective of the Railway Labor Act of 1926 was to prevent the interruption of interstate commerce by labor disputes and strikes on the railroads of the United States. The law provided for the voluntary submission of labor disputes to arbitration, and, in case of failure of adjustment and threatened interruption of essential transportation service, for a Board of Mediation and a temporary suspension of the right of either party to the dispute to change the existing status. Representatives for the purposes of the act were to be designated by the respective parties "without interference, influence, or coercion exercised by either party over the self-organization or designation of representatives by the other." This act was upheld, as applied to railway clerks who were not directly engaged in the processes of interstate commerce, in Texas & New Orleans R. Co. v. Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, 281 U. S. 548, 74 L. ed. 1034, 50 Sup. Ct. 427 (1930), the court saying that "the prohibition by Congress of interference with the selection of representatives for the purpose of negotiation and conference between employers and employees, instead of being an invasion of the constitutional right of either, was based on the recognition of the rights of both." The 1926 statute was amended and strengthened in 1934. The railroads were required in the event of a dispute to bargain collectively with the organization certified by the National Mediation Board as authorized to represent the employees. The validity of this enactment was unanimously sustained in Virginian R. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, 300 U. S. 515, 81 L. ed. 789, 57 Sup. Ct. 592 (1937), as applied to a railroad engaged in interstate commerce and its "back shop" employees. The court said: "The relation of the back shop to transportation is such that a strike of petitioner's employees there, quite apart from the likelihood of its spreading to the operating department, would subject petitioner to the danger, substantial, though possibly indefinable in its extent, of interruption of the transportation service. The cause is not remote from the effect."

5. In Santa Cruz Fruit Packing Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 303 U. S. 453, 82 L. ed. 954, 58 Sup. Ct. 656 (1938) the act was held validly applicable to the labor relations between the packing company and its employees, the company's plant being located in California where it packed fruits and vegetables, the bulk of which were grown in that state, but 37 per cent of its output being shipped to buyers in other states and foreign countries.

6. In Consolidated Edison Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 305 U. S. 197, 83 L. ed. 126, 59 Sup. Ct. 206 (1938) in holding that the act could constitutionally be applied to the labor relations between the Consolidated Edison Company and its employees, the court emphasized the dependence of interstate and foreign commerce upon the continuity of the service supplied by the company, which numbered among its customers railroad, telegraph, telephone and radio companies. "It cannot be doubted that these activities, while conducted within the state, are matters of federal concern. In their totality they rise to such a degree of importance that the fact that they involve but a small part of the entire service rendered by the utilities in their extensive business is immaterial in the consideration of the existence of the federal protective power."

UNITED STATES v. F. W. DARBY LUMBER CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1941.

MR. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The two principal questions raised by the record in this case are, first, whether Congress has constitutional power to prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of lumber manufactured by employees whose wages are less than a prescribed minimum or whose weekly hours of labor at that wage are greater than a prescribed maximum, and, second, whether it has power to prohibit the employment of workmen in the production of goods "for interstate commerce" at other than prescribed wages and hours. A subsidiary question is whether in connection with such prohibitions Congress can require the employer subject to them to keep records showing the hours worked each day and week by each of his employees including those engaged "in the production and manufacture of goods to wit, lumber, for 'interstate commerce.'"

Appellee demurred to an indictment found in the District Court for southern Georgia charging him with violation of § 15(a)(1)(2) and (5) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 52 Stat. 1060, 29 U. S. C. § 201, et seq. The District Court sustained the demurrer and quashed the indictment and the case comes here on direct appeal under § 238 of the Judicial Code as amended, 28 U. S. C. § 345 [F. C. A. 28 § 345], and § 682, 18 U. S. C. [F. C. A. 18 § 682], 34 Stat. 1246, which authorizes an appeal to this Court when the judgment sustaining the demurrer "is based upon invalidity, or construction of the statute upon which the indictment is founded."

The Fair Labor Standards Act set up a comprehensive legislative scheme for preventing the shipment in interstate commerce of certain products and commodities produced in the United States under labor conditions as respects wages and hours which fail to conform to standards set up by the Act. Its purpose, as we judicially know from the declaration of policy in § 2(a) of the Act, and the reports of Congressional committees proposing the legislation, * * * is to exclude from interstate commerce goods produced for the commerce and to prevent their production for interstate commerce, under conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standards of living necessary for health and general well-being; and to prevent the use of interstate commerce as the means of competition in the distribution of goods so produced, and as the means of spreading and perpetuating such substandard labor conditions among the workers of the several states. The Act also sets up an administrative procedure whereby those standards may from time to time be modified generally as to industries subject to the Act or within an industry in accordance with specified standards, by an administrator acting in collaboration with "Industry Committees" appointed by him.

Section 15 of the statute prohibits certain specified acts and § 16(a) punishes willful violation of it by a fine of not more than $10,000 and punishes each conviction after the first by imprisonment of not more than six months or by the specified fine or both. Section 15(a)(1) makes unlawful the shipment in interstate commerce of any goods "in the production of which any employee was employed in violation of section 6 or section 7," which provide, among other things, that during the first year of operation of the act a minimum wage of 25 cents per hour shall be paid to employees "engaged in [interstate] commerce or in the production of goods for [interstate] commerce," § 6, and that the maximum hours of employment for employees "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" without increased compensation for overtime, shall be forty-four hours a week. § 7.

Section 15(a)(2) makes it unlawful to violate the provisions of §§ 6 and 7 including the minimum wage and maximum hour requirements just mentioned for employees engaged in production of goods for commerce. Section 15(a)(5) makes it unlawful for an employer subject to the Act to violate § 11(c) which requires him to keep such records of the persons employed by him and of their wages and hours of employment as the administrator shall prescribe by regulation or order.

The indictment charges that appellee is engaged, in the state of Georgia, in the business of acquiring raw materials, which he manufactures into finished lumber with the intent, when manufactured, to ship it in interstate commerce to customers outside the state, and that he does in fact so ship a large part of the lumber so produced. There are numerous counts charging appellee with the shipment in interstate commerce from Georgia to points outside the state of lumber in the production of which, for interstate commerce, appellee has employed workmen at less than the prescribed minimum wage or more than the prescribed maximum hours without payment to them of any wage for overtime. Other counts charge the employment by appellee of workmen in the production of lumber for interstate commerce at wages of less than 25 cents an hour or for more than the maximum hours per week without payment to them of the prescribed overtime wage. Still another count charges appellee with failure to keep records showing the hours worked each day or week by each of his employees as required by § 11(c) and the regulation of the administrator, Title 29, Ch. 5, Code of Federal Regulations, Part 516, and also that appellee unlawfully failed to keep such records of employees engaged "in the production and manufacture of goods, to-wit lumber, for interstate commerce."

The demurrer, so far as now relevant to the appeal, challenged the validity of the Fair Labor Standards Act under the Commerce Clause and the Fifth and Tenth Amendments. The district court quashed the indictment in its entirety upon the broad grounds that the Act, which it interpreted as a regulation of manufacture within the states, is unconstitutional. It declared that manufacture is not interstate commerce and that the regulation by the Fair Labor Standards Act of wages and hours of employment of those engaged in the manufacture of goods which it is intended at the time of production "may or will be" after production "sold in interstate commerce in part or in whole" is not within the congressional power to regulate interstate commerce.

The effect of the court's decision and judgment are thus to deny the power of Congress to prohibit shipment in interstate commerce of lumber produced for interstate commerce under the prescribed substandard labor conditions of wages and hours, its power to penalize the employer for his failure to conform to the wage and hour provisions in the case of employees engaged in the production of lumber which he intends thereafter to ship in interstate commerce in part or in whole according to the normal course of his business and its power to compel him to keep records of hours of employment as required by the statute and the regulations of the administrator.

The case comes here on assignments by the Government that the District Court erred insofar as it held that Congress was without constitutional power to penalize the acts set forth in the indictment, and appellee seeks to sustain the decision below on the grounds that the prohibition by Congress of those acts is unauthorized by the commerce clause and is prohibited by the Fifth Amendment. The appeal statute limits our jurisdiction on this appeal to a review of the determination of the District Court so far only as it is based on the validity or construction of the statute. * * * shipment in interstate commerce of goods produced for interstate commerce by employees whose wages and hours of employment do not conform to the requirements of the Act. Since this section is not violated unless the commodity shipped has been produced under labor conditions prohibited by § 6 and § 7, the only question arising under the Commerce Clause with respect to such shipments is whether Congress has the constitutional power to prohibit them.

While manufacture is not of itself interstate commerce the shipment of manufactured goods interstate is such commerce and the prohibition of such shipment by Congress is indubitably a regulation of the commerce. The power to regulate commerce is the power to "prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 196. It extends not only to those regulations which aid, foster and protect the commerce, but embraces those which prohibit it. * * * It is conceded that the power of Congress to prohibit transportation in interstate commerce includes noxious articles, Lottery Case, 188 U. S. 321; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45; Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308; stolen articles, Brooks v. United States, 267 U. S. 432; kidnapped persons, Gooch v. United States, 297 U. S. 124, and articles such as intoxicating liquor or convict made goods, traffic in which is forbidden or restricted by the laws of the state of destination, Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., 299 U. S. 334.

But it is said that the present prohibition falls within the scope of none of these categories; that while the prohibition is nominally a regulation of the commerce its motive or purpose is regulation of wages and hours of persons engaged in manufacture, the control of which has been reserved to the states and upon which Georgia and some of the states of destination have placed no restriction; that the effect of the present statute is not to exclude the prescribed articles from interstate commerce in aid of state regulation as in Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra, but instead, under the guise of a regulation of interstate commerce, it undertakes to regulate wages and hours within the state contrary to the policy of the state which has elected to leave them unregulated.

The power of Congress over interstate commerce "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed by the Constitution." Gibbons v. Ogden, supra, 9 Wheat. 196. That power can neither be enlarged nor diminished by the exercise or non-exercise of state power. Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra. Congress, following its own conception of public policy concerning the restrictions which may appropriately be imposed on interstate commerce, is free to exclude from the commerce articles whose use in the states for which they are destined it may conceive to be injurious to the public health, morals or welfare, even though the state has not sought to regulate their use.

Such regulation is not a forbidden invasion of state power merely because either its motive or its consequence is to restrict the use of articles of commerce within the states of destination and is not prohibited unless by other Constitutional provisions. It is no objection to the assertion of the power to regulate interstate commerce that its exercise is attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise of the police power of the states. * * *

The motive and purpose of the present regulation is plainly to make effective the Congressional conception of public policy that interstate commerce should not be made the instrument of competition in the distribution of goods produced under substandard labor conditions, which competition is injurious to the commerce and to the states from and to which the commerce flows. The motive and purpose of a regulation of interstate commerce are matters for the legislative judgment upon the exercise of which the Constitution places no restriction and over which the courts are given no control. McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27; Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U. S. 506, 513, and cases cited. "The judicial cannot prescribe to the legislative department of the government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged power." Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533. Whatever their motive and purpose, regulations of commerce which do not infringe some constitutional prohibition are within the plenary power conferred on Congress by the Commerce Clause. Subject only to that limitation, presently to be considered, we conclude that the prohibition of the shipment interstate of goods produced under the forbidden substandard labor conditions is within the constitutional authority of Congress.

In the more than a century which has elapsed since the decision of Gibbons v. Ogden, these principles of constitutional interpretation have been so long and repeatedly recognized by this Court as applicable to the Commerce Clause, that there would be little occasion for repeating them now were it not for the decision of this Court twenty-two years ago in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251. In that case it was held by a bare majority of the Court over the powerful and now classic dissent of Mr. Justice Holmes setting forth the fundamental issues involved, that Congress was without power to exclude the products of child labor from interstate commerce. The reasoning and conclusion of the Court's opinion there cannot be reconciled with the conclusion which we have reached, that the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause is plenary to exclude any article from interstate commerce subject only to the specific prohibitions of the Constitution.

Hammer v. Dagenhart has not been followed. The distinction on which the decision was rested that Congressional power to prohibit interstate commerce is limited to articles which in themselves have some harmful or deleterious property—a distinction which was novel when made and unsupported by any provision of the Constitution—has long since been abandoned. Brooks v. United States, supra; Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra; Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 303 U. S. 419; Mulford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38. The thesis of the opinion that the motive of the prohibition or its effect to control in some measure the use or production within the states of the article thus excluded from the commerce can operate to deprive the regulation of its constitutional authority has long since ceased to have force. Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 137; Lottery Case, supra; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, supra; Seven Cases v. United States, 239 U. S. 510; Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U. S. 146; United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U. S. 144. And finally we have declared "The authority of the federal government over interstate commerce does not differ in extent or character from that retained by the states over intrastate commerce." United States v. Rock Royal Co-operative, Inc., 307 U. S. 533, 569.

The conclusion is inescapable that Hammer v. Dagenhart, was a departure from the principles which have prevailed in the interpretation of the commerce clause both before and since the decision and that such vitality, as a precedent, as it then had has long since been exhausted. It should be and now is overruled.

Validity of the wage and hour requirements. Section 15(a) (2) and §§ 6 and 7 require employers to conform to the wage and hour provisions with respect to all employees engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce. As appellee's employees are not alleged to be "engaged in interstate commerce" the validity of the prohibition turns on the question whether the employment, under other than the prescribed labor standards, of employees engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce is so related to the commerce and so affects it as to be within the reach of the power of Congress to regulate it.

To answer this question we must at the outset determine whether the particular acts charged in the counts which are laid under § 15(a) (2) as they were construed below, constitute "production for commerce" within the meaning of the statute. As the Government seeks to apply the statute in the indictment, and as the Court below construed the phrase "produced for interstate commerce," it embraces at least the case where an employer engaged, as is appellee, in the manufacture and shipment of goods in filling orders of extrastate customers, manufactures his product with the intent or expectation that according to the normal course of his business all or some part of it will be selected for shipment to those customers.

Without attempting to define the precise limits of the phrase, we think the acts alleged in the indictment are within the sweep of the statute. The obvious purpose of the Act was not only to prevent the interstate transportation of the proscribed product, but to stop the initial step toward transportation, production with the purpose of so transporting it. Congress was not unaware that most manufacturing businesses shipping their product in interstate commerce make it in their shops without reference to its ultimate destination and then after manufacture select some of it for shipment interstate and some intrastate according to the daily demands of their business, and that it would be practically impossible, without disrupting manufacturing businesses, to restrict the prohibited kind of production to the particular pieces of lumber, cloth, furniture or the like which later move in interstate rather than intrastate commerce. Cf. United States v. New York Central R. Co., 272 U. S. 457, 464.

The recognized need of drafting a workable statute and the well known circumstances in which it was to be applied are persuasive of the conclusion, which the legislative history supports, S. Rept. No. 884, 75th Cong. 1st Sess., pp. 7 and 8; H. Rept. No. 2738, 75th Cong. 3d Sess., p. 17, that the "production for commerce" intended includes at least production of goods, which, at the time of production, the employer, according to the normal course of his business, intends or expects to move in interstate commerce although, through the exigencies of the business, all of the goods may not thereafter actually enter interstate commerce.

There remains the question whether such restriction on the production of goods for commerce is a permissible exercise of the commerce power. The power of Congress over interstate commerce is not confined to the regulation of commerce among the states. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of Congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. See McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421. Cf. United States v. Fenger, 250 U. S. 199.

While this Court has many times found state regulation of interstate commerce, when uniformity of its regulation is of national concern, to be incompatible with the Commerce Clause even though Congress has not legislated on the subject, the Court has never implied such restraint on state control over matters intrastate not deemed to be regulations of interstate commerce or its instrumentalities even though they affect the commerce. * * * In the absence of Congressional legislation on the subject state laws which are not regulations of commerce itself or its instrumentalities are not forbidden even though they affect interstate commerce. * * *

But it does not follow that Congress may not by appropriate legislation regulate intrastate activities where they have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. See Santa Cruz Fruit Packing Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 303 U. S. 453, 466. A recent example is the National Labor Relations Act for the regulation of employer and employee relations in industries in which strikes, induced by unfair labor practices named in the Act, tend to disturb or obstruct interstate commerce. See National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U. S. 1, 38, 40; National Labor Relations Board v. Fairblatt, 306 U. S. 601, 604, and cases cited. But long before the adoption of the National Labor Relations Act, this Court had many times held that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce extends to the regulation through legislative action of activities intrastate which have a substantial effect on the commerce or the exercise of the Congressional power over it.

In such legislation Congress has sometimes left it to the courts to determine whether the intrastate activities have the prohibited effect on the commerce, as in the Sherman Act. It has sometimes left it to an administrative board or agency to determine whether the activities sought to be regulated or prohibited have such effect, as in the case of the Interstate Commerce Act, and the National Labor Relations Act, or whether they come within the statutory definition of the prohibited act as in the Federal Trade Commission Act. And sometimes Congress itself has said that a particular activity affects the commerce as it did in the present act, the Safety Appliance Act, and the Railway Labor Act. In passing on the validity of legislation of the class last mentioned the only function of courts is to determine whether the particular activity regulated or prohibited is within the reach of the federal power.

Congress, having by the present Act adopted the policy excluding from interstate commerce all goods produced for the commerce which do not conform to the specified labor standards, it may choose the means reasonably adapted to the attainment of the permitted end, even though they involve control of intrastate activities. Such legislation has often been sustained with respect to powers, other than the commerce power granted to the national government, when the means chosen, although not themselves within the granted power, were nevertheless deemed appropriate aids to the accomplishment of some purpose within an admitted power of the national government. See Ruppert, Inc. v. Caffey, 251 U. S. 264; Everard's Breweries v. Day, 265 U. S. 545, 560; Westfall v. United States, 274 U. S. 256, 259. As to state power under the Fourteenth Amendment, compare Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 609; St. John v. New York, 201 U. S. 633; Purity Extract & Tonic Company v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, 201, 202. A familiar like exercise of power is the regulation of intrastate transactions which are so commingled with or related to interstate commerce that all must be regulated if the interstate commerce is to be effectively controlled. Shreveport Case, 234 U. S. 342; Wisconsin Railroad Commission v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 257 U. S. 563; United States v. New York Central R. R. Co., supra, 272 U. S. 464; Currin v. Wallace, 306 U. S.

1; Mulford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38. Similarly Congress may require inspection and preventive treatment of all cattle in a disease infected area in order to prevent shipment in interstate commerce of some of the cattle without the treatment. Thornton v. United States, 271 U. S. 414. It may prohibit the removal, at destination, of labels required by the Pure Food & Drugs Act to be affixed to articles transported in interstate commerce. McDermott v. Wisconsin, 228 U. S. 115. And we have recently held that Congress in the exercise of its power to require inspection and grading of tobacco shipped in interstate commerce may compel such inspection and grading of all tobacco sold at local auction rooms from which a substantial part but not all of the tobacco sold is shipped in interstate commerce. Curran v. Wallace, 306 U. S. 11, and see to the like effect United States v. Rock Royal Co-operative, 307 U. S. 568.

We think also that § 15(a) (2), now under consideration, is sustainable independently of § 15(a) (1), which prohibits shipment or transportation of the proscribed goods. As we have said the evils aimed at by the Act are the spread of substandard labor conditions through the use of the facilities of interstate commerce for competition by the goods so produced with those produced under the prescribed or better labor conditions; and the consequent dislocation of the commerce itself caused by the impairment or destruction of local businesses by competition made effective through interstate commerce. The Act is thus directed at the suppression of a method or kind of competition in interstate commerce which it has in effect condemned as "unfair," as the Clayton Act has condemned other "unfair methods of competition" made effective through interstate commerce. * * *

The Sherman Act and the National Labor Relations Act are familiar examples of the exertion of the commerce power to prohibit or control activities wholly intrastate because of their effect on interstate commerce. * * *

The means adopted by § 15(a) (2) for the protection of interstate commerce by the suppression of the production of the condemned goods for interstate commerce is so related to the commerce and so affects it as to be within the reach of the commerce power. See Curran v. Wallace, 306 U. S. 1. Congress, to attain its objective in the suppression of nationwide competition in interstate commerce by goods produced under substandard labor conditions, had made no distinction as to the volume or amount of shipments in the commerce or of production for commerce by any particular shipper or producer. It recognized that in present day industry, competition by a small part may affect the whole and that the total effect of the competition of many small producers may be great. See H. Rept. No. 2182, 75th Cong. 1st Sess., p. 7. The legislation aimed at a whole embraces all its parts. * * *

So far as Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U. S. 238, is inconsistent with this conclusion, its doctrine is limited in principle by the decisions under the Sherman Act and the National Labor Relations Act, which we have cited and which we follow. * * *

Our conclusion is unaffected by the Tenth Amendment which provides: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The amendment states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered. There is nothing in the history of its adoption to suggest that it was more than declaratory of the relationship between the national and state governments as it had been established by the Constitution before the amendment or that its purpose was other than to allay fears that the new national government might seek to exercise powers not granted, and that the states might not be able to exercise fully their reserved powers. * * *

From the beginning and for many years the amendment has been construed as not depriving the national government of authority to resort to all means for the exercise of a granted power which are appropriate and plainly adapted to the permitted end. * * * Whatever doubts may have arisen of the soundness of that conclusion they have been put at rest by the decisions under the Sherman Act and the National Labor Relations Act which we have cited. * * *

[The remaining portion of the opinion upholding the validity of the requirement of records of wages and hours, and finding the wage and hour provisions valid under the Fifth Amendment is here omitted.]

NOTES

1. Note that the regulations imposed in the Fair Labor Standards Act apply to employees of industries "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce," whereas the National Labor Relations Act deals with unfair labor practices and conditions "affecting commerce," a phrase interpreted by the Supreme Court to be of broader import and to indicate that Congress has meant to exercise its plenary power under the commerce clause. Moreover, unlike such enactments as the Interstate Commerce Act and the National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act has placed upon the federal courts—and ultimately the Supreme Court—the task of applying the general terms of the statute to diverse and complicated fact situations and of drawing lines which, because of the inherent difficulties involved, have been the subject of adverse criticism. While problems of this type are essentially statutory rather than constitutional, they involve the extension of federal authority over economic enterprises and relationships traditionally within the domain of the individual states and cannot be solved without some reference to the implications of the federal system of government.

In A. B. Kirschbaum Co. v. Walling, 316 U. S. 517, 86 L. ed. 1638, 62 Sup. Ct. 1116 (1942), holding that the statute included the engineer, firemen, elevator operators, watchmen, porters and a carpenter, all employed in the maintenance and operation of a building rented to various tenants practically all of whom manufactured or bought and sold ladies' garments for interstate commerce, the court noted that "the scope of the act is not coextensive with the limits of the power of Congress over commerce" and that "in this task of construction, we are without the aid afforded by a preliminary administrative process for determining whether the particular situation is within the regulated area."

In Borden Co. v. Borella, 325 U. S. 679, 89 L. ed. 1865, 65 Sup. Ct. 1223, 161 A. L. R. 1258 (1945) like employees engaged in maintenance of an office building were held to be within the act although no products were manufactured or processed in the building, the court viewing as controlling the fact that the employer company was the owner of the building and used 58% of the space in it for offices of the board of directors and its managerial staff, engaged in the direction and supervision of the entire business. The work of these officials was necessary to production, and to keep them going the work of the maintenance employees was necessary.

In 10 East 40th Street Bldg. v. Callus, 325 U. S. 578, 89 L. ed. 1806, 65 Sup. Ct. 1227, 161 A. L. R. 1263 (1945), the court, with four dissents, held that the act was not applicable to the maintenance employees of a building which had 42% of the rentable area and 48% of the rented area occupied by the executive offices of manufacturing and mining concerns engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce. The majority said that "an office building exclusively devoted to the purpose of housing all the usual miscellany of offices has many differences in the practical affairs of life from a manufacturing building, or the office building of a manufacturer," and that "renting office space in a building exclusively set aside for an unrestricted variety of office work spontaneously satisfies the common understanding of what is local business and makes the employees of such a building engaged in local business."

In Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co., 327 U. S. 178, 90 L. ed. 607, 66 Sup. Ct. 511 (1946) it was held that the defendant employer was engaged in production of goods for commerce within the act on facts stated by the court as follows: "Respondent publishes a daily newspaper at White Plains, New York. During the period relevant here, its daily circulation ranged from 9,000 to 11,000 copies. It had no desire for and made no effort to secure out-of-state circulation. Practically all of its circulation was local. But about one-half of 1% was regularly out-of-state." Mr. Justice Murphy, dissenting, thought that Congress had not meant to include a business of that nature within the ambit of the statute.

2. The validity of the overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act was sustained in Overnight Motor Transport Co. v. Missel, 316 U. S. 572, 86 L. ed. 1682, 62 Sup. Ct. 1216 (1942), the court saying that financial pressure was applied by this provision to spread employment to avoid the extra wage, and workers were assured additional pay to compensate them for the burden of a workweek beyond the hours fixed in the statute.

WICKARD v. FILBURN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1942.
317 U. S. 111, 87 L. ed. 122, 63 Sup. Ct. 82.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellee filed his complaint against the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, three members of the County Agricultural Conservation Committee for Montgomery County, Ohio, and a member of the State Agricultural Conservation Committee for Ohio. He sought to enjoin enforcement against himself of the marketing penalty imposed by the amendment of May 26, 1941, to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, upon that part of his 1941 wheat crop which was available for marketing in excess of the marketing quota established for his farm.

He also sought a declaratory judgment that the wheat marketing quota provisions of the Act as amended and applicable to him were unconstitutional because not sustainable under the Commerce Clause or consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. * * *

The appellee for many years past has owned and operated a small farm in Montgomery County, Ohio, maintaining a herd of dairy cattle, selling milk, raising poultry, and selling poultry and eggs. It has been his practice to raise a small acreage of winter wheat, sown in the Fall and harvested in the following July; to sell a portion of the crop; to feed part to poultry and livestock on the farm, some of which is sold; to use some in making flour for home consumption; and to keep the rest for the following seeding. The intended disposition of the crop here involved has not been expressly stated.

In July of 1940, pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as then amended, there were established for the appellee's 1941 crop a wheat acreage allotment of 11.1 acres and a normal yield of 20.1 bushels of wheat an acre. He was given notice of such allotment in July of 1940, before the Fall planting of his 1941 crop of wheat, and again in July of 1941, before it was harvested. He sowed, however, 23 acres, and harvested from his 11.9 acres of excess acreage 239 bushels, which under the terms of the Act as amended on May 26, 1941, constituted farm marketing excess, subject to a penalty of 49 cents a bushel, or $117.11 in all. The appellee has not paid the penalty and he has not postponed or avoided it by storing the excess under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or by delivering it up to the Secretary. The Committee, therefore, refused him a marketing card, which was, under the terms of Regulations promulgated by the Secretary, necessary to protect a buyer from liability to the penalty and upon its protecting lien.

The general scheme of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 as related to wheat is to control the volume moving in interstate and foreign commerce in order to avoid surpluses and shortages and the consequent abnormally low or high wheat prices and obstructions to commerce. Within prescribed limits and by prescribed standards the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to ascertain and proclaim each year a national acreage allotment for the next crop of wheat, which is then apportioned to the states and their counties, and is eventually broken up into allotments for individual farms. Loans and payments to wheat farmers are authorized in stated circumstances.

The Act further provides that, whenever it appears that the total supply of wheat as of the beginning of any marketing year, beginning July 1, will exceed a normal year's domestic consumption and export by more than 35 per cent, the Secretary shall so proclaim not later than May 15 prior to the beginning of such marketing year; and that during the marketing year a compulsory national marketing quota shall be in effect with respect to the marketing of wheat. Between the issuance of the proclamation and June 10, the Secretary must, however, conduct a referendum of farmers who will be subject to the quota, to determine whether they favor or oppose it; and, if more than one-third of the farmers voting in the referendum do oppose, the Secretary must, prior to the effective date of the quota, by proclamation suspend its operation.

Pursuant to the Act, the referendum of wheat growers was held on May 31, 1941. According to the required published statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, 81 per cent of those voting favored the marketing quota, with 19 per cent opposed. * * *

It is urged that, under the Commerce Clause of the Constitution, Article I, § 8, clause 3, Congress does not possess the power it has in this instance sought to exercise. The question would merit little consideration since our decision in United States v. Darby, 312 U. S. 100, sustaining the federal power to regulate production of goods for commerce, except for the fact that this Act extends federal regulation to production not intended in any part for commerce but wholly for consumption on the farm. The Act includes a definition of "market" and its derivatives, so that as related to wheat, in addition to its conventional meaning, it also means to dispose of "by feeding (in any form) to poultry or livestock which, or the products of which, are sold, bartered, or exchanged, or to be so disposed of." Hence, marketing quotas not only embrace all that may be sold without penalty but also what may be consumed on the premises. Wheat produced on excess acreage is designated as "available for marketing" as so defined, and the penalty is imposed thereon. Penalties do not depend upon whether any part of the wheat, either within or without the quota, is sold or intended to be sold. The sum of this is that the Federal Government fixes a quota including all that the farmer may harvest for sale or for his own farm needs, and declares that wheat produced on excess acreage may neither be disposed of nor used except upon payment of the penalty, or except it is stored as required by the Act or delivered to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Appellee says that this is a regulation of production and consumption of wheat. Such activities are, he urges, beyond the reach of Congressional power under the Commerce Clause, since they are local in character, and their effects upon interstate commerce are at most "indirect." In answer the Government argues that the statute regulates neither production nor consumption, but only marketing; and, in the alternative, that if the Act does go beyond the regulation of marketing it is sustainable as a "necessary and proper" implementation of the power of Congress over interstate commerce.

The Government's concern lest the Act be held to be a regulation of production or consumption, rather than of marketing, is attributable to a few dicta and decisions of this Court which might be understood to lay it down that activities such as "production," "manufacturing," and "mining" are strictly "local" and, except in special circumstances which are not present here, cannot be regulated under the commerce power because their effects upon interstate commerce are, as matter of law, only "indirect." Even today, when this power has been held to have great latitude, there is no decision of this Court that such activities may be regulated where no part of the product is intended for interstate commerce or intermingled with the subjects thereof. We believe that a review of the course of decision under the Commerce Clause will make plain, however, that questions of the power of Congress are not to be decided by reference to any formula which would give controlling force to nomenclature such as "production" and "indirect" and foreclose consideration of the actual effects of the activity in question upon interstate commerce.

At the beginning Chief Justice Marshall described the federal commerce power with a breadth never yet exceeded. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 194-195. He made emphatic the embracing and penetrating nature of this power by warning that effective restraints on its exercise must proceed from political rather than from judicial processes. Id. at 197.

For nearly a century, however, decisions of this Court under the Commerce Clause dealt rarely with questions of what Congress might do in the exercise of its granted power under the Clause, and almost entirely with the permissibility of state activity which it was claimed discriminated against or burdened interstate commerce. During this period there was perhaps little occasion for the affirmative exercise of the commerce power, and the influence of the Clause on American life and law was a negative one, resulting almost wholly from its operation as a restraint upon the powers of the states. In discussion and decision the point of reference, instead of being what was "necessary and proper" to the exercise by Congress of its granted power, was often some concept of sovereignty thought to be implicit in the status of statehood. Certain activities such as "production," "manufacturing," and "mining" were occasionally said to be within the province of state governments and beyond the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause.

It was not until 1887, with the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act, that the interstate commerce power began to exert positive influence in American law and life. This first important federal resort to the commerce power was followed in 1890 by the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and, thereafter, mainly after 1903, by many others. These statutes ushered in new phases of adjudication, which require the Court to approach the interpretation of the Commerce Clause in the light of an actual exercise by Congress of its power thereunder.

When it first dealt with this new legislation, the Court adhered to its earlier pronouncements, and allowed but little scope to the power of Congress. United States v. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1. These earlier pronouncements also played an important part in several of the five cases in which this Court later held that Acts of Congress under the Commerce Clause were in excess of its power.

Even while important opinions in this line of restrictive authority were being written, however, other cases called forth broader interpretations of the Commerce Clause destined to supersede the earlier ones, and to bring about a return to the principles first enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, supra.

Not long after the decision of United States v. Knight Co., supra, Mr. Justice Holmes, in sustaining the exercise of national power over intrastate activity, stated for the Court that "commerce among the States is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business." Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 398. It was soon demonstrated that the effects of many kinds of intrastate activity upon interstate commerce were such as to make them a proper subject of federal regulation. In some cases sustaining the exercise of federal power over intrastate matters the term "direct" was used for the purpose of stating, rather than of reaching, a result; in others it was treated as synonymous with "substantial" or "material;" and in others it was not used at all. Of late its use has been abandoned in cases dealing with questions of federal power under the Commerce Clause.

In the Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 342, the Court held that railroad rates of an admittedly intrastate character and fixed by authority of the state might, nevertheless, be revised by the Federal Government because of the economic effects which they had upon interstate commerce. The opinion of Mr. Justice Hughes found federal intervention constitutionally authorized because of "matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate traffic that the control is essential or appropriate to the security of that traffic, to the efficiency of the interstate service, and to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms and without molestation or hindrance." Id. at 351.

The Court's recognition of the relevance of the economic effects in the application of the Commerce Clause, exemplified by this statement, has made the mechanical application of legal formulas no longer feasible. Once an economic measure of the reach of the power granted to Congress in the Commerce Clause is accepted, questions of federal power cannot be decided simply by finding the activity in question to be "production," nor can consideration of its economic effects be foreclosed by calling them "indirect." The present Chief Justice has said in summary of the present state of the law: "The commerce power is not confined in its exercise to the regulation of commerce among the states. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce, or the exertion of the power of Congress over it, as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the effective execution of the granted power to regulate interstate commerce. * * * The power of Congress over interstate commerce is plenary and complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. * * * It follows that no form of state activity can constitutionally thwart the regulatory power granted by the commerce clause to Congress. Hence the reach of that power extends to those intrastate activities which in a substantial way interfere with or obstruct the exercise of the granted power." United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., 315 U. S. 110, 119.

Whether the subject of the regulation in question was "production," "consumption," or "marketing" is, therefore, not material for purposes of deciding the question of federal power before us. That an activity is of local character may help in a doubtful case to determine whether Congress intended to reach it. The same consideration might help in determining whether in the absence of Congressional action it would be permissible for the state to exert its power on the subject matter, even though in so doing it to some degree affected interstate commerce. But even if appellee's activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as "direct" or "indirect."

The parties have stipulated a summary of the economics of the wheat industry. Commerce among the states in wheat is large and important. Although wheat is raised in every state but one, production in most states is not equal to consumption. Sixteen states on average have had a surplus of wheat above their own requirements for feed, seed, and food. Thirty-two states and the District of Columbia, where production has been below consumption, have looked to these surplus-producing states for their supply as well as for wheat for export and carryover.

The wheat industry has been a problem industry for some years. Largely as a result of increased foreign production and import restrictions, annual exports of wheat and flour from the United States during the ten-year period ending in 1940 averaged less than 10 per cent of total production, while during the 1920's they averaged more than 25 per cent. The decline in the export trade has left a large surplus in production which, in connection with an abnormally large supply of wheat and other grains in recent years, caused congestion in a number of markets; tied up railroad cars; and caused elevators in some instances to turn away grains, and railroads to institute embargoes to prevent further congestion. * * *

In the absence of regulation, the price of wheat in the United States would be much affected by world conditions. During 1941, producers who cooperated with the Agricultural Adjustment program received an average price on the farm of about $1.16 a bushel, as compared with the world market price of 40 cents a bushel.

Differences in farming conditions, however, make these benefits mean different things to different wheat growers. There are several large areas of specialization in wheat, and the concentration on this crop reaches 27 per cent of the crop land, and the average harvest runs as high as 155 acres. Except for some use of wheat as stock feed and for seed, the practice is to sell the crop for cash. Wheat from such areas constitutes the bulk of the interstate commerce therein.

On the other hand, in some New England states less than one per cent of the crop land is devoted to wheat, and the average harvest is less than five acres per farm. In 1940 the average percentage of the total wheat production that was sold in each state, as measured by value, ranged from 29 per cent thereof in Wisconsin to 90 per cent in Washington. Except in regions of large-scale production, wheat is usually grown in rotation with other crops; for a nurse crop for grass seeding; and as a cover crop to prevent soil erosion and leaching. Some is sold, some kept for seed, and a percentage of the total production much larger than in areas of specialization is consumed on the farm and grown for such purpose. Such farmers, while growing some wheat, may even find the balance of their interest on the consumer's side.

The effect of consumption of home-grown wheat on interstate commerce is due to the fact that it constitutes the most variable factor in the disappearance of the wheat crop. Consumption on the farm where grown appears to vary in an amount greater than 20 per cent of average production. The total amount of wheat consumed as food varies but relatively little, and use as seed is relatively constant.

The maintenance by government regulation of a price for wheat undoubtedly can be accomplished as effectively by sustaining or increasing the demand as by limiting the supply. The effect of the statute before us is to restrict the amount which may be produced for market and the extent as well to which one may forestall resort to the market by producing to meet his own needs. That appellee's own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial by itself is not enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial. Labor Board v. Fainblatt, 306 U. S. 601, 606, et seq.; United States v. Darby, supra, at 123.

It is well established by decisions of this Court that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate the prices at which commodities in that commerce are dealt in and practices affecting such prices. One of the primary purposes of the act in question was to increase the market price of wheat, and to that end to limit the volume thereof that could affect the market. It can hardly be denied that a factor of such volume and variability as home-consumed wheat would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions. This may arise because being in marketable condition such wheat overhangs the market and, if induced by rising prices, tends to flow into the market and check price increases. But if we assume that it is never marketed, it supplies a need of the man who grew it which would otherwise be reflected by purchases in the open market. Home-grown wheat in this sense competes with wheat in commerce. The stimulation of commerce is a use of the regulatory function quite as definitely as prohibitions or restrictions thereon. This record leaves us in no doubt that Congress may properly have considered that wheat consumed on the farm where grown, if wholly outside the scheme of regulation, would have a substantial effect in defeating and obstructing its purpose to stimulate trade therein at increased prices.

It is said, however, that this Act, forcing some farmers into the market to buy what they could provide for themselves, is an unfair promotion of the markets and prices of specializing wheat growers. It is of the essence of regulation that it lays a restraining hand on the self-interest of the regulated and that advantages from the regulation commonly fall to others. The conflicts of economic interest between the regulated and those who advantage by it are wisely left under our system to resolution by the Congress under its more flexible and responsible legislative process. Such conflicts rarely lend themselves to judicial determination. And with the wisdom, workability, or fairness, of the plan of regulation we have nothing to do.

The statute is also challenged as a deprivation of property without due process of law contrary to the Fifth Amendment, both because of its regulatory effect on the appellee and because of its alleged retroactive effect. * * *

[In the remainder of the opinion the Court held that the statute did not violate the Fifth Amendment, as applied to complainant, and reversed the District Court.]

NOTES

1. When Congress, during the closing years of the last century, began to use its commerce power in an effort to govern many phases of the national economy and resulting problems of constitutional interpretation were fraught with momentous practical consequences, the Supreme Court for upwards of half a century failed to follow a consistent course in determining the scope of the affirmative federal commerce power. Two lines of decision emerged, one giving a broad and the other a greatly contracted interpretation of the commerce clause and the extent of congressional authority under it. The cases selected for inclusion in this volume and those summarized and discussed in the notes are illustrative of these divergent approaches. The student will thus rightly conclude that during the period from 1890 to 1937, when the Jones & Laughlin case was decided by a still divided court, the constitutional law of the United States in respect to the scope of national power under the commerce clause was in a confused and formless state. Therefore, when first confronted with the politically explosive problem of the constitutionality of important New Deal legislation in the early thirties, the court had available in its judicial arsenal two conflicting sets of precedents. In choosing the solution which was restrictive of federal power in the Schechter and Carter Coal Company cases it brought itself into headlong collision with the dominant political branches of the national government—a quarrel which culminated in the “court-packing” controversy of 1937. The extent to which the court ultimately accepted the broad interpretation of the affirmative commerce power of Congress is exemplified by the opinion in Wickard v. Filburn.

2. The commerce power of Congress includes the control of navigable waters of the United States, the regulation of their use for purposes of interstate and foreign commerce, and the power to forbid the erection of physical obstructions upon waterways used in interstate navigation. In 1899 Congress forbade the construction of any bridge, causeway, dam or dike on any navigable waterway without its consent, or, if the waterway was entirely within a single state, the consent of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. 33 U. S. C. § 401. Subsequently, the power to consent to the construction of dams was delegated to the Federal Power Commission. 16 U. S. C. § 797 (e).

Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U. S. 288, 80 L. ed. 688, 56 Sup. Ct. 466 (1936) held that where the United States had erected a dam to improve navigation on a stream, the water power and electric energy generated at the dam were susceptible of disposition as property belonging to the United States wherever the government deemed most advantageous, the decision being rested on Art. IV, § 3, cl. 2 of the Constitution. The court in recent cases has greatly expanded its interpretation of what constitutes a “navigable stream,” holding that navigability is to be determined on the basis not only of the stream’s natural condition but also of its possible availability for navigation after the making of reasonable improvements. The result has been greatly to extend the jurisdiction of the federal government over water power projects. Flood protection, watershed development and recovery of cost of improvements through utilization of power are all parts of commerce control, and it is for Congress alone to decide whether a particular project by itself or as part of a more comprehensive scheme, will have such beneficial effect on interstate commerce as to justify its being undertaken. See United States v. Appalachian Electric Power Co., 311 U. S. 377, 85 L. ed. 243, 61 Sup. Ct. 291 (1940); Oklahoma ex rel. Phillips v. Guy F. Atkinson Co., 313 U. S. 508, 85 L. ed. 1487, 61 Sup. Ct. 1050 (1941); and United States v. Commodore Park, Inc., 324 U. S. 386, 89 L. ed. 1017, 65 Sup. Ct. 803 (1945).

Section 3.—State Power to Regulate Commerce.

COOLEY v. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1851.

12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996.

[Suit was begun in a Pennsylvania court to recover from Cooley, the consignee of two vessels, half pilotage fees, the two vessels having sailed from Philadelphia without a local pilot, in violation of a state statute which required vessels coming into or leaving the port to accept local pilots for pilotage through the Delaware River, and upon neglect to do so the master, owner or consignee was made liable to pay to the warden, as a penalty, half the pilotage fees, creating a fund for the relief of pilots and their dependents. The state supreme court sustained a judgment against Cooley, who took this writ of error.]

MR. JUSTICE CURTIS delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

That the power to regulate commerce includes the regulation of navigation, we consider settled. And when we look to the nature of the service performed by pilots, to the relations which that service and its compensations bear to navigation between the several states, and between the ports of the United States and foreign countries, we are brought to the conclusion, that the regulation of the qualifications of pilots, of the modes and times of offering and rendering their services, of the responsibilities which shall rest upon them, of the powers they shall possess, of the compensation they may demand, and of the penalties by which their rights and duties may be enforced, do constitute regulations of navigation, and consequently of commerce, within the just meaning of this clause of the Constitution.

The power to regulate navigation is the power to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it, as well as to the instruments used. Accordingly, the first Congress assembled under the Constitution passed laws, requiring the masters of ships and vessels of the United States to be citizens of the United States, and established many rules for the government and regulation of officers and seamen. 1 Stats. at Large, 55, 131. These have been from time to time added to and changed, and we are not aware that their validity has been questioned.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider whether this law of Pennsylvania, being a regulation of commerce, is valid.

The Act of Congress of the 7th of August, 1789, § 4, is as follows:

"That all pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and ports of the United States shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the states, respectively, wherein such pilots may be, or with such laws as the states may respectively hereafter enact for the purpose, until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress."

If the law of Pennsylvania, now in question, had been in existence at the date of this act of Congress, we might hold it to have been adopted by Congress, and thus made a law of the United States, and so valid. Because this act does, in effect, give the force of an act of Congress, to the then existing state laws on this subject, so long as they should continue unrepealed by the state which enacted them. But the law on which these actions are founded, was not enacted till 1803. What effect then can be attributed to so much of the act of 1789 as declares that pilots shall continue to be regulated in conformity "with such laws as the states may respectively hereafter enact for the purpose, until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress"?

If the states were divested of the power to legislate on this subject by the grant of the commercial power to Congress, it is plain this act could not confer upon them power thus to legislate. If the Constitution excluded the states from making any law regulating commerce, certainly Congress cannot regrant, or in any manner reconvey to the states that power. And yet this act of 1789 gives its sanction only to laws enacted by the states. This necessarily implies a constitutional power to legislate; for only a rule created by the sovereign power of a state acting in its legislative capacity, can be deemed a law enacted by a state; and if the state has so limited its sovereign power that it no longer extends to a particular subject, manifestly it cannot, in any proper sense, be said to enact laws thereon. Entertaining these views, we are brought directly and unavoidably to the consideration of the question, whether the grant of the commercial power to Congress did per se deprive the states of all power to regulate pilots. This question has never been decided by this court, nor, in our judgment, has any case depending upon all the considerations which must govern this one, come before this court. The grant of commercial power to Congress does not contain any terms which expressly exclude the states from exercising an authority over its subject matter. If they are excluded, it must be because the nature of the power thus granted to Congress requires that a similar authority should not exist in the states. If it were conceded on the one side that the nature of this power, like that to legislate for the District of Columbia, is absolutely and totally repugnant to the existence of similar power in the states, probably no one would deny that the grant of the power to Congress, as effectually and perfectly excludes the states from all future legislation on the subject, as if express words had been used to exclude them. And on the other hand, if it were admitted that the existence of this power in Congress, like the power of taxation, is compatible with the existence of a similar power in the states, then it would be in conformity with the contemporary exposition of the Constitution ("Federalist," No. 32), and with the judicial construction given from time to time by this court, after the most deliberate consideration, to hold that the mere grant of such a power to Congress, did not imply a prohibition on the states to exercise the same power; that it is not the mere existence of such a power, but its exercise by Congress, which may be incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the states, and that the states may legislate in the absence of congressional regulations. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 193; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1; Willson v. Blackbird Creek Co., 2 Pet. 251.

The diversities of opinion, therefore, which have existed on this subject have arisen from the different views taken of the nature of this power. But when the nature of a power like this is spoken of, when it is said that the nature of the power requires that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress, it must be intended to refer to the subjects of that power, and to say they are of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Now, the power to regulate commerce, embraces a vast field, containing not only many, but exceedingly various subjects, quite unlike in their nature; some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule, operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port; and some, like the subject now in question, as imperatively demanding that diversity, which alone can meet the local necessities of navigation.

Either absolutely to affirm, or deny that the nature of this power requires exclusive regulation by Congress, is to lose sight of the nature of the subjects of this power, and to assert concerning all of them, what is really applicable but to a part. Whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit only of one uniform system, or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. That this cannot be affirmed of laws for the regulation of pilots and pilotage, is plain. The act of 1789 contains a clear and authoritative declaration by the first Congress, that the nature of this subject is such that until Congress should find it necessary to exert its power, it should be left to the legislation of the states; that it is local and not national; that it is likely to be the best provided for, not by one system, or plan of regulations, but by as many as the legislative discretion of the several states should deem applicable to the local peculiarities of the ports within their limits.

Viewed in this light, so much of this act of 1789, as declares that pilots shall continue to be regulated "by such laws as the states may respectively hereafter enact for that purpose," instead of being held to be inoperative, as an attempt to confer on the states a power to legislate, of which the Constitution had deprived them, is allowed an appropriate and important signification. It manifests the understanding of Congress, at the outset of the government, that the nature of this subject is not such as to require its exclusive legislation. The practice of the states, and of the national government, has been in conformity with this declaration, from the origin of the national government to this time; and the nature of the subject when examined, is such as to leave no doubt of the superior fitness and propriety, not to say the absolute necessity, of different systems of regulation drawn from local knowledge and experience, and conformed to local wants. How, then, can we say that, by the mere grant of power to regulate commerce, the states are deprived of all the power to legislate on this subject, because from the nature of the power the legislation of Congress must be exclusive? This would be to affirm that the nature of the power is, in this case, something different from the nature of the subject to which, in such case, the power extends, and that the nature of the power necessarily demands, in all cases, exclusive legislation by Congress, while the nature of one of the subjects of that power, not only does not require such exclusive legislation, but may be best provided for by many different systems enacted by the states, in conformity with the circumstances of the ports within their limits. In construing an instrument designed for the formation of a government, and in determining the extent of one of its important grants of power to legislate, we can make no such distinction between the nature of the power and the nature of the subject on which that power was intended practically to operate, nor consider the grant more extensive by affirming of the power what is not true of its subject now in question.

It is the opinion of a majority of the court that the mere grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce, did not deprive the states of power to regulate pilots, and that although Congress has legislated on this subject, its legislation manifests an intention, with a single exception, not to regulate this subject, but to leave its regulation to the several states. To these precise questions, which are all we are called on to decide, this opinion must be understood to be confined. It does not extend to the question what other subjects, under the commercial power, are within the exclusive control of Congress, or may be regulated by the states in the absence of all congressional legislation; nor to the general question, how far any regulation of a subject by Congress, may be deemed to operate as an exclusion of all legislation by the states upon the same subject. We decide the precise questions before us, upon what we deem sound principles, applicable to this particular subject in the state in which the legislation of Congress has left it. We go no further. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES

1. Notes 1 and 2 following the opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden should be reexamined at this point. That case, it will be recalled, held that state action affecting commerce which is in conflict with congressional regulation is invalid, but it left undecided the question whether the commerce power of Congress was exclusive or concurrent. Did the commerce clause of its own force impliedly prohibit state regulation of interstate commerce or were the states free to regulate unless prevented by affirmative action of Congress? The rule of the Cooley case that the power of Congress is exclusive with respect to some matters and concurrent with respect to others was a compromise solution of conflicting viewpoints on this issue in the Supreme Court at the time of its formulation. It is easy to state but difficult to apply. It places upon the court, rather than Congress, the important task of determining whether or not a particular "subject" is "in its nature national" and "admits only of one uniform system, or plan of regulation." Whether the Cooley doctrine has supplied a satisfactory criterion for determining the negative implications of the commerce clause, i. e., the extent to which a state's exercise of its police power or its power of taxation is limited by the mere existence of the clause in the absence of any congressional regulation, has been the subject of much discussion. 2. In the absence of action by Congress, a state may authorize the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream, but Congress may at any time interpose and require the alteration or removal of such a bridge. Virginia having authorized the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at Wheeling, the Supreme Court held that the bridge was an obstruction to navigation and in conflict with acts of Congress regulating the navigation of the river. Subsequently Congress enacted legislation declaring the bridge in question a lawful structure in its then position and elevation. The court pointed out that insofar as the bridge created an obstruction to navigation under previous acts of Congress, such congressional policy had been modified by the subsequent legislation and although the bridge might still be an obstruction in fact it was not so in contemplation of law. "The regulation of commerce includes intercourse and navigation, and, of course, the power to determine what shall or shall not be deemed in judgment of law an obstruction to navigation; and that power, as we have seen, has been exercised consistent with the continuance of the bridge." Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 18 How. 421, 15 L. ed. 435 (1856).

A bridge may be a link in turnpike or railway transportation and its relation to commerce by land may be more important than its relation to the navigation of the river which it spans. The degree to which one type of commerce is to be made subservient to the other may be determined by the states unless and until Congress intervenes. Thus, Philadelphia under authority of a Pennsylvania statute had the power to regulate the building of a bridge over the Schuylkill River in Philadelphia, in the absence of congressional legislation. Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713, 18 L. ed. 96 (1866). So too, Illinois had the power to regulate the use of bridges over a navigable river in the City of Chicago, in the absence of legislation by Congress. Escanaba & L. M. Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678, 27 L. ed. 442, 2 Sup. Ct. 185 (1882). Previously noted federal legislation on the subject is discussed in Blair, Federal Bridge Legislation and the Constitution, 36 Yale L. J. 808 (1927).

McDERMOTT v. WISCONSIN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1913.

[McDermott and one Grady were severally convicted in a circuit court of Wisconsin for the violation of a statute of that state relating to the sale of corn syrup and other articles and for the protection of the public health. The statute made it unlawful to sell or offer for sale various syrups mixed with glucose unless the container in which the syrup was sold was labelled in a manner prescribed by the statute, and provided that such mixtures or syrups should have upon them no other designation or brand designating a saccharine substance than that prescribed by the statute. Each of the defendants, who were retail merchants in Wisconsin, had ordered and received twelve half-gallon cans of corn syrup from wholesale grocers in Chicago, the shipments being made in wooden boxes containing the cans. Defendants removed the cans from the boxes and placed them on their shelves for sale, labelled as required by the federal Food and Drugs Act of 1906, but not labelled as required by the Wisconsin act. The convictions were affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State. 143 Wis. 18, 126 N. W. 888. Writ of error to that court.]

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * It is insisted that the federal Food and Drugs Act passed under the authority of the Constitution has taken possession of this field of regulation and that the State act is a wrongful interference with the exclusive power of Congress over interstate commerce, in which, it appears, the goods in question were shipped. * * *

That Congress has ample power in this connection is no longer open to question. That body has the right not only to pass laws which shall regulate legitimate commerce among the states and with foreign nations, but has full power to keep the channels of such commerce free from the transportation of illicit or harmful articles, to make such as are injurious to the public health outlaws of such commerce, and to bar them from the facilities and privileges thereof. Congress may itself determine the means appropriate to this purpose, and so long as they do no violence to other provisions of the Constitution, it is itself the judge of the means to be employed in exercising the powers conferred upon it in this respect. * * *

The Food and Drugs Act was passed by Congress, under its authority to exclude from interstate commerce impure and adulterated food and drugs, and to prevent the facilities of such commerce being used to enable such articles to be transported throughout the country from their place of manufacture to the people who consume and use them, and it is in the light of the purpose and of the power exerted in its passage by Congress that this act must be considered and construed. * * *

That the word "package" or its equivalent expression, as used by Congress in §§ 7 and 8 in defining what shall constitute adulteration and what shall constitute misbranding within the meaning of the act, clearly refers to the immediate container of the article which is intended for consumption by the public, there can be no question. * * *

Within the limitations of its right to regulate interstate commerce, Congress manifestly is aiming at the contents of the package as it shall reach the consumer, for whose protection the act was primarily passed, and it is the branding upon the package which contains the article intended for consumption itself which is the subject matter of regulation. Limiting the requirements of the act as to adulteration and misbranded simply to the outside wrapping or box containing the packages intended to be purchased by the consumer, so that the importer, by removing and destroying such covering, could prevent the operation of the law on the imported article yet unsold, would render the act nugatory and its provisions wholly inadequate to accomplish the purposes for which it was passed.

The object of the statute is to prevent the misuse of the facilities of interstate commerce in conveying to and placing before the consumer misbranded and adulterated articles of medicine or food, and in order that its protection may be afforded to those who are intended to receive its benefits the brands regulated must be upon the packages intended to reach the purchaser. This is the only practical or sensible construction of the act, and, for the reasons we have stated, we think the requirements of the act as so construed clearly within the powers of Congress over the facilities of interstate commerce, and such has been the construction generally placed upon the act by the federal courts. * * *

While these regulations are within the power of Congress, it by no means follows that the State is not permitted to make regulations, with a view to the protection of its people against fraud or imposition by impure food or drugs. This subject was fully considered by this Court in Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, in which the power of the State to make regulations concerning the same subject-matter, reasonable in their terms, and not in conflict with the acts of Congress, was recognized and stated, and certain regulations of the State of Indiana were held not to be inconsistent with the Food and Drugs Act of Congress. While this is true, it is equally well settled that the State may not, under the guise of exercising its police power or otherwise, impose burdens upon or discriminate against interstate commerce, nor may it enact legislation in conflict with the statutes of Congress passed for the regulation of the subject, and if it does, to the extent that the state law interferes with or frustrates the operation of the acts of Congress, its provisions must yield to the superior Federal power given to Congress by the Constitution. * * *

Having in view the interpretation we have given the Food and Drugs Act, and applying the doctrine just stated * * *, how does the matter stand? When delivered for shipment and when received through the channels of interstate commerce, the cans in question bore brands or labels which were supposed to comply with the requirements of the act of Congress. * * *

While in this situation, the goods being unsold, as a condition of their legitimate sale within the State, and also of their being in the possession of the importer for the purpose of sale and of being exposed and offered for sale by him, the Wisconsin statute provides that they shall bear the label required by the state law and none other (which represents a saccharine substance, as do the labels in these cases). In other words, it is essential to a legal exercise of possession of and traffic in such goods under the state law that labels which presumably meet with the requirements of the federal law, and for the determination of the correctness of which Congress has provided efficient means, shall be removed from the packages before the first sale by the importer. In this connection it might be noted that, as a practical matter, at least, the first time the opportunity of inspection by the federal authorities arises in cases like the present is when the goods, after having been manufactured, put up in package form and boxed in one State, and having been transported in interstate commerce, arrive at their destination, are delivered to the consignee, unboxed, and placed by him upon the shelves of his store for sale. Conceding to the State the authority to make regulations consistent with the federal law for the further protection of its citizens against impure and misbranded food and drugs, we think to permit such regulation as is embodied in this statute is to permit a State to discredit and burden legitimate federal regulations of interstate commerce, to destroy rights arising out of the federal statute which have accrued both to the government and the shipper, and to impair the effect of a federal law which has been enacted under the constitutional power of Congress over the subject.

To require the removal or destruction before the goods are sold of the evidence which Congress has, by the Food and Drugs Act, as we shall see, provided may be examined to determine the compliance or noncompliance with the regulations of the federal law, is beyond the power of the State. The Wisconsin act which permits the sale of articles subject to the regulations of interstate commerce only upon condition that they contain the exclusive labels required by the statute is an act in excess of its legitimate power.

It is insisted, however, that, since at the time when the state act undertook to regulate the branding of these goods, namely, when in the possession of the plaintiffs in error, and held upon their shelves for sale, the cans had been removed from the boxes in which they were shipped in interstate commerce, they had therefore passed beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, and their regulation was exclusively a matter for state legislation. This assertion is based upon the original-package doctrine as it is said to have been laid down in the former decisions in this Court. * * *

Congress, having made adulterated and misbranded articles contraband of interstate commerce, in the manner we have already pointed out, provides in section 10 of the act that such articles may be proceeded against and seized for confiscation and condemnation while being transported from one State, Territory, district, or insular possession to another for sale, or, having been transported, remaining "unloaded, unsold, or in original unbroken packages," and the subsequent provisions of the section regulate the disposition of the articles seized. To make the provisions of the act effectual, Congress has provided not only for the seizure of the goods while being actually transported in interstate commerce, but has also provided for such seizure after such transportation and while the goods remain "unloaded, unsold, or in original unbroken packages." The opportunity for inspection en route may be very inadequate. The real opportunity of government inspection may only arise, when, as in the present case, the goods as packed have been removed from the outside box in which they were shipped, and remain, as the act provides, "unsold." It is enough, by the terms of the act, if the articles are unsold, whether in original packages or not. Bearing in mind the authority of Congress to make effectual regulations to keep impure or misbranded articles out of the channels of interstate commerce, we think the provisions of section 10 are clearly within its power. Indeed it seems evident that they are measures essential to the accomplishment of the purpose of the act.

The doctrine of original packages had its origin in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419. * * * It was intended to protect the importer in the right to sell the imported goods which was the real object and purpose of importation. To determine the time when an article passes out of the interstate into state jurisdiction for the purpose of taxation is entirely different from deciding when an article which has violated a federal prohibition becomes immune. The doctrine was not intended to limit the right of Congress, now asserted, to keep the channels of interstate commerce free from the carriage of injurious or fraudulent branded articles, and to choose appropriate means to that end. The legislative means provided in the federal law for its own enforcement may not be thwarted by state legislation having a direct effect to impair the efficient exercise of such means.

For the reasons stated, the statute of Wisconsin, in forbidding all labels other than the one it prescribed, is invalid, and it follows that the judgments of the state court affirming the convictions of the plaintiffs in error for selling the articles in question without the exclusive brand required by the state must be reversed, and the cases are remanded to the state court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

NOTES

1. The "original package" doctrine, referred to in the opinion in the principal case, was announced in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678 (1927), where it was held that a state may not impose license fees on merchants selling goods imported in foreign commerce in the original package. In this case Chief Justice Marshall defined the meaning of the term "import" in the provision of the Constitution (Art. I, § 10, cl. 2) that "no state shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws," and laid down the rule that an article transported in foreign commerce ceased to be an import and became subject to state taxation only when the original package in which it was shipped was broken or when it was sold by the importer. Although the grounds of the decision were peculiar to foreign commerce, the rule was subsequently applied to interstate commerce. The case is reprinted in the following section, where it will be considered more fully.

2. In fact situations of the type involved in the principal case, where the subject is one which a state may regulate in the absence of federal legislation, the problem is frequently to determine whether an act of Congress dealing with the same subject has so far "occupied the field" as to invalidate the state statute. This problem, while one of statutory construction rather than constitutional law, has been the bone of contention in much important litigation. Where there is a conflict, either specifically or by implication, between the act of Congress and the state law, the former governs. But not infrequently there is no actual conflict and the problem is one of determining the intent of Congress in enacting its legislation. The federal statute may, of course, have made it clear that Congress intended to occupy the field exclusively. Sometimes, however, the language of the statute is not free from doubt and the court's solution will depend on its own questionable interpretation of the available evidence as to the scope and purpose of the congressional regulation.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF INDIANA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1915.
236 U. S. 439, 59 L. ed. 661, 35 Sup. Ct. 304.

MR. JUSTICE LAMAR delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Indiana statute requires railway companies to place secure grab-irons and hand-holds on the sides or ends of every railroad car, under a penalty of $100 fine to be recovered in a civil action.

In March, 1910, the Railroad Commission of the state brought such a suit against the Southern Railway Company, alleging that the company on February 24, 1910, had transported from Boonville, Indiana, to Milltown, Indiana, a car which did not have the required equipment. The defendant filed an answer in which it denied liability under the state law inasmuch as on February 24, 1910, the Federal Safety Appliance Act imposed penalties for failing to equip cars with hand-holds and also designated the court in which they might be recovered. The commission's demurrer to the answer was sustained. The defendant refusing to plead further, judgment was entered against the company. That judgment was affirmed by the state court and the case was brought here by writ of error.

The car alleged to have been without the required equipment, though transporting freight between points wholly within the State of Indiana, was moving on a railroad engaged in interstate commerce and the company was, therefore, subject to the provisions and penalties of the Safety Appliance Act. 27 Stat. 531, § 4. Southern Railway v. United States, 222 U. S. 20.

The defendant in error insists, however, that the railroad company was also liable for the penalty imposed by the Indiana statute. In support of this position numerous cases are cited which, like Cross

v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131, hold that the same act may constitute a criminal offense against two sovereignties, and that punishment by one does not prevent punishment by the other. That doctrine is thoroughly established. But, upon an analysis of the principle on which it is founded, it will be found to relate only to cases where the act sought to be punished is one over which both sovereignties have jurisdiction. This concurrent jurisdiction may be either because the nature of the act is such that at the same time it produces effects respectively within the sphere of state and federal regulation and thus violates the laws of both; or, where there is this double effect in a matter of which one can exercise control but an authoritative declaration that the paramount jurisdiction of one shall not exclude that of the other. Compare, R. S., § 711; 37 Stat. 670.

But the principle that the offender may, for one act, be prosecuted in two jurisdictions has no application where one of the governments has exclusive jurisdiction of the subject-matter and therefore the exclusive power to punish. Such is the case here where Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate commerce, has legislated as to the appliances with which certain instrumentalities of that commerce must be furnished in order to secure the safety of employees. Until Congress entered that field the states could legislate as to equipment in such manner as to incidentally affect without burdening interstate commerce. But Congress could pass the Safety Appliance Act only because of the fact that the equipment of cars moving on interstate roads was a regulation of interstate commerce. Under the Constitution the nature of that power is such that when exercised it is exclusive, and ipso facto, supersedes existing state legislation on the same subject. Congress of course could have "circumscribed its regulations" so as to occupy a limited field. Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 533; Atlantic Line v. Georgia, 234 U. S. 280, 293. But so far as it did legislate, the exclusive effect of the Safety Appliance Act did not relate merely to details of the statute and the penalties it imposed, but extended to the whole subject of equipping cars with appliances intended for the protection of employees. The states thereafter could not legislate so as to require greater or less or different equipment; nor could they punish by imposing greater or less or different penalties.

Without, therefore, discussing the many cases sustaining the right of the states to legislate on subjects which, while not burdening, may yet incidentally affect interstate commerce, it is sufficient here to say that Congress has so far occupied the field of legislation relating to the equipment of freight cars with safety appliances as to supersede existing and prevent further legislation on that subject. The principle is too well established to require argument. Its application may be seen in rulings in the closely analogous cases relating to state penalties for failing to furnish cars and to state penalties for retaining employees at work on cars beyond the time allowed by the Hours-of-Service Law.

* * *

The test, however, is not whether the state legislation is in conflict with the details of the federal law or supplements it, but whether the state had any jurisdiction of a subject over which Congress had exerted its exclusive control. The Safety Appliance Act having superseded the Indiana statute the judgment imposing the penalty must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

NOTES

1. The Federal Employers' Liability Act excludes the application of state workmen's compensation laws, the Supreme Court having interpreted the federal statute as intended to provide a complete regulation of the liability of an interstate railroad to such of its employees as are engaged in interstate commerce. New York Central R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 147, 61 L. ed. 1045, 37 Sup. Ct. 546, L. R. A. 1918C, 439, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1139 (1917).

2. In Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 61 L. ed. 1086, 37 Sup. Ct. 524, L. R. A. 1918C, 451 Ann. Cas. 1917E, 900 (1917) the Supreme Court (Justices Holmes, Pitney, Brandeis and Clarke dissenting) held that the New York Workmen's Compensation Act did not apply to maritime workers injured in New York while unloading a vessel engaged in the coastwise traffic, since the constitutionally required uniformity in respect to maritime matters would be destroyed if the states could subject ships coming into their ports to the obligations of their compensation statutes. A subsequent statute of Congress making the workmen's compensation laws of any state applicable to injuries sustained in maritime work was invalidated on the ground that the grant of power to Congress to legislate with respect to maritime matters was exclusive and could not be delegated to the states. Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U. S. 149, 64 L. ed. 834, 40 Sup. Ct. 438, 11 A. L. R. 1145 (1920), the same four justices dissenting. A further effort by Congress to permit state compensation laws to protect waterfront employees was likewise held invalid in Washington v. W. C. Dawson & Co., 264 U. S. 219, 68 L. ed. 646, 44 Sup. Ct. 302 (1924). Finally, in 1927, Congress enacted the Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act (33 U. S. C. § 901 et seq.), thus seeking by direct legislation an objective which the court had held could not be effected through delegation to the states. Here again, though, Congress made clear its purpose to permit state compensation protection whenever possible by making the federal law applicable only "if recovery for the disability or death through workmen's compensation proceedings may not validly be provided by state law." The difficulties involved in determining whether certain employees are covered by the federal or state laws are discussed in Davis v. Department of Labor & Industries, 317 U. S. 249, 87 L. ed. 246, 63 Sup. Ct. 225 (1942), the court saying that there is "clearly a twilight zone in which the employees must have their rights determined case by case, and in which particular facts and circumstances are vital elements."

KELLY v. WASHINGTON EX REL. FOSS CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1937.
302 U. S. 1, 82 L. ed. 3, 58 Sup. Ct. 87.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondents, owners of motor-driven tugs, sought a writ of prohibition to prevent the enforcement of provisions of c. 200 of the Washington Laws of 1907 (Rem. Rev. Stat., §§ 9843 et seq.) relating to the inspection and regulation of vessels. The Supreme Court of the state directed judgment for respondents, holding the statute invalid "if applied to the navigable waters over which the Federal Government has control." 186 Wash. 589, 596. We granted certiorari. 299 U. S. 539. After hearing, we ordered reargument and requested the Attorney General of the United States to present the views of the Government upon the question whether the state Act or the action of the officers of the State thereunder conflicts with the authority of the United States or with the action of its officers under the Acts of Congress. The case has been reargued accordingly and the views of the Government have been presented both orally and upon brief in support of the decision of the state court.

The material facts, as set forth in the opinion of the state court, are that respondents own and operate one hundred and thirty-nine motor-driven tugs of which one hundred and eleven are less than sixty-five feet in length. Some of these tugs are registered and the remainder are enrolled and licensed under federal laws. For the most part these tugs are employed in intrastate commerce, but some tow to and from British Columbia ports or across the Columbia River or from other ports in Washington to ports in Oregon. Practically all these tugs are capable of engaging in interstate or foreign commerce and will do so if and when opportunity offers. Some of the larger tugs have towed and will tow to California ports. The main business, however, of most of the tugs is confined to moving vessels engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and other work in and about the harbors where they are stationed. 186 Wash. p. 590.

Respondents' complaint challenged the validity of a large number of requirements of the state Act which it was alleged the state authorities sought to enforce (186 Wash. p. 591), but these authorities by their answer and in the argument at bar disclaim an intention to enforce any of the state regulations which conflict with those established under the laws of the United States.

First. The first question is whether the state legislation as applied to respondents' motor-driven tugs is in all respects in conflict with express provisions of the federal laws and regulations. Wherever such conflict exists, the state legislation must fall, Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 210.

Chapter 200 of the Washington Laws of 1907 is described by the state court as "a comprehensive and complete code for the inspection and regulation of every vessel operated by machinery which is not subject to inspection under the laws of the United States." Rem. Rev. Stat., § 9844; 186 Wash. p. 590. It cannot be doubted that the power of Congress over interstate and foreign commerce embraces the authority to make regulations for respondents' tugs. Foster v. Davenport, 22 How. 244; Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69; Harman v. Chicago, 147 U. S. 396. Has Congress exercised that authority and, if so, to what extent?

The federal acts and regulations with respect to vessels on the navigable waters of the United States are elaborate. They were well described in the argument of the Assistant Solicitor General as a maze of regulation. * * * [The opinion here sets forth in detail the federal statutes, the principal ones being: (1) an act for inspection and regulation of motor vessels carrying freight and passengers for hire; (2) the Motor Boat Act of 1910, which classifies motor boats subject to the Act and regulates the carrying of lights, fog horns, whistles, bells, life preservers, and fire equipment; (3) a statute requiring the marking of vessels with their names and home ports; (4) statutes subjecting to inspection vessels which have on board inflammable or combustible liquid cargo in bulk, or explosives; (5) statutes establishing "load lines" for vessels of one hundred and fifty gross tons in coastwise trade.]

We find the conclusion inescapable that, apart from the particular requirements in other respects, there is no provision of the federal laws and regulations for the inspection of the hull and machinery of respondents' motor-driven tugs in order to insure safety or determine seaworthiness, where these tugs respectively do not carry freight or passengers for hire, or do not have on board any inflammable or combustible liquid cargo in bulk, or do not transport explosives or like dangerous cargo, or are not seagoing vessels of three hundred gross tons or over, or, with respect to requirements as to load lines, are under one hundred and fifty gross tons. It follows that inspection of the hull and machinery of these tugs by state authorities in order to insure safety and determine seaworthiness is not in conflict with any express provision of the federal laws and regulations. The testimony in the record shows that those laws and regulations are administered in accordance with this view.

Second. The next question is whether the federal statutes are to be construed as implying a prohibition of inspection by state authorities of hull and machinery to insure safety and determine seaworthiness in the case of vessels which in this respect lie outside the federal requirements.

The state court took the view that Congress had occupied the field and that no room was left for state action in relation to vessels plying on navigable waters within the control of the federal government. 186 Wash. pp. 593, 596. * * *

This argument, invoking a familiar principle, would be unnecessary and inapposite if there were a direct conflict with an express regulation of Congress acting within its province. The argument presupposes the absence of a conflict of that character. The argument is also unnecessary and inapposite if the subject is one demanding uniformity of regulation so that state action is altogether inadmissible in the absence of federal action. In that class of cases the Constitution itself occupies the field even if there is no federal legislation. The argument is appropriately addressed to those cases where States may act in the absence of federal action but where there has been federal action governing the same subject. * * *

Under our constitutional system, there necessarily remains to the States, until Congress acts, a wide range for the permissible exercise of power appropriate to their territorial jurisdiction although interstate commerce may be affected. Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, 402. States are thus enabled to deal with local exigencies and to exert in the absence of conflict with federal legislation an essential protective power. And when Congress does exercise its paramount authority, it is obvious that Congress may determine how far its regulation shall go. There is no constitutional rule which compels Congress to occupy the whole field. Congress may circumscribe its regulation and occupy only a limited field. When it does so, state regulation outside that limited field and otherwise admissible is not forbidden or displaced. The principle is thoroughly established that the exercise by the State of its police power, which would be valid if not superseded by federal action, is superseded only where the repugnance or conflict is so "direct and positive" that the two acts cannot "be reconciled or consistently stand together." * * *

The application of the principle is strongly fortified where the State exercises its power to protect the lives and the health of its people. But the principle is not limited to cases of that description. It extends to exertions of state power directed to more general purposes. Thus it was applied in sustaining the order of a state commission requiring interstate carriers to construct a union passenger station as against the contention that Congress had occupied the field—in view of the broad sweep of the Act conferring authority upon the Interstate Commission to deal with the operation of interstate railroads—as it was found that Congress had not authorized the Commission to meet the public need in the particular matter in question. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 283 U. S. 380, 391.

In the instant case, in relation to the inspection of the hull and machinery of respondents' tugs, the state law touches that which the federal laws and regulations have left untouched. There is plainly no inconsistency with the federal provisions. It would hardly be asserted that when Congress set up its elaborate regulations as to steam vessels, it deprived the State of the exercise of its protective power as to vessels not propelled by steam. The fact that the federal regulations were numerous and elaborate does not extend them beyond the boundary they established. When Congress took up the regulation of vessels otherwise propelled it applied its requirements to vessels of a described tonnage which carried freight or passengers for hire. When Congress a few years later passed the Motor Boat Act, it did not attempt to deal with the subject comprehensively but laid down rules in a few particulars of a definitely restricted range. And when, in 1936, Congress again addressed itself to the subject, it did not purport to occupy the entire field but confined its regulation to seagoing vessels of three hundred gross tons and over. It would be difficult to find a series of statutes in which the intention of Congress to circumscribe its regulation and to occupy a field limited by definite description is more clearly manifested.

When the State is seeking to prevent the operation of unsafe and unseaworthy vessels in going to and from its ports, it is exercising a protective power akin to that which enables the state to exclude diseased persons, animals and plants. These are not proper subjects of commerce, and an unsafe and unseaworthy vessel is not a proper instrumentality of commerce. When the State is seeking to protect a vital interest, we have always been slow to find that the inaction of Congress has shorn the state of the power which it would otherwise possess. And we are unable to conclude that so far as concerns the inspection of the hull and machinery of these vessels of respondents in order to insure safety and seaworthiness, the federal laws and regulations, which as we have found are not expressly applicable, carry any implied prohibition of state action. * * *

Third. The remaining question is whether the state law must fall in its entirety, not because of inconsistency with federal action, but because the subject is one as to which uniformity of regulation is required and hence, whether or not Congress has acted, the State is without authority. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299, 319; Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, 399, 400. * * *

We have found that in relation to the inspection of the hull and machinery of these tugs, in order to insure safety and seaworthiness, there is a field in which the state law could operate without coming into conflict with present federal laws. Is that a subject which necessarily and in all aspects requires uniformity of regulation and as to which the State cannot act at all, although Congress has not acted? We hold that it is not. A vessel which is actually unsafe and unseaworthy in the primary and commonly understood sense is not within the protection of that principle. The State may treat it as it may treat a diseased animal or unwholesome food. In such a matter, the State may protect its people without waiting for federal action providing the state action does not come into conflict with federal rules. If, however, the State goes farther and attempts to impose particular standards as to structure, design, equipment and operation which in the judgment of its authorities may be desirable but pass beyond what is plainly essential to safety and seaworthiness, the State will encounter the principle that such requirements, if imposed at all, must be through the action of Congress which can establish a uniform rule. Whether the State in a particular matter goes too far must be left to be determined when the precise question arises. * * *

* * * Our conclusion is that the state Act has a permissible field of operation in relation to respondents' tugs and that the state court was in error in holding the Act completely unenforceable in deference to federal law. The judgment of the state court to that effect is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. Reversed.

NOTES

1. In Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. v. Washington, 270 U. S. 87, 70 L. ed. 482, 46 Sup. Ct. 279 (1926) it was held that an act of Congress directing the Secretary of Agriculture to establish quarantines to prevent interstate spread of plant diseases was intended to exclude the states from legislating in that field, and nullified existing state plant quarantine laws. Within six weeks of the decision Congress repudiated this judicial guess at its intention. (44 Stat. 250, 7 U. S. C. § 161.)

2. Whether a statute of New Hampshire making unlawful the operation on state highways of motor vehicles for hire by drivers who had been continuously on duty for more than twelve hours had been superseded by the Federal Motor Carrier Act of 1935 during the period prior to effective action by the Interstate Commerce Commission regulating hours of service of drivers of motor vehicles hauling in interstate commerce, was answered in the negative in H. P. Welch Co. v. New Hampshire, 306 U. S. 79, 83 L. ed. 500, 59 Sup. Ct. 438 (1939). The court assumed that federal regulations governing hours of service, when formulated by the Commission, pursuant to the act, would supersede state statutes, but held that it was not the intent of Congress to displace local law before the new regulations became effective.

3. In Cloverleaf Butter Co. v. Patterson, 315 U. S. 148, 86 L. ed. 754, 62 Sup. Ct. 491 (1942) the court in a five-to-four decision held that federal regulation of the production of renovated butter by a statute taxing such butter and its manufacture, prescribing the conditions under which it is to be made, making provision for its inspection, and giving power to confiscate the finished product, excludes state power to inspect, seize, and detain packing stock butter from which renovated butter is made, from a manufacturer part of whose product is sold in interstate commerce. Chief Justice Stone and Justices Frankfurter, Murphy and Byrnes dissented. The court said: "Congress hardly intended the intrusion of another authority during the very preparation of a commodity subject to the surveillance and comprehensive specifications of the Department of Agriculture. To uphold the power of the State of Alabama to condemn the material in the factory while it was under federal observation and while federal enforcement deemed it wholesome would not only hamper the administration of the federal act but would be inconsistent with its requirements." The dissenters excoriated the result as a departure from the principle that Congress will not be deemed to have intended to strike down a state statute designed to protect the health and safety of the public unless, in terms or in its practical administration, it conflicts with the act of Congress and palpably infringes its policy.

4. A California statute prohibits the sale of any transportation over the public highways of the state if the transporting carrier has failed to secure a permit from either the California Public Utilities Commission or the Interstate Commerce Commission. The federal Motor Carrier Act has substantially the same provision. The statutes differ in other particulars, and the state statute imposes a more severe penalty. The Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, took the view that coincidence of a state law with a federal regulation does not mean the automatic invalidity of the former but is only one factor to be considered in determining congressional intent. Here, since there is no conflict in terms and no possibility of conflict, the state law is valid. The dissenting justices (Frankfurter, Douglas, Jackson and Burton) thought that the California statute invades the exclusive jurisdiction which Congress is exercising through the Interstate Commerce Act and should be held to be superseded. California v. Zook, 336 U. S. 725, 93 L. ed. 1005, 69 Sup. Ct. 841 (1949).

5. A Wisconsin statute prohibiting strikes against public utilities and providing for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes after an impasse in collective bargaining has been reached, was held to be invalid as in conflict with the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 and the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. Justices Frankfurter, Burton and Minton dissented. Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric and Motor Coach Employees v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 340 U. S. 383, 95 L. ed. 364, 71 Sup. Ct. 359 (1951).

6. A state court has no power to enjoin a labor union from picketing an interstate trucking company for the purpose of coercing the company into influencing its employees to join a labor union, although no labor dispute is in progress, since the employer's grievance falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board to prevent unfair labor practices and, consequently, state remedies are excluded. Garner v. Teamsters, Chauffeurs & Helpers Local Union, 346 U. S. 485, 98 L. ed. 228, 74 Sup. Ct. 161 (1953).

7. Problems relating to "occupation of the field" are not peculiar to the commerce power. They may arise in connection with other powers of Congress, any valid exercise of the national prerogative reducing the area within which state regulation may operate, and in some instances excluding state action altogether. See e. g. Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U. S. 52, 85 L. ed. 581, 61 Sup. Ct. 399 (1941), holding that congressional legislation for the registration of aliens rendered a nonconflicting state alien registration law inoperative, Justice Stone dissenting with the concurrence of Chief Justice Hughes and Justice McReynolds. Not only does the question of supersession of state legislation by congressional legislation present difficulties of judgment, but in some instances the court has been divided on the issue as to whether challenged state action is in "irreconcilable conflict" with an act of Congress. A case in point is Hill v. Florida ex rel. Watson, 325 U. S. 538, 89 L. ed. 1782, 65 Sup. Ct. 1373 (1945). See Note, "Occupation of the Field" in Commerce Clause Cases, 1936-1946, 60 Harv. L. Rev. 262 (1946).

PLUMLEY v. MASSACHUSETTS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1894.

[Plumley was convicted for selling in Massachusetts, in violation of the state statute stated in the opinion, ten pounds of oleomargarine colored in imitation of yellow butter, in the unbroken original package sent to him from Illinois by his principal. From the denial by the state supreme court of his habeas corpus petition this writ of error was taken.]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

It will be observed that the statute of Massachusetts which is alleged to be repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prohibit the manufacture or sale of all oleomargarine, but only such as is colored in imitation of yellow butter produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream of such milk. If free from coloration or ingredient that "causes it to look like butter," the right to sell it "in a separate and distinct form, and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character," is neither restricted nor prohibited. It appears in this case that oleomargarine, in its natural condition, is of "a light yellowish color," and that the article sold by the accused was artificially colored "in imitation of yellow butter." Now, the real object of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter is that it may appear to be what it is not, and thus induce unwary purchasers, who do not closely scrutinize the label upon the package in which it is contained, to buy it as and for butter produced from unadulterated milk, or cream from such milk. The suggestion that oleomargarine is artificially colored so as to render it more palatable and attractive can only mean that customers are deluded, by such coloration, into believing that they are getting genuine butter. If any one thinks that oleomargarine, not artificially colored so as to cause it to look like butter, is as palatable or as wholesome for purposes of food as pure butter, he is, as already observed, at liberty, under the statute of Massachusetts, to manufacture it in that state, or to sell it there in such manner as to inform the customer of its real character. He is only forbidden to practice, in such matters, a fraud upon the general public. The statute seeks to suppress false pretenses and to promote fair dealing in the sale of an article of food. * * * Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one state to another state. But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states. * * *

But the case most relied on by the petitioner to support the proposition that oleomargarine, being a recognized article of commerce, may be introduced into a state, and there sold in original packages, without any restriction being imposed by the state upon such sale, is Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100. * * *

It is sufficient to say of Leisy v. Hardin that it did not in form or in substance present the particular question now under consideration. The article which the majority of the court in that case held could be sold in Iowa in original packages, the statute of that state to the contrary notwithstanding, was beer manufactured in Illinois, and shipped to the former state, to be there sold in such packages. So far as the record disclosed, and so far as the contentions of the parties were concerned, the article there in question was what it appeared to be, namely, genuine beer, and not a liquid or drink colored artificially so as to cause it to look like beer. The language we have quoted from Leisy v. Hardin must be restrained in its application to the case actually presented for determination, and does not justify the broad contention that a state is powerless to prevent the sale of articles manufactured in or brought from another state, and subjects of traffic and commerce, if their sale may cheat the people into purchasing something they do not intend to buy, and which is wholly different from what its condition and appearance import. * * *

In view of the complex system of government which exists in this country * * * the judiciary of the United States should not strike down a legislative enactment of a state—especially if it has direct connection with the social order, the health, and the morals of its people—unless such legislation plainly and palpably violates some right granted or secured by the national Constitution, or encroaches upon the authority delegated to the United States for the attainment of objects of national concern. * * *

[MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER, with whom concurred MR. JUSTICE FIELD and MR. JUSTICE BREWER, dissented.]

NOTES

1. Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 49, 18 Sup. Ct. 757 (1898) held invalid a state statute prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine transported in interstate commerce from another state and sold as oleomargarine and not as butter, Congress having previously recognized the product as a proper subject of commerce by imposing a tax thereon and regulating its manufacture, sale and exportation, the court saying that the police power of a state does not include the right to exclude a lawful article of commerce. Collins v. New Hampshire, 171 U. S. 30, 43 L. ed. 60, 18 Sup. Ct. 768 (1898), decided at the same time, held invalid, as applied to original package sales, a state statute prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter unless it was colored pink. By subsequent acts of Congress similar to the Wilson Act relating to intoxicating liquor, oleomargarine shipped in interstate commerce was divested of its interstate character, leaving it subject to the power of the states over their internal commerce (21 U. S. C. § 25).

2. Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. 715 (1912) sustained an Indiana statute which provided for state inspection of prepared foods for domestic animals when offered for sale within the state and required labels to indicate ingredients, the purpose being to prevent fraud. Hygrade Provision Co. v. Sherman, 266 U. S. 497, 69 L. ed. 402, 45 Sup. Ct. 141 (1925) upheld a New York statute which penalized all sales of meat misbranded as kosher meat and misrepresentation of non-kosher meat as kosher, including sales in the original package of interstate shipment. Armour & Co. v. North Dakota, 240 U. S. 510, 60 L. ed. 771, 36 Sup. Ct. 440, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 548 (1916) held valid a state statute requiring lard to be sold at retail in packages of specified net weight, the label to state the true net weight, notwithstanding that wholesalers of other states were forced to conform to these requirements in order to retain their trade.

SMITH v. ST. LOUIS &amp; S. W. R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1901.
181 U. S. 248, 45 L. ed. 847, 21 Sup. Ct. 603.

[Error to the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. The Texas Live-stock Sanitary Commission was authorized by law to establish quarantine and sanitary regulations for the protection of domestic stock. It was made their duty to investigate stock diseases alleged to exist and to adopt preventive measures. In June, 1897, the Commission recited that it had reason to believe that anthrax had broken out in Louisiana or was liable to do so, and recommended that until after November 15, 1897, no cattle, horses, or mules be transported thence into Texas. The Governor proclaimed this regulation. Plaintiff sued defendant railway for a consequent failure to deliver to him in Texas cattle shipped from Louisiana. The Court of Civil Appeals gave judgment for defendant.]

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

To what extent the police power of the state may be exerted on traffic and intercourse within the state, without conflicting with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States has not been precisely defined. * * *

In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, a statute of Missouri which provided that "no Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle shall be driven or otherwise conveyed into or remain in any county in this state between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of November in each year, by any person or persons whatsoever," was held to be in conflict with the clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce.

The case was an action for damages against the railroad company for bringing cattle into the state in violation of the act. A distinction was made between a proper and an improper exertion of the police power of the state. The former was confined to the prohibition of actually infected or diseased cattle and to regulations not transcending such prohibition. The statute was held not to be so confined, and hence was declared invalid. * * *

In Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, some prior cases were reviewed, and the Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Peckham, said:

"The general rule to be deduced from the decisions of this Court is that a lawful article of commerce cannot be wholly excluded from importation into a state from another state where it was manufactured or grown. A state has power to regulate the introduction of any article, including a food product, so as to insure purity of the article imported, but such police power does not include the total exclusion even of an article of food.

"In Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, it was held that an inspection law relating to an article of food was not a rightful exercise of the police power of the state, if the inspection prescribed were of such a character, or if it were burdened with such conditions, as would wholly prevent the introduction of the sound article from other states. This was held in relation to the slaughter of animals whose meat was to be sold as food in the state passing the so-called inspection law. The principle was affirmed in Brimmer v. Rebman, 138 U. S. 78, and in Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 58, 97."

The exclusion in the case at bar is not as complete as in the cited cases. That, however, makes no difference if it is within their principle; and their principle does not depend upon the number of states which are embraced in the exclusion. It depends upon whether the police power of the state has been exerted beyond its province,—exerted to regulate interstate commerce,—exerted to exclude, without discrimination, the good and the bad, the healthy and the diseased, and to an extent beyond what is necessary for any proper quarantine. The words in italics express an important qualification. The prevention of disease is the essence of a quarantine law. Such law is directed, not only to the actually diseased, but to what has become exposed to disease. In Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, the quarantine system of Louisiana was sustained. It established a quarantine below New Orleans, provided health officers and inspection officers, and fees for them, to be paid by the ships detained and inspected. The system was held to be a proper exercise of the police power of the state for the protection of health, though some of its rules amounted to regulations of commerce with foreign nations and among the states. In Kimmish v. Ball, 129 U. S. 217, certain sections of the laws of Iowa were passed on. One of them imposed a penalty upon any person who should bring into the state any Texas cattle, unless they had been wintered at least one winter north of the southern boundary of the state of Missouri or Kansas; or should have in his possession any Texas cattle between the 1st day of November and the 1st day of April following. Another section made any person having in his possession such cattle liable for any damages which might accrue from allowing them to run at large, "and thereby spreading the disease among other cattle, known as the Texas fever," and there was, besides, criminal punishment. The Court did not pass upon the first section. In commenting upon the second some pertinent remarks were made on the facts which justified the statute, and the case of Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, supra, was explained. It was said that the case "interpreted the law of Missouri as saying to all transportation companies: 'You shall not bring into the state any Texas cattle, or any Mexican cattle, or Indian cattle, between March 1st and December 1st in any year, no matter whether they are free from disease or not, no matter whether they may do an injury to the inhabitants of the state or not; and if you do bring them in, even for the purpose of carrying them through the state without unloading them, you shall be subject to extraordinary liabilities.' Page 473. Such a statute, the Court held, was not a quarantine law, nor an inspection law, but a law which interfered with interstate commerce, and therefore invalid. At the same time the Court admitted unhesitatingly that a state may pass laws to prevent animals suffering from contagious or infectious diseases from entering within it. Page 472. No attempt was made to show that all Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle coming from the malarial districts during the months mentioned were infected with the disease, or that such cattle were so generally infected that it would have been impossible to separate the healthy from the diseased. Had such proof been given, a different question would have been presented for the consideration of the court. Certainly all animals thus infected may be excluded from the state by its laws until they are cured of the disease, or at least until some mode of transporting them without danger of spreading it is devised."

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, the Husen Case was again commented upon, and what the law of Missouri was and was not was again declared. A statute of Kansas, however, which made any person who shall drive or ship into the state "any cattle liable or capable of communicating Texas, splenic or Spanish fever to any domestic cattle of this state shall be liable * * * for * * * damages," was held not to be a regulation of commerce. It was also held that the statute was not repugnant to the act of Congress of May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 31, chap. 60), known as the Animal Industry Act.

What, however, is a proper quarantine law—what a proper inspection law in regard to cattle—has not been declared. Under the guise of either a regulation of commerce will not be permitted. Any pretense or masquerade will be disregarded, and the true purpose of a statute ascertained. Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, and Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275. But we are not now put to any inquiry of that kind. The good faith and sincerity of the Texas officers cannot be doubted, and the statutes under which they acted cannot be justifiably complained of. The regulations prescribed are complained of, but are they not reasonably adaptive to the purpose of the statutes,—not in excess of it? Quarantine regulations cannot be the same for cattle as for persons, and must vary with the nature of the disease to be defended against. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

[MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE BROWN wrote dissenting opinions, with the former of which MR. JUSTICE WHITE concurred.]

NOTES

1. While the commerce clause does not prevent the states from subjecting interstate imports to reasonable inspection laws, legislation of this type which discriminates against the products and business of other states is held to burden interstate commerce and is invalid. Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed.

2. A state may charge a reasonable inspection fee for services performed in making the inspection and most inspection statutes include such a provision. D. E. Foote & Co. v. Stanley, 232 U. S. 494, 58 L. ed. 698, 34 Sup. Ct. 377 (1914); Standard Oil Co. v. Graves, 249 U. S. 389, 63 L. ed. 662, 39 Sup. Ct. 320 (1919); Pure Oil Co. v. Minnesota, 248 U. S. 158, 63 L. ed. 180, 39 Sup. Ct. 35 (1918).

3. The imposition of state inspection fees on foreign imports and exports is governed by Art. I, § 10, cl. 2 of the Constitution, which provides: "No state shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any state on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress." The opinion in Patapasco Guano Co. v. North Carolina Board of Agriculture, 171 U. S. 345, 43 L. ed. 191, 18 Sup. Ct. 862 (1898), where an inspection statute which imposed a fee was upheld as against the contention that it was repugnant to the commerce clause and to the import-export clause, pointed out that such laws are not in themselves regulations of commerce and are usually aimed at determining the fitness of articles for domestic use, and, in so doing, protecting the public from fraud.

4. In Mintz v. Baldwin, 289 U. S. 346, 77 L. ed. 1245, 53 Sup. Ct. 611 (1933) the Supreme Court held valid a New York statute which forbade shipping into the state any cattle for dairy or breeding purposes unless accompanied by a certificate that the herd from which the cattle were drawn was free from Bang's disease, authenticated by the chief sanitary official of the state in which the herd was located. The court said that this was an inspection law aimed at preventing the spread of disease among dairy cattle and safeguarding the public health and therefore did not "so unnecessarily burden" interstate trade as to contravene the commerce clause; that federal animal quarantine laws did not purport to cover the entire field, and that the New York regulation did not conflict with any provision of the federal statutes.

BALDWIN v. G. A. F. SEELIG, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1935.

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO delivered the opinion of the Court.

Whether and to what extent the New York Milk Control Act (N. Y. Laws of 1933, c. 158; Laws of 1934, c. 126) may be applied against a dealer who has acquired title to the milk as the result of a transaction in interstate commerce is the question here to be determined.

G. A. F. Seelig, Inc. (appellee in No. 604 and appellant in No. 605) is engaged in business as a milk dealer in the City of New York. It buys its milk, including cream, in Fair Haven, Vermont, from the Seelig Creamery Corporation, which in turn buys from the producers on the neighboring farms. The milk is transported to New York by rail in forty-quart cans, the daily shipment amounting to about 200 cans of milk and 20 cans of cream. Upon arrival in New York about 90% is sold to customers in the original cans, the buyers being chiefly hotels, restaurants and stores. About 10% is bottled in New York, and sold to customers in bottles. By concession title passes from the Seelig Creamery to G. A. F. Seelig, Inc., at Fair Haven, Vermont. For convenience the one company will be referred to as the Creamery and the other as Seelig.

The New York Milk Control Act with the aid of regulations made thereunder has set up a system of minimum prices to be paid by dealers to producers. The validity of that system in its application to producers doing business in New York State has support in our decisions. Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502; Hegeman Farms Corporation v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 163. Cf. Borden's Farm Products Co., Inc. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194. From the farms of New York the inhabitants of the so-called Metropolitan Milk District, comprising the City of New York and certain neighboring communities, derive about 70% of the milk requisite for their use. To keep the system unimpaired by competition from afar, the Act has a provision whereby the protective prices are extended to that part of the supply (about 30%) which comes from other states. The substance of the provision is that, so far as such a prohibition is permitted by the Constitution, there shall be no sale within the state of milk bought outside unless the price paid to the producers was one that would be lawful upon a like transaction within the state. * * *

Seelig buys its milk from the Creamery in Vermont at prices lower than the minimum payable to producers in New York. The Commissioner of Farms and Markets refuses to license the transaction of its business unless it signs an agreement to conform to the New York statute and regulations in the sale of the imported product. This the applicant declines to do. Because of that refusal other public officers, parties to these appeals, announce a purpose to prosecute for trading without a license and to recover heavy penalties. This suit has been brought to restrain the enforcement of the Act in its application to the complainant, repugnancy being charged between its provisions when so applied and limitations imposed by the Constitution of the United States. United States Constitution, Art. I, § 8, clause 3; Fourteenth Amendment, § 1. A District Court of three judges, organized in accordance with § 266 of the Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. § 380), has granted a final decree restraining the enforcement of the Act in so far as sales are made by the complainant while the milk is in the cans or other original packages in which it was brought into New York, but refusing an injunction as to milk taken out of the cans for bottling, and thereafter sold in bottles. See opinion on application for interlocutory injunction:—7 F. Supp. 776; and cf. 293 U. S. 522. The case is here on cross-appeals. 28 U. S. C. § 380.

First. An injunction was properly granted restraining the enforcement of the Act in its application to sales in the original packages.

New York has no power to project its legislation into Vermont by regulating the price to be paid in that state for milk acquired there. So much is not disputed. New York is equally without power to prohibit the introduction within her territory of milk of wholesome quality acquired in Vermont, whether at high prices or at low ones. This again is not disputed. Accepting those postulates, New York asserts her power to outlaw milk so introduced by prohibiting its sale thereafter if the price that has been paid for it to the farmers of Vermont is less than would be owing in like circumstances to farmers in New York. The importer in that view may keep his milk or drink it, but sell it he may not.

Such a power, if exerted, will set a barrier to traffic between one state and another as effective as if customs duties, equal to the price differential, had been laid upon the thing transported. Imposts or duties upon commerce with other countries are placed, by an express prohibition of the Constitution, beyond the power of a state, "except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws." Constitution, Art. I, § 10, clause 2; Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123. Imposts and duties upon interstate commerce are placed beyond the power of a state, without the mention of an exception, by the provision committing commerce of that order to the power of the Congress. Constitution, Art. I, § 8, clause 3. "It is the established doctrine of this Court that a state may not, in any form or under any guise, directly burden the prosecution of interstate business." International Textbook Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 112; and see Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622; Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 344, 351; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Kaw Valley Drainage District, 233 U. S. 75, 79. Nice distinctions have been made at times between direct and indirect burdens. They are irrelevant when the avowed purpose of the obstruction, as well as its necessary tendency, is to suppress or mitigate the consequences of competition between the states. Such an obstruction is direct by the very terms of the hypothesis. We are reminded in the opinion below that a chief occasion of the commerce clauses was "the mutual jealousies and aggressions of the States, taking form in customs barriers and other economic retaliation." Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention, vol. II, p. 308; vol. III, pp. 478, 547, 548; the Federalist, No. XLII; Curtis, History of the Constitution, vol. 1, p. 502; Story on the Constitution, § 259. If New York in order to promote the economic welfare of her farmers, may guard them against competition with the cheaper prices of Vermont, the door has been opened to rivalries and reprisals that were meant to be averted by subjecting commerce between the states to the power of the nation.

The argument is pressed upon us, however, that the end to be served by the Milk Control Act is something more than the economic welfare of the farmers or of any other class or classes. The end to be served is the maintenance of a regular and adequate supply of pure and wholesome milk, the supply being put in jeopardy when the farmers of the state are unable to earn a living income. Nebbia v. New York, supra. Price security, we are told, is only a special form of sanitary security; the economic motive is secondary and subordinate; the state intervenes to make its inhabitants healthy, and not to make them rich. On that assumption we are asked to say that intervention will be upheld as a valid exercise by the state of its internal police power, though there is an incidental obstruction to commerce between one state and another. This would be to eat up the rule under the guise of an exception. Economic welfare is always related to health, for there can be no health if men are starving. Let such an exception be admitted, and all that a state will have to do in times of stress and strain is to say that its farmers and merchants and workmen must be protected against competition from without, lest they go upon the poor relief lists or perish altogether. To give entrance to that excuse would be to invite a speedy end of our national solidarity. The Constitution was framed under the dominion of a political philosophy less parochial in range. It was framed upon the theory that the peoples of the several states must sink or swim together, and that in the long run prosperity and salvation are in union and not division.

We have dwelt up to this point upon the argument of the state that economic security for farmers in the milkshed may be a means of assuring to consumers a steady supply of a food of prime necessity. There is, however, another argument which seeks to establish a relation between the well-being of the producer and the quality of the product. We are told that farmers who are underpaid will be tempted to save the expense of sanitary precautions. This temptation will affect the farmers outside New York as well as those within it. For that reason the exclusion of milk paid for in Vermont below the New York minimum will tend, it is said, to impose a higher standard of quality and thereby promote health. We think the argument will not avail to justify impediments to commerce between the states. There is neither evidence nor presumption that the same minimum prices established by order of the Board for producers in New York are necessary also for producers in Vermont. But apart from such defects of proof, the evils springing from uncared for cattle must be remedied by measures of repression more direct and certain than the creation of a parity of prices between New York and other states. Appropriate certificates may be exacted from farmers in Vermont and elsewhere (Mintz v. Baldwin, 289 U. S. 346; Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 137; milk may be excluded if necessary safeguards have been omitted; but commerce between the states is burdened unduly when one state regulates by indirection the prices to be paid to producers in another, in the faith that augmentation of prices will lift up the level of economic welfare, and that this will stimulate the observance of sanitary requirements in the preparation of the product. The next step would be to condition importation upon proof of a satisfactory wage scale in factory or shop, or even upon proof of the profits of the business. Whatever relation there may be between earnings and sanitation is too remote and indirect to justify obstructions to the normal flow of commerce in its movement between states. Cf. Asbell v. Kansas, 209 U. S. 251, 256; Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 472. One state may not put pressure of that sort upon others to reform their economic standards. If farmers or manufacturers in Vermont are abandoning farms or factories, or are failing to maintain them properly, the legislature of Vermont and not that of New York must supply the fitting remedy. * * *

Second. There was error in refusing an injunction to restrain the enforcement of the Act in its application to milk in bottles to be sold by the importer.

The test of the "original package," which came into our law with Brown v. Marland, 12 Wheat. 419, is not inflexible and final for the transactions of interstate commerce, whatever may be its validity for commerce with other countries. Cf. Woodruff v. Parham, supra; Anglo-Chilean Nitrate Sales Corp v. Alabama, 288 U. S. 218, 226. There are purposes for which merchandise, transported from another state, will be treated as a part of the general mass of property at the state of destination though still in the original containers. This is so, for illustration, where merchandise so contained is subjected to a non-discriminatory property tax which it bears equally with other merchandise produced within the state. Sonneborn Bros. v. Cureton, 262 U. S. 506; Texas Co. v. Brown, 258 U. S. 466, 475; American Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed, 192 U. S. 500. There are other purposes for which the same merchandise will have the benefit of the protection appropriate to interstate commerce, though the original packages have been broken and the contents subdivided. "A state tax upon merchandise brought in from another State, or upon its sales, whether in original packages or not, after it has reached its destination and is in a state of rest, is lawful only when the tax is not discriminating in its incidence against the merchandise because of its origin in another State." Sonneborn Bros. v. Cureton, supra, at p. 516. Cf. McDermott v. Wisconsin, 228 U. S. 115, 133; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 125 U. S. 465, 491; Brimmer v. Rebman, 138 U. S. 78; Savage v. Jones, supra, at p. 525; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Foster, 247 U. S. 105, 114; Pacific Co. v. Johnson, 285 U. S. 480, 493. In brief, the test of the original package is not an ultimate principle. It is an illustration of a principle. Penn. Gas. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 225 N. Y. 397, 403. It marks a convenient boundary and one sufficiently precise save in exceptional conditions. What is ultimate is the principle that one state in its dealings with another may not place itself in a position of economic isolation. Formulas and catchwords are subordinate to this over-mastering requirement. Neither the power to tax nor the police power may be used by the state of destination with the aim and effect of establishing an economic barrier against competition with the products of another state or the labor of its residents. Restrictions so contrived are an unreasonable clog upon the mobility of commerce. They set up what is equivalent to a rampart of customs duties designed to neutralize advantages belonging to the place of origin. They are thus hostile in conception as well as burdensome in result. The form of the packages in such circumstances is immaterial, whether they are original or broken. The importer must be free from imposts framed for the very purpose of suppressing competition from without and leading inescapably to the suppression so intended.

The statute here in controversy will not survive that test. A dealer in milk buys it in Vermont at prices there prevailing. He brings it to New York, and is told he may not sell it if he removes it from the can and pours it into bottles. He may not do this for the reason that milk in Vermont is cheaper than milk in New York at the regimented prices, and New York is moved by the desire to protect her inhabitants from the cut prices and other consequences of Vermont competition. To overcome that competition a common incident of ownership—the privilege of sale in convenient receptacles—is denied to one who has bought in interstate commerce. He may not sell on any terms to any one, whether the orders were given in advance or came to him thereafter. The decisions of this Court as to the significance of the original package in interstate transactions were not meant to be a cover for retortion or suppression.

The distinction is clear between a statute so designed and statutes of the type considered in Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, to take one example out of many available. By the teaching of that decision intoxicating liquors are not subject to license or prohibition by the state of destination without congressional consent. They become subject, however, to such laws when the packages are broken. There is little, if any, analogy between restrictions of that type and those in controversy here. In licensing or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors a state does not attempt to neutralize economic advantages belonging to the place of origin. What it does is no more than to apply its domestic policy, rooted in its conceptions of morality and order, to property which for such a purpose may fairly be deemed to have passed out of commerce and to be commingled in an absorbing mass. So also the analogy is remote between restrictions like the present ones upon the sale of imported milk and restrictions affecting sales in unsanitary sweat-shops. It is one thing for a state to exact adherence by an importer to fitting standards of sanitation before the products of the farm or factory may be sold in its markets. It is a very different thing to establish a wage scale or a scale of prices for use in other states, and to bar the sale of the products, whether in the original packages or in others, unless the scale has been observed.

The decree in No. 604 is affirmed, and that in No. 605 reversed, and the cause remanded for proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

NOTES

1. In Whitfield v. Ohio, 297 U. S. 431, 80 L. ed. 778, 56 Sup. Ct. 532 (1936) the Supreme Court sustained an Ohio statute prohibiting sale on the open market of goods manufactured wholly or in part by convicts in other states. The court relied upon the Hawes-Cooper Act, enacted by Congress to assist the states in enforcing their local policies against the sale of such goods within their borders, but the opinion suggests that the same result would have been reached in the absence of such legislation. The court said: "Even without such action by Congress the unbroken-package doctrine, as applied to interstate commerce, has come to be regarded, generally at least, as more artificial than sound. Indeed, in its relation to that commerce, it was definitely rejected in Sonneborn Bros. v. Cureton, 262 U. S. 506, 508, 509, as affording no immunity from state taxation."

2. The diminished importance of the "original package" rule as a test for determining whether a state-imposed regulation obstructs or burdens interstate commerce is indicated by the comments of Mr. Justice Cardozo in the principal case. During its heyday the court often had difficulty in determining what an original package was. In Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. 132 (1900) the court, after a review of the decisions, said: "The whole theory of the exemption of the original package from the operation of state laws is based upon the idea that the property is imported in the ordinary cure in which, from time immemorial, foreign goods have been brought into the country. These have gone at once into the hands of the wholesale dealers, who have been in the habit of breaking the packages and distributing their contents among the several retail dealers throughout the state. It was with reference to this method of doing business that the doctrine of the exemption of the original package grew up. * * * In all the cases which have heretofore arisen in this court the packages were of such size as to exclude the idea that they were to go directly into the hands of the consumer, or be used to evade the police regulations of the state with regard to the particular article." In this case the court said that to come within the protection of the rule the package must be of the type ordinarily used by honest dealers in bona fide transactions and that the doctrine has no application where the manufacturer puts up the package with the express intent of evading the police laws of another state. Thus paste-board boxes containing ten cigarettes each, transported by the express company from the manufacturer's warehouse in North Carolina in an open basket to the defendant's place of business in Tennessee, where the boxes were taken out of the basket and delivered to the defendant, were held not to be original packages but a "discreditable subterfuge" to evade a state law prohibiting the sale of cigarettes. See also, Purity Extract & Tonic Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, 57 L. ed. 184, 33 Sup. Ct. 44 (1912); Hebe Co. v. Shaw, 248 U. S. 297, 63 L. ed. 255, 39 Sup. Ct. 125 (1919); Price v. Illinois, 238 U. S. 446, 59 L. ed. 1400, 35 Sup. Ct. 892 (1915). For further discussion of the doctrine, see Trickett, The Original Package Ineptitude, 6 Col. L. Rev. 161 (1906), 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 1002.

3. A state may not discourage the influx of paupers from other states by making it a criminal offense for persons, firms or corporations within their borders to bring or assist in bringing into the state indigent persons not residents of the state. A majority of the court thought that the statute imposed an unconstitutional burden upon interstate commerce. Justices Black, Douglas, Murphy and Jackson preferred to rest the decision upon the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160, 86 L. ed. 119, 62 Sup. Ct. 164 (1941).

MILK CONTROL BOARD v. EISENBERG FARM PRODUCTS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are called upon to determine whether a local police regulation unconstitutionally regulates or burdens interstate commerce.

Pennsylvania, by an Act of April 30, 1935 has declared the milk industry in that Commonwealth to be a business affected with a public interest. The statute defines a milk dealer as any person "who purchases or handles milk within the Commonwealth for sale, shipment, storage, processing or manufacture within or without the Commonwealth." It creates a Milk Control Board with authority to investigate, supervise, and regulate the industry and imposes penalties for violations of the law or of the Board's orders issued pursuant to the law, and requires a dealer to obtain a license by application to the Board. Licenses may be refused, suspended, or revoked for specified causes. A requisite of obtaining a license is that the dealer shall file with the Board a bond conditioned for the prompt payment of all amounts due to producers for milk purchased by the licensee. The act empowers the Board to require the dealer to keep certain records and directs the Board, with the approval of the Governor, to "fix, by official order, the minimum prices to be paid by milk dealers to producers and others for milk." The Board may vary the price according to the production, use, form, grade or class of milk.

The petitioner, the Milk Control Board, filed its bill in a Common Pleas Court to restrain the appellee from continuing to do business without complying with the statute. The respondent by its answer sought to justify failure to comply on the ground that it was engaged in interstate commerce. After trial the court dismissed the bill. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirmed the decree.

The respondent, a Pennsylvania corporation, leases and operates a milk receiving plant in Elizabethville, Pennsylvania, at which it buys milk from approximately one hundred and seventy-five farmers in the neighborhood, who bring their milk to the plant in their own cans. There the milk is weighed and tested by the respondent and emptied into large receiving tanks in which it is cooled preparatory to shipment. This requires retention of the milk for less than twenty-four hours; it is not processed, and no change occurs in its constituent elements. The milk is then drawn from the cooling tanks into tank trucks operated by a contract carrier and transported into New York City for sale there by the respondent. The journey is continuous from Elizabethtown to New York City. All milk purchased by the respondent at Elizabethtown is shipped to and sold in New York. During the year 1934 approximately 4,500,000,000 pounds of milk were produced in Pennsylvania of which approximately 470,000,000 pounds were shipped out of the state.

The respondent contends that the act, if construed to require it to obtain a license, to file a bond for the protection of producers, and to pay the farmers the prices prescribed by the Board, unconstitutionally regulates and burdens interstate commerce. The State Supreme Court has held that the statute is a valid police regulation. The petitioner concedes that the purchase, shipment into another state, and sale there of the milk in which the respondent deals is interstate commerce. The question for decision is whether, in the absence of federal regulations, the enforcement of the statute is prohibited by Article I, § 8 of the Constitution. We hold that it is not.

When the people declared "The Congress shall have Power * * * To regulate Commerce * * * among the several States, * * *" their purpose was clear. The United States could not exist as a nation if each of them were to have the power to forbid imports from another state, to sanction the rights of citizens to transport their goods interstate, or to discriminate as between neighboring states in admitting articles produced therein. The grant of the power of regulation to the Congress necessarily implies the subordination of the states to that power. This Court has repeatedly declared that the grant established the immunity of interstate commerce from the control of the states respecting all those subjects embraced within the grant which are of such a nature as to demand that, if regulated at all, their regulation must be prescribed by a single authority. But in matters requiring diversity of treatment according to the special requirements of local conditions, the states remain free to act within their respective jurisdictions until Congress sees fit to act in the exercise of its overriding authority. One of the commonest forms of state action is the exercise of the police power directed to the control of local conditions and exerted in the interest of the welfare of the state's citizens. Every state police statute necessarily will affect interstate commerce in some degree, but such a statute does not run counter to the grant of Congressional power merely because it incidentally or indirectly involves or burdens interstate commerce. * * *

The purpose of the statute under review obviously is to reach a domestic situation in the interest of the welfare of the producers and consumers of milk in Pennsylvania. Its provisions with respect to license, bond, and regulation of prices to be paid to producers are appropriate means to the ends in view. The question is whether the prescription of prices to be paid producers in the effort to accomplish these ends constitutes a prohibited burden on interstate commerce, or an incidental burden which is permissible until superseded by Congressional enactment. That question can be answered only by weighing the nature of the respondent's activities, and the propriety of local regulation of them, as disclosed by the record.

The respondent maintains a receiving station in Pennsylvania where it conducts the local business of buying milk. At that station the neighboring farmers deliver their milk. The activity affected by the regulation is essentially local in Pennsylvania. Upon the completion of that transaction the respondent engages in conserving and transporting its own property. The Commonwealth does not essay to regulate or to restrain the shipment of the respondent's milk into New York or to regulate its sale or the price at which respondent may sell it in New York. If dealers conducting receiving stations in various localities in Pennsylvania were free to ignore the requirements of the statute on the ground that all or a part of the milk they purchase is destined to another state the uniform operation of the statute locally would be crippled and might be impracticable. Only a small fraction of the milk produced by farmers in Pennsylvania is shipped out of the Commonwealth. There is, therefore, a comparatively large field remotely affecting and wholly unrelated to interstate commerce within which the statute operates. These considerations we think justify the conclusion that the effect of the law on interstate commerce is incidental and not forbidden by the Constitution, in the absence of regulation by Congress.

None of the decisions on which the court below and the respondent rely rules the instant case. DiSanto v. Pennsylvania, 273 U. S. 34, involved a state law directed solely at foreign commerce; Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co., 258 U. S. 50, condemned a state statute affecting commerce, over ninety per cent. of which was interstate and essaying to regulate the price of commodities sold within the state payable and receivable in the state of destination; Shafer v. Farmers Grain Co., 268 U. S. 189, also dealt with a state law intended to regulate commerce almost wholly interstate in character. In Baldwin v. Seelig, 294 U. S. 511, this Court condemned an enactment aimed solely at interstate commerce attempting to affect and regulate the price to be paid for milk in a sister state, and we indicated that the attempt amounted in effect to a tariff barrier set up against milk imported into the enacting state.

The decree must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS and MR. JUSTICE BUTLER are of opinion that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania properly concluded that under former opinions of this Court the questioned regulations constituted a burden upon interstate commerce prohibited by the Federal Constitution.

NOTES

1. In Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341, 87 L. ed. 315, 63 Sup. Ct. 307 (1943) a California statute setting up a scheme for regulating the marketing of agricultural products by producers with a view to maintaining and stabilizing prices, under which restrictions were imposed upon sales of raisins within the state by producers to those who were processing and packing them, was attacked as violative of the commerce clause because it appeared that approximately 95% of the crop found its way into interstate and foreign commerce after processing and packing. No congressional legislation prohibited or regulated the transactions affected by the state program, and the Secretary of Agriculture had not instituted any program under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937 with respect to raisins. In sustaining the statute, Chief Justice Stone, speaking for a unanimous court, said that "upon a consideration of all the relevant facts and circumstances it appears that the matter is one which may appropriately be regulated in the interest of the safety, health and well-being of local communities, and, which, because of its local character and the practical difficulties involved, may never be adequately dealt with by Congress." The court further pointed out that the federal statute was applicable to raisins only on the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, who, instead of establishing a federal program, cooperated in promoting the state program and aided it by substantial federal loans, pursuant to congressional agricultural policy.

2. In H. P. Hood & Sons, Inc. v. Du Mond, 336 U. S. 525, 93 L. ed. 865, 69 Sup. Ct. 657 (1949) the court divided five-to-four as to whether, in order to avoid depletion of the supply available within the state and to avoid destructive competition in a market already adequately served, New York could refuse to permit a distributor of milk in Massachusetts to open an additional local receiving station from which milk could be taken from New York. The majority treated the case as one in which a state was favoring home consumers and competitors against those in other states, and thus condemned the New York regulation as discriminating against, as well as burdening, interstate commerce. Said Mr. Justice Jackson: "This court has not only recognized this disability of the state to isolate its own economy as a basis for striking down parochial legislative policies designed to do so, but it has recognized the incapacity of the state to protect its own inhabitants from competition as a reason for sustaining particular exercises of the commerce power of Congress to reach matters in which states were so disabled." Distinguishing Parker v. Brown, the opinion stated: "Another element in the Parker case which led the court to sustain the California regulation was that it was one which the policy of Congress was to aid and encourage, and the Secretary of Agriculture had approved the state program by loans." Query: Does this mean that, apart from the factor mentioned, the decision in the Parker case might have gone the other way? The language of Chief Justice Stone's opinion in that case does not so indicate. Four justices (Black, Frankfurter, Murphy and Rutledge) dissented in Hood v. Du Mond. The cases are discussed in Note, 37 Cal. L. Rev. 667 (1949).

DEAN MILK CO. v. MADISON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1951.
340 U. S. 349, 95 L. ed. 329, 71 Sup. Ct. 295.

MR. JUSTICE CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

This appeal challenges the constitutional validity of two sections of an ordinance of the City of Madison, Wisconsin, regulating the sale of milk and milk products within the municipality's jurisdiction. One section in issue makes it unlawful to sell any milk as pasteurized unless it has been processed and bottled at an approved pasteurization plant within a distance of five miles from the central square of Madison. Another section, which prohibits the sale of milk, or the importation, receipt or storage of milk for sale, in Madison unless from a source of supply possessing a permit issued after inspection by Madison officials, is attacked insofar as it expressly relieves municipal authorities from any duty to inspect farms located beyond twenty-five miles from the center of the city.

Appellant is an Illinois corporation engaged in distributing milk and milk products in Illinois and Wisconsin. It contended below as it does here that both the five-mile limit on pasteurization plants and the twenty-five-mile limit on sources of milk violate the Commerce Clause and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin upheld the five-mile limit on pasteurization. As to the twenty-five-mile limitation the court ordered the complaint dismissed for want of a justiciable controversy. 257 Wis. 308, 43 N. W. (2d) 480. This appeal, contesting both rulings, invokes the jurisdiction of this Court under 28 U. S. C. § 1257 (2); [F. C. A. 28 § 1257(2)].

The City of Madison is the county seat of Dane County. Within the county are some 5,600 dairy farms with total raw milk production in excess of 600,000,000 pounds annually and more than ten times the requirements of Madison. Aside from the milk supplied to Madison, fluid milk produced in the county moves in large quantities to Chicago and more distant consuming areas, and the remainder is used in making cheese, butter and other products. At the time of trial the Madison milkshed was not of "Grade A" standing by the standards recommended by the United States Public Health Service, and no milk labeled "Grade A" was distributed in Madison.

The area defined by the ordinance with respect to milk sources encompasses practically all of Dane County and includes some 500 farms which supply milk for Madison. Within the five-mile area for pasteurization are plants of five processors, only three of which are engaged in the general wholesale and retail trade in Madison. Inspection of these farms and plants is scheduled once every thirty days and is performed by two municipal inspectors, one of whom is full-time. The courts below found that the ordinance in question promotes convenient, economical and efficient plant inspection.

Appellant purchases and gathers milk from approximately 950 farms in northern Illinois and southern Wisconsin, none being within twenty-five miles of Madison. Its pasteurization plants are located at Chemung and Huntley, Illinois, about 65 and 85 miles respectively from Madison. Appellant was denied a license to sell its products within Madison solely because its pasteurization plants were more than five miles away.

It is conceded that the milk which appellant seeks to sell in Madison is supplied from farms and processed in plants licensed and inspected by public health authorities of Chicago, and is labeled "Grade A" under the Chicago ordinance which adopts the rating standards recommended by the United States Public Health Service. Both the Chicago and Madison ordinances, though not the sections of the latter here in issue, are largely patterned after the Model Milk Ordinance of the Public Health Service. However, Madison contends and we assume that in some particulars its ordinance is more rigorous than that of Chicago.

Upon these facts we find it necessary to determine only the issue raised under the Commerce Clause, for we agree with appellant that the ordinance imposes an undue burden on interstate commerce.

This is not an instance in which an enactment falls because of federal legislation which, as a proper exercise of paramount national power over commerce, excludes measures which might otherwise be within the police power of the states. See Curran v. Wallace, 306 U. S. 1, 12-13. There is no pertinent national regulation by the Congress, and statutes enacted for the District of Columbia indicate that Congress has recognized the appropriateness of local regulation of the sale of fluid milk. D. C. Code, 1940, §§ 33-301 et seq. It is not contended, however, that Congress has authorized the regulation before us.

Nor can there be objection to the avowed purpose of this enactment. We assume that difficulties in sanitary regulation of milk and milk products originating in remote areas may present a situation in which "upon a consideration of all the relevant facts and circumstances it appears that the matter is one which may appropriately be regulated in the interest of the safety, health and well-being of local communities * * *." Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341, 362-363; see H. P. Hood & Sons v. Du Mond, 336 U. S. 525, 531-532. We also assume that since Congress has not spoken to the contrary, the subject matter of the ordinance lies within the sphere of state regulation even though interstate commerce may be affected. Milk Control Board v. Eisenberg Farm Products, 306 U. S. 346; see Baldwin v. G. A. F. Seelig, Inc., 294 U. S. 511, 524.

But this regulation, like the provision invalidated in Baldwin v. G. A. F. Seelig, supra, in practical effect excludes from distribution in Madison wholesome milk produced and pasteurized in Illinois. "The importer * * * may keep his milk or drink it, but sell it he may not." Id., 294 U. S. at page 521. In thus erecting an economic barrier protecting a major local industry against competition from without the State, Madison plainly discriminates against interstate commerce. This it cannot do, even in the exercise of its unquestioned power to protect the health and safety of its people, if reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives, adequate to conserve legitimate local interests, are available. Cf. Baldwin v. G. A. F. Seelig, Inc. supra; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 328. A different view, that the ordinance is valid simply because it professes to be a health measure, would mean that the Commerce Clause of itself imposes no limitations on state action other than those laid down by the Due Process Clause, save for the rare instance where a state artlessly discloses an avowed purpose to discriminate against interstate goods. Cf. H. P. Hood & Sons, Inc. v. Du Mond, supra. Our issue then is whether the discrimination inherent in the Madison ordinance can be justified in view of the character of the local interests and the available methods of protecting them. Cf. Union Brokerage Co. v. Jensen, 322 U. S. 202, 211.

It appears that reasonable and adequate alternatives are available. If the City of Madison prefers to rely upon its own officials for inspection of distant milk sources, such inspection is readily open to it without hardship for it could charge the actual and reasonable cost of such inspection to the importing producers and processors. Cf. Sprout v. City of South Bend, 277 U. S. 163, 169; see Miller v. Williams, 12 F. Supp. 236, 242, 244. Moreover, appellee health commissioner of Madison testified that as proponent of the local milk ordinance he had submitted the provisions here in controversy and an alternative proposal based on § 11 of the Model Milk Ordinance recommended by the United States Public Health Service. The model provision imposes no geographical limitation on location of milk sources and processing plants but excludes from the municipality milk not produced and pasteurized conformably to standards as high as those enforced by the receiving city. In implementing such an ordinance, the importing city obtains milk ratings based on uniform standards and established by health authorities in the jurisdiction where production and processing occur. The receiving city may determine the extent of enforcement of sanitary standards in the exporting area by verifying the accuracy of safety ratings of specific plants or of the milkshed in the distant jurisdiction through the United States Public Health Service, which routinely and on request spot checks the local ratings. The Commissioner testified that Madison consumers "would be adequately safeguarded" under either proposal and that he had expressed no preference. The milk sanitarian of the Wisconsin State Board of Health testified that the State Health Department recommends the adoption of a provision based on the Model Ordinance. Both officials agreed that a local health officer would be justified in relying upon the evaluation by the Public Health Service of enforcement conditions in remote producing areas.

To permit Madison to adopt a regulation not essential for the protection of local health interests and placing a discriminatory burden on interstate commerce would invite a multiplication of preferential trade areas destructive of the very purpose of the Commerce Clause. Under the circumstances here presented, the regulation must yield to the principle that "one state in its dealings with another may not place itself in a position of economic isolation." Baldwin v. G. A. F. Seelig, Inc., supra, 294 U. S. at page 527.

For these reasons we conclude that the judgment below sustaining the five-mile provision as to pasteurization must be reversed.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin thought it unnecessary to pass upon the validity of the twenty-five-mile limitation, apparently in part for the reason that this issue was made academic by its decision upholding the five-mile section. In view of our conclusion as to the latter provision, a determination of appellant's contention as to the other section is now necessary. As to this issue, therefore, we vacate the judgment below and remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with the principles announced in this opinion. It is so ordered.

Judgment vacated and cause remanded.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and MR. JUSTICE MINTON concur, dissenting. * * *

(1) This ordinance does not exclude wholesome milk coming from Illinois or anywhere else. It does require that all milk sold in Madison must be pasteurized within five miles of the center of the city. But there was no finding in the state courts, nor evidence to justify a finding there or here, that appellant, Dean Milk Company, is unable to have its milk pasteurized within the defined geographical area. As a practical matter, so far as the record shows, Dean can easily comply with the ordinance whenever it wants to. Therefore, Dean's personal preference to pasteurize in Illinois, not the ordinance, keeps Dean's milk out of Madison.

(2) Characterization of § 7.21 as a "discriminatory burden" on interstate commerce is merely a statement of the Court's result, which I think incorrect. The section does prohibit the sale of milk in Madison by interstate and intrastate producers who prefer to pasteurize over five miles distant from the city. But both state courts below found that § 7.21 represents a good-faith attempt to safeguard public health by making adequate sanitation inspection possible. While we are not bound by these findings, I do not understand the Court to overturn them. Therefore, the fact that § 7.21, like all health regulations, imposes some burden on trade, does not mean that it "discriminates" against interstate commerce.

(3) This health regulation should not be invalidated merely because the Court believes that alternative milk-inspection methods might insure the cleanliness and healthfulness of Dean's Illinois milk. * * *

From what this record shows, and from what it fails to show, I do not think that either of the alternatives suggested by the Court would assure the people of Madison as pure a supply of milk as they receive under their own ordinance. On this record I would uphold the Madison law. At the very least, however, I would not invalidate it without giving the parties a chance to present evidence and get findings on the ultimate issues the Court thinks crucial—namely, the relative merits of the Madison ordinance and the alternatives suggested by the Court today.

NOTE

1. How far may a state go in restricting the export of its natural resources? Is there any test which can be applied in determining the validity of such restrictions? Oil and gas are important and useful articles of commerce and the Supreme Court has taken the view that the states may not prohibit their exportation. See Pennsylvania v. West Virginia, 262 U. S. 553, 67 L. ed. 1117, 43 Sup. Ct. 658, 32 A. L. R. 300 (1923), invalidating a state statute which required natural gas producers to give a priority to consumers within the state in the event the domestic supply of gas was insufficient to meet all demands. But the court has reached a different conclusion in a group of cases which uphold the states' attempt to conserve certain other natural resources—not privately owned—for local use. Here the resources are said to be owned by the states in trust for the benefit of their own people. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 40 L. ed. 793, 16 Sup. Ct. 600 (1896) held that a state may prohibit the killing of wild game for shipment out of the state and may prohibit such shipment, although permitting killing for other purposes. Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 349, 52 L. ed. 828, 28 Sup. Ct. 529, 14 Ann. Cas. 560 (1908) sustained a state statute forbidding the diversion of the waters of its lakes or streams for use by cities in another state. Cf. Foster-Fountain Packing Co. v. Haydel, 278 U. S. 1, 73 L. ed. 147, 49 Sup. Ct. 1 (1928), conceding that a state may unconditionally forbid shipment out of the state of shrimp taken from its waters, but holding invalid as a violation of the commerce clause a statute that permitted such shipment only if the heads and hulls had previously been separated from the shell. In Johnson v. Haydel, 278 U. S. 16, 73 L. ed. 155, 49 Sup. Ct. 6 (1928), the same conclusion was reached as to a similar statute relating to oysters. And in Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U. S. 385, 92 L. ed. 1460, 68 Sup. Ct. 1156 (1948), provisions of a South Carolina statute which required that owners of shrimp boats fishing off the coast dock at a state port and unload, pack and stamp their catch before shipping or transporting it to another state were held invalid as a burden upon interstate commerce. Here again the court pointed out that the state had not attempted to retain for the use of its own people the shrimp caught in the marginal sea. See Hardman, The Right of a State to Restrain the Exportation of Its Natural Resources, 26 W. Va. L. Q. 1, 224 (1919-1920), 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 1023; Howard, Gas and Electricity in Interstate Commerce, 18 Minn. L. Rev. 611 (1934).

HALL v. DE CUIR.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1877.

95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547.

Error to the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

Benson, the defendant below, was the master and owner of the "Governor Allen," a steamboat enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States for the coasting trade, and plying as a regular packet for the transportation of freight and passengers between New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, touching at the intermediate landings both within and without Louisiana, as occasion required. The defendant in error, plaintiff below, a person of color, took passage upon the boat, on her trip up the river from New Orleans, for Hermitage, a landing place within Louisiana, and being refused accommodations, on account of her color, in the cabin specially set apart for white persons, brought this action in the eighth district court for the Parish of New Orleans, under [the state statute stated in the opinion] to recover damages for her mental and physical suffering on that account. Benson, by way of defense, insisted, among other things, that the statute was inoperative and void as to him, in respect to the matter complained of, because, as to his business, it was an attempt to "regulate commerce among the states," and, therefore, in conflict with Art. 1, Sec. 8, Par. 3, of the Constitution of the United States. The district court of the parish held that the statute made it imperative upon Benson to admit Mrs. De Cuir to the privileges of the cabin for white persons, and that it was not a regulation of commerce among the states, and, therefore, not void. After trial, judgment was given against Benson for $1,000; from which he appealed to the supreme court of the state, where the rulings of the district court were sustained. * * * Benson having died, Hall, his administratrix, was substituted in this Court.

For the purposes of this case, we must treat the Act of Louisiana of February 23, 1869, as requiring those engaged in interstate commerce to give all persons traveling in that state, upon the public conveyances employed in such business, equal rights and privileges in all parts of the conveyance, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color. Such was the construction given to that act in the courts below, and it is conclusive upon us as the construction of a state law by the state courts. It is with this provision of the statute alone that we have to deal. We have nothing whatever to do with it as a regulation of internal commerce, or as affecting anything else than commerce among the states. * * *

But we think it may safely be said that state legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position. It does not act upon the business through the local instruments to be employed after coming within the state, but directly upon the business as it comes into the state from without or goes out from within. While it purports only to control the carrier when engaged within the state, it must necessarily influence his conduct to some extent in the management of his business throughout his entire voyage. His disposition of passengers taken up and put down within the state, or taken up within to be carried without, cannot but affect in a greater or less degree those taken up without and brought within, and sometimes those taken up and put down without. A passenger in the cabin set apart for the use of whites without the state must, when the boat comes within, share the accommodations of that cabin with such colored persons as may come on board afterwards, if the law is enforced.

It was to meet just such a case that the commercial clause in the Constitution was adopted. The river Mississippi passes through or along the borders of ten different states, and its tributaries reach many more. The commerce upon these waters is immense, and its regulation clearly a matter of national concern. If each state was at liberty to regulate the conduct of carriers while within its jurisdiction, the confusion likely to follow could not but be productive of great inconvenience and unnecessary hardship. Each state could provide for its own passengers and regulate the transportation of its own freight, regardless of the interests of others. Nay, more, it could prescribe rules by which the carrier must be governed within the state in respect to passengers and property brought from without. On one side of the river or its tributaries he might be required to observe one set of rules, and on the other another. Commerce cannot flourish in the midst of such embarrassments. No carrier of passengers can conduct his business with satisfaction to himself, or comfort to those employing him, if on one side of a state line his passengers, both white and colored, must be permitted to occupy the same cabin, and on the other be kept separate. Uniformity in the regulations by which he is to be governed from one end to the other of his route is a necessity in his business, and to secure it Congress, which is untrammelled by state lines, has been invested with the exclusive legislative power of determining what such regulations shall be. If this statute can be enforced against those engaged in interstate commerce, it may be as well against those engaged in foreign; and the master of a ship clearing from New Orleans for Liverpool, having passengers on board, would be compelled to carry all, white and colored, in the same cabin, during his passage down the river, or be subject to an action for damages, "exemplary as well as actual," by any one who felt himself aggrieved because he had been excluded on account of his color.

This power of regulation may be exercised without legislation as well as with it. By refraining from action, Congress, in effect, adopts as its own regulations those which the common law or the civil law, where that prevails, has provided for the government of such business, and those which the states, in the regulation of their domestic concerns, have established affecting commerce, but not regulating it within the meaning of the Constitution. In fact, congressional legislation is only necessary to cure defects in existing laws, as they are discovered, and to adapt such laws to new developments of trade. As was said by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court in Welton v. State of Missouri, 91 U. S. 282: "Inaction [by Congress] * * * is equivalent to a declaration that interstate commerce shall remain free and untrammelled." Applying that principle to the circumstances of this case, congressional inaction left Benson at liberty to adopt such reasonable rules and regulations for the disposition of passengers upon his boat, while pursuing her voyage within Louisiana or without, as seemed to him most for the interest of all concerned. The statute under which this suit is brought, as construed by the state court, seeks to take away from him that power so long as he is within Louisiana; and while recognizing to the fullest extent the principle which sustains a statute, unless its unconstitutionality is clearly established, we think this statute, to the extent that it requires those engaged in the transportation of passengers among the states to carry colored passengers in Louisiana in the same cabin with whites, is unconstitutional and void. * * *

Reversed.

[Mr. JUSTICE CLIFFORD concurred with a separate opinion.]

1. In Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373, 90 L. ed. 1317, 66 Sup. Ct. 1050, 165 A. L. R. 574 (1946) a Virginia statute requiring segregation on interstate motor busses was held invalid on the ground that seating arrangements for the different races in interstate motor travel "require a single, uniform rule to promote and protect national travel." Cf. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Kentucky, 252 U. S. 399, 64 L. ed. 631, 40 Sup. Ct. 378 (1920). The provision of the Interstate Commerce Act making it unlawful for a railroad in interstate commerce to subject any person to "any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever" has been construed to forbid a railroad to deny facilities to a Negro passenger because those available have been set aside for white passengers. Mitchell v. United States, 313 U. S. 80, 85 L. ed. 1201, 61 Sup. Ct. 873 (1941); Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 94 L. ed. 1302, 70 Sup. Ct. 843 (1950).

2. In Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan, 333 U. S. 28, 92 L. ed. 455, 68 Sup. Ct. 358 (1948) the court held that a Michigan Civil Rights statute forbidding a carrier to discriminate in its service to persons of different races could validly be applied to a corporation engaged in operating an amusement park on Bois Blanc Island, which lies just above the mouth of the Detroit River in Ontario. Appellants had been convicted for refusing passage to a Negro on one of their steamers used solely for the purpose of transporting passengers between Detroit and the island. In affirming the conviction, the court conceded that the company's operations were in foreign commerce but pointed out that the power of Congress under the commerce clause does not exclude all regulations by the states. It concluded that the transportation of appellant's patrons was a segment of foreign commerce having a special local interest in Michigan; both the island and the defendant's business were insulated in a commercial and social sense from the stream of foreign commerce. Mr. Justice Jackson, joined by Chief Justice Vinson, dissented on the ground that the matter was properly one for federal regulation and so was outside the sphere of state action.

WABASH, ST. LOUIS & PACIFIC R. CO. v. ILLINOIS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1886.
118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244, 7 Sup. Ct. 4.

[Error to the Supreme Court of Illinois which had affirmed a judgment of the trial court that the state recover a penalty from the railroad company for violation of a state statute which forbade any railroad to charge the same or more for the transportation of any passenger or freight for any distance within the state than it charged for carrying a passenger or freight of like class and quantity for a greater distance over the same line in the same direction. The specific offense alleged was that the company charged one shipper 25 cents a hundred for a car-load of goods from Gilman, Illinois, to New York City while charging another shipper 15 cents a hundred for a car-load of like goods from Peoria, Illinois, to New York, the latter distance being 86 miles longer.]

MR. JUSTICE MILLER delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The Supreme Court of Illinois in the case now before us, conceding that each of these contracts was in itself a unit, and that the pay received by the Illinois railroad company was the compensation for the entire transportation from the point of departure in the state of Illinois to the city of New York, holds that, while the statute of Illinois is inoperative upon that part of the contract which has reference to the transportation outside of the state, it is binding and effectual as to so much of the transportation as was within the limits of the state of Illinois (People v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co., 104 Ill. 476); and, undertaking for itself to apportion the rates charged over the whole route, decides that the contract and the receipt of the money for so much of it as was performed within the state of Illinois violate the statute of the state on that subject.

If the Illinois statute could be construed to apply exclusively to contracts for a carriage which begins and ends within the state, disconnected from a continuous transportation through or into other states, there does not seem to be any difficulty in holding it to be valid. For instance, a contract might be made to carry goods for a certain price from Cairo to Chicago, or from Chicago to Alton. The charges for these might be within the competency of the Illinois Legislature to regulate. The reason for this is that both the charge and the actual transportation in such cases are exclusively confined to the limits of the territory of the state, and is not commerce among the states, or interstate commerce, but is exclusively commerce within the state. * * * [The Court here considered several previous decisions.]

These extracts show that the question of the right of the state to regulate the rates of fares and tolls on railroads, and how far that right was affected by the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, was presented to the Court in those cases. And it must be admitted that, in a general way, the Court treated the cases then before it as belonging to that class of regulations of commerce which, like pilotage, bridging navigable rivers, and many others, could be acted upon by the states, in the absence of any legislation by Congress on the same subject.

By the slightest attention to the matter, it will be readily seen that the circumstances under which a bridge may be authorized across a navigable stream within the limits of a state for the use of a public highway, and the local rules which shall govern the conduct of the pilots of each of the varying harbors of the coasts of the United States, depends upon principles far more limited in their application and importance than those which should regulate the transportation of persons and property across the half or the whole of the continent, over the territories of half a dozen states, through which they are carried without change of car or breaking bulk. * * *

It will be seen from the opinions themselves, and from the arguments of counsel presented in the reports, that the question did not receive any very elaborate consideration, either in the opinions of the Court or in the arguments of counsel. * * * It was strenuously denied, and very confidently, by all the railroad companies, that any legislative body whatever had a right to limit the tolls and charges to be made by the carrying companies for transportation. And the great question to be decided, and which was decided, and which was argued in all those cases, was the right of the state within which a railroad company did business to regulate or limit the amount of any of these traffic charges. * * *

We must therefore hold that it is not, and never has been, the deliberate opinion of a majority of this Court that a statute of a state which attempts to regulate the fares and charges by railroad companies within its limits, for a transportation which constitutes a part of commerce among the states, is a valid law.

Let us see precisely what is the degree of interference with transportation of property or persons from one state to another which this statute proposes. A citizen of New York has goods which he desires to have transported by the railroad companies from that city to the interior of the state of Illinois. A continuous line of rail over which a car loaded with these goods can be carried, and is carried habitually, connects the place of shipment with the place of delivery. He undertakes to make a contract with a person engaged in the carrying business at the end of this route from whence the goods are to start, and he is told by the carrier: "I am free to make a fair and reasonable contract for this carriage to the line of the state of Illinois, but when the car which carries these goods is to cross the line of that state, pursuing at the same time this continuous track, I am met by a law of Illinois which forbids me to make a free contract concerning this transportation within that state, and subjects me to certain rules by which I am to be governed as to the charges which the same railroad company in Illinois may make, or has made, with reference to other persons and other places of delivery." So that while that carrier might be willing to carry these goods from the city of New York to the city of Peoria at the rate of 15 cents per hundred pounds, he is not permitted to do so, because the Illinois railroad company has already charged at the rate of 25 cents per hundred pounds for carriage to Gilman, in Illinois, which is 86 miles shorter than the distance to Peoria. So, also, in the present case, the owner of corn, the principal product of the country, desiring to transport it from Peoria, in Illinois, to New York, finds a railroad company willing to do this at the rate of 15 cents per hundred pounds for a car-load, but is compelled to pay at the rate of 25 cents per hundred pounds, because the railroad company has received from a person residing at Gilman 25 cents per hundred pounds for the transportation of a car-load of the same class of freight over the same line of road from Gilman to New York. This is the result of the statute of Illinois, in its endeavor to prevent unjust discrimination, as construed by the Supreme Court of that state. The effect of it is that whatever may be the rate of transportation per mile charged by the railroad company from Gilman to Sheldon, a distance of 23 miles, in which the loading and the unloading of the freight is the largest expense incurred by the railroad company, the same rate per mile must be charged from Peoria to the city of New York. The obvious injustice of such a rule as this, which railroad companies are by heavy penalties compelled to conform to, in regard to commerce among the states, when applied to transportation which includes Illinois in a long line of carriage through several states, shows the value of the constitutional provision which confides the power of regulating interstate commerce to the Congress of the United States, whose enlarged view of the interests of all the states, and of the railroads concerned, better fits it to establish just and equitable rules. * * *

That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and cannot be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think is clear from what has already been said. And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois court concedes it to be, it must be of that national character; and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Judgment reversed.

[MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY gave a dissenting opinion, in which concurred CHIEF JUSTICE WAITE, and MR. JUSTICE GRAY.]

NOTES

1. The year following the decision in the principal case Congress enacted the Interstate Commerce Act, regulating the interstate transportation of persons and property by rail and creating the Interstate Commerce Commission to administer its provisions. Railroads were required to publish schedules of rates, and were forbidden to charge unjust or unreasonable rates, or to charge more for a short distance than for a long distance on the same line, without the consent of the Commission. The Commission was authorized to investigate alleged violations of the act and issue cease-and-desist orders against such violations. The story of the circumstances leading to the enactment of this law and the difficulties encountered by the Commission during the early period of its administration is told in Swisher, American Constitutional Development (1943), 406 et seq.

2. Since interstate ferriage is deemed a local matter not requiring national uniformity of rate regulation, the Supreme Court has construed the commerce clause as permitting each of the states between which a ferry operates to fix the rates for trips commencing from its side of the river. Port Richmond & Bergen Point Ferry Co. v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of Hudson County, 234 U. S. 317, 58 L. ed. 1330, 34 Sup. Ct. 821 (1914). In this case the court said: "The practical advantages of having the matter dealt with by the states are obvious, and are illustrated by the practice of one hundred and twenty-five years. And in view of the character of the subject, we find no sound objection to its continuance. If Congress at any time undertakes to regulate such rates, its action will, of course, control." A city may not, however, condition the operation of a ferry from that city to the opposite shore of the river in Canada upon the securing of a license from the city and payment of a license fee, since one cannot be compelled to take out a local license for the privilege of carrying on interstate or foreign commerce. Sault Ste. Marie v. International Transit Co., 234 U. S. 333, 58 L. ed. 1337, 34 Sup. Ct. 826, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 574 (1914). The same principle was applied to prevent Vidalia, Louisiana, from making its consent and license a condition precedent to the operation of a ferry across the Mississippi River to Natchez, Mississippi, on the other shore. Vidalia v. McNeely, 274 U. S. 676, 71 L. ed. 1292, 47 Sup. Ct. 758 (1927). See, on this subject, Knicier, Interstate Ferries and the Commerce Clause, 26 Mich. L. Rev. 631 (1928).

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF RHODE ISLAND v.
ATTLEBORO STEAM & ELECTRIC CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1927.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Rhode Island.

MR. JUSTICE SANFORD delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The Narragansett Electric Lighting Company is a Rhode Island corporation engaged in manufacturing electric current at its generating plant in the city of Providence and selling such current generally for light, heat and power. The Attleboro Steam & Electric Company is a Massachusetts corporation engaged in supplying electric current for public and private use in the city of Attleboro and its vicinity in that state.

In 1917, these companies entered into a contract by which the Narragansett Company agreed to sell, and the Attleboro Company to buy, for a period of twenty years, all the electricity required by the Attleboro Company for its own use and for sale in the city of Attleboro and the adjacent territory, at a specified basic rate; the current to be delivered by the Narragansett Company at the state line between Rhode Island and Massachusetts and carried over connecting transmission lines to the station of the Attleboro Company in Massachusetts, where it was to be metered. The Narragansett Company filed with the Public Utilities Commission of Rhode Island a schedule setting out the rate and general terms of the contract and was authorized by the Commission to grant the Attleboro Company the special rate therein shown; and the two companies then entered upon the performance of the contract. Current was thereafter supplied in accordance with its terms; and the generating plant of the Attleboro Company was dismantled.

In 1924 the Narragansett Company—having previously made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain an increase of the special rate to the Attleboro Company—filed with the Rhode Island Commission a new schedule, purporting to cancel the original schedule and establish an increased rate for electric current supplied, in specified minimum quantities, to electric lighting companies for their own use or sale to their customers and delivered either in Rhode Island or at the state line. The Attleboro Company was in fact the only customer of the Narragansett Company to which this new schedule would apply.

The commission thereupon instituted an investigation as to the contract rate and the proposed rate. After a hearing at which both companies were represented, the Commission found that, owing principally to the increased cost of generating electricity, the Narragansett Company in rendering service to the Attleboro Company was suffering an operating loss, without any return on the investment devoted to such service, while the rates to its other customers yielded a fair return; that the contract rate was unreasonable and a continuance of service to the Attleboro Company under it would be detrimental to the general public welfare and prevent the Narragansett Company from performing its full duty to its other customers; and that the proposed rate was reasonable and would yield a fair return, and no more, for the service to the Attleboro Company. And the Commission thereupon made an order putting into effect the rate contained in the new schedule.

From this order the Attleboro Company prosecuted an appeal to the Supreme Court of Rhode Island which—considering only one of the various objections urged—held, on the authority of Missouri v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., 265 U. S. 298, that the order of the Commission imposed a direct burden on interstate commerce and was invalid because of conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution; and entered a decree reversing the order and directing that the rate investigation be dismissed, 46 R. I. 496.

It is conceded, rightly, that the sale of electric current by the Narragansett Company to the Attleboro Company is a transaction in interstate commerce, notwithstanding the fact that the current is delivered at the state line. The transmission of electric current from one state to another, like that of gas, is interstate commerce, Coal & Coke Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm., 84 W. Va. 662, 669, and its essential character is not affected by a passing of custody and title at the state boundary, not arresting the continuous transmission to the intended destination. Peoples' Gas Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 270 U. S. 550, 554.

The petitioners contend, however, that the Rhode Island Commission cannot effectively exercise its power to regulate the rates for electricity furnished by the Narragansett Company to local consumers, without also regulating the rates for the other service which it furnishes; that if the Narragansett Company continues to furnish electricity to Attleboro Company at a loss this will tend to increase the burden on the local consumers and impair the ability of the Narragansett Company to give them good service at reasonable prices; and that, therefore, the order of the Commission prescribing a reasonable rate for the interstate service to the Attleboro Company should be sustained as being essentially a local regulation, necessary to the protection of matters of local interest, and affecting interstate commerce only indirectly and incidentally. In support of this contention, they rely chiefly upon Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm., 252 U. S. 23; and the controlling question presented is whether the present case comes within the rule of the Pennsylvania Gas Co. case or that of the Kansas Gas Co. case upon which the Attleboro Company relies.

In the Pennsylvania Gas Co. case, the Company transmitted natural gas by a main pipe line from the source of supply in Pennsylvania to a point of distribution in a city of New York, which it there subdivided and sold at retail to local consumers supplied from the main by pipes laid through the streets of the city. In holding that the New York Public Service Commission might regulate the rate charged to these consumers, the court said that while a state may not "directly" regulate or burden interstate commerce, it may in some instances, until the subject matter is regulated by Congress, pass laws "indirectly" affecting such commerce, when needed to protect or regulate matters of local interest; that the thing which the New York Commission had undertaken to regulate, while part of an interstate transmission, was "local in its nature," pertaining to the furnishing of gas to local consumers, and the service rendered to them was "essentially local," being similar to that of a local plant furnishing gas to consumers in a city; and that such "local service" was not of the character which required general and uniform regulation of rates by congressional action, even if the local rates might "affect" the interstate business of the company.

In the Kansas Gas Co. case, the company, whose business was principally interstate, transported natural gas by continuous pipe lines from wells in Oklahoma and Kansas into Missouri, and there sold and delivered it to distributing companies, which then sold and delivered it to local consumers. In holding that the rate which the company charged for the gas sold to the distributing companies—those at which these companies sold to the local consumers not being involved—was not subject to regulation by the Public Utilities Commission of Missouri, the court said that, while in the absence of congressional action a state may generally enact laws of internal police, although they have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, "the commerce clause of the Constitution, of its own force, restrains the states from imposing direct burdens upon interstate commerce," and a state enactment imposing such a "direct burden" must fall, being a direct restraint of that which in the absence of federal regulation should be free, Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, 396; that the sale and delivery to the distributing companies was "an inseparable part of a transaction in interstate commerce—not local but essentially national in character—and enforcement of a selling price in such a transaction places a direct burden upon such commerce inconsistent with that freedom of interstate trade which it was the purpose of the commerce clause to secure and preserve;" that in the Pennsylvania Gas Co. case, the decision rested on the ground that the service to the consumers for which the regulated charge was made, was "essentially local," and the things done were after the business in its essentially national aspect had come to an end—the supplying of local consumers being "a local business," even though the gas be brought from another state, in which the local interest is paramount and the interference with interstate commerce, if any, indirect and of minor importance; but that in the sale of gas in wholesale quantities, not to consumers, but to distributing companies for resale to consumers, where the transportation, sale and delivery constitutes an unbroken chain, fundamentally interstate from beginning to end, "the paramount interest is not local but national, admitting of and requiring uniformity of regulation," which, "even though it be the uniformity of governmental non-action, may be highly necessary to preserve equality of opportunity and treatment among the various communities and states concerned."

It is clear that the present case is controlled by the Kansas Gas Co. case. The order of the Rhode Island Commission is not, as in the Pennsylvania Gas Co. case, a regulation of the rates charged to local consumers, having merely an incidental effect upon interstate commerce, but is a regulation of the rates charged by the Narragansett Company for the interstate service to the Attleboro Company, which places a direct burden upon interstate commerce. Being the imposition of a direct burden upon interstate commerce, from which the state is restrained by the force of the Commerce Clause, it must necessarily fall, regardless of its purpose. Shafer v. Farmers Grain Co., 268 U. S. 189, 199; Real Silk Mills v. Portland, 268 U. S. 325, 336; Di Santo v. Pennsylvania, 273 U. S. 34. It is immaterial that the Narragansett Company is a Rhode Island corporation subject to regulation by the Commission in its local business, or that Rhode Island is the state from which the electric current is transmitted in interstate commerce, and not that in which it is received, as in the Kansas Gas Co. case. The forwarding state obviously has no more authority than the receiving state to place a direct burden upon interstate commerce. Pennsylvania v. West Virginia, 262 U. S. 553, 596. Nor is it material that the general business of the Narragansett Company appears to be chiefly local, while in the Kansas Gas Co. case the company was principally engaged in interstate business. The test of the validity of a state regulation is not the character of the general business of the company, but whether the particular business which is regulated is essentially local or national in character; and if the regulation places a direct burden upon its interstate business it is none the less beyond the power of the state because this may be the smaller part of its general business. Furthermore, if Rhode Island could place a direct burden upon the interstate business of the Narragansett Company because this would result in individual benefit to the customers of the Narragansett Company in Rhode Island, Massachusetts could, by parity of reasoning, reduce the rates on such interstate business in order to benefit the customers of the Attleboro Company in that state, who would have, in the aggregate, an interest in the interstate rate correlative to that of the customers of the Narragansett Company in Rhode Island. Plainly, however, the paramount interest in the interstate business carried on between the two companies is not local to either state, but is essentially national in character. The rate is therefore not subject to regulation by either of the two states in the guise of protection to their respective local interests; but, if such regulation is required it can only be attained by the exercise of the power vested in Congress. See Covington Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 220; Hanley v. Kansas City S. Ry. Co., 187 U. S. 617, 620.

SOUTH COVINGTON & CINCINNATI STREET R. CO. v.
COVINGTON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1915.

[The street railway company sued to enjoin enforcement by the City of Covington of the ordinance which is stated in the opinion. The state supreme court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the petition, over the contention that the ordinance violated the commerce clause and the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and this writ of error was taken.]

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The testimony shows that the plaintiff is a Kentucky corporation, and its principal occupation is the carrying of passengers in connection with an Ohio corporation which operates on the other side of the Ohio River, upon continuous and connecting tracks, and across a bridge from Covington to Cincinnati, which this court has held to be an instrument of interstate commerce. Covington &c. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204. This traffic is conducted by means of continuous trips and for a single fare, between points on the lines of the railway in Covington and Fourth Street or Fountain Square in the City of Cincinnati, or from any point between Fourth Street or Fountain Square in the City of Cincinnati to points in the City of Covington. Practically every car is thus engaged in going to or coming from Cincinnati, and from seventy-five to eighty per cent. of the passengers carried in the City of Covington are being transported from Covington to Cincinnati, or from Cincinnati to Covington or farther in Kentucky. The cars operate without change of motormen or conductors, and under the direction of the same officers. * * *

Reaching the conclusion that the traffic here regulated is of an interstate character, and therefore within the control of the federal Congress, the further question is presented: Does the case come within that class wherein the state may regulate the matter legislated upon until Congress has acted by virtue of the supreme authority given it by virtue of the commerce clause of the Constitution? * * *

In the light of the principles settled and declared, the various provisions of this ordinance must be examined. That embodied in §§ 1 and 6 makes it unlawful for the company to permit more than one-third greater in number of the passengers to ride or be transported within its cars over and above a number for which seats are provided therein, except this provision shall not apply or be enforced on the Fourth of July, Decoration Day, or Labor Day, and by § 6 it is made the duty of the company operating the cars within the city of Covington to run and operate the same in sufficient numbers at all times to reasonably accommodate the public, within the limits of the ordinance as to the number of passengers permitted to be carried, and the council is authorized to direct the number of cars to be increased sufficiently to accommodate the public if there is a failure in this respect. To comply with these regulations, the testimony shows, would require about one-half more than the present number of cars operated by the company, and more cars than can be operated in Cincinnati within the present franchise rights and privileges held by the company, or controlled by it, in that city. Whether, in view of this situation, this regulation would be so unreasonable as to be void, we need not now inquire. These facts, together with the other details of operation of the cars of this company, are to be taken into view in determining the nature of the regulation here attempted, and whether it so directly burdens interstate commerce as to be beyond the power of the state. We think the necessary effect of these regulations is not only to determine the manner of carrying passengers in Covington and the number of cars that are to be run in connection with the business there, but necessarily directs the number of cars to be run in Cincinnati, and the manner of loading them when there, where the traffic is much impeded and other lines of street railway and many hindrances have to be taken into consideration in regulating the traffic. If Covington can regulate these matters, certainly Cincinnati can, and interstate business might be impeded by conflicting and varying regulations in this respect, with which it might be impossible to comply. On one side of the river one set of regulations might be enforced, and on the other side quite a different set, and both seeking to control a practically continuous movement of cars. As was said in Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 489, "commerce cannot flourish in the midst of such embarrassments." * * *

There are other parts of the ordinance which we are of opinion are within the authority of the state, and proper subject-matter for its regulation; at least, until the federal authority is exerted. These are the provisions with reference to passengers riding on the rear platform unless the same be provided with a suitable rail or barrier, etc., and as to persons riding upon the front platform unless a rail or barrier be provided, separating the motorman from the balance of the front platform, as well as those provisions with reference to the requirement to keep the cars clean and ventilated and fumigated. We think these regulations come within that class in which this Court has sustained the right of the local authorities to safeguard the traveling public, and to promote their comfort and convenience, only incidentally affecting the interstate business, and not subjecting the same to unreasonable demands. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Georgia, 234 U. S. 280, 291, 292. As to the regulation affecting the temperature of the cars, and providing that they shall never be permitted to be below 50° Fahrenheit, the undisputed testimony shows that it is impossible in the operation of the cars to keep them uniformly up to this temperature, owing to the opening and closing of doors, and other interferences that make it impracticable. We therefore think, upon this showing, this feature of the ordinance is unreasonable and cannot be sustained.

Our conclusion is that the Court of Appeals of Kentucky erred in refusing the injunction as against the provisions of the ordinance regulating the number of passengers to be carried in a car and the number of cars to be provided, and the requirement as to heating in view of the testimony as heretofore stated. In these respects its decision should be reversed. We think the other provisions of the ordinance separable and concerning them the plaintiff in error was not entitled to an injunction in the state court.

Reversed in part.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. KING.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1910.
217 U. S. 524, 54 L. ed. 868, 30 Sup. Ct. 594.

[Two actions in a Circuit Court of the United States for injuries to persons crossing the railroad track. The railroad company's liability was alleged to arise from failure to observe the Georgia blow-post law stated in the opinion. Judgments for the plaintiffs were affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals and now on certiorari:]

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

This statute is found in § 2222 of the Civil Code of Georgia, and reads as follows:

"There must be fixed on the line of said road, and at the distance of 400 yards from the center of each of such road crossings, and on each side thereof, a post, and the engineer shall be required, whenever he shall arrive at either of said posts, to blow the whistle of the locomotive."

tive until it arrives at the public road, and to simultaneously check and keep checking the speed thereof so as to stop in time should any person or thing be crossing said track on said road." * * *

The rights of the states to pass laws not having the effect to regulate or directly interfere with the operations of interstate commerce, passed in the exercise of the police power of the state in the interest of the public health and safety, have been maintained by the decisions of this Court. We may instance some of the cases of this nature in which statutes have been held not to be a regulation of interstate commerce, although they may affect the transaction of such commerce among the states. In Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, it was held to be within the police power of the state to require locomotive engineers to be examined and licensed. In N. Y., N. H. & H. Railroad Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, a law regulating the heating of passenger cars and requiring guard posts on bridges was sustained. In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, it was held to be a valid enactment to require railway companies operating within the State of Ohio to cause three of its regular passenger trains to stop each way daily at every village containing over three thousand inhabitants. In Erb v. Morasch, 177 U. S. 584, it was held that a municipal ordinance of Kansas City, Kansas, although applicable to interstate trains, which restricted the speed of all trains within the city limits to six miles an hour, was a valid exertion of the police power of the state. In the case of Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, this Court said:

"It is also within the undoubted province of the state legislature to make regulations with regard to the speed of railroad trains in the neighborhood of cities and towns; with regard to the precautions to be taken in the approach of such trains to bridges, tunnels, deep cuts and sharp curves; and, generally, with regard to all operations in which the lives and health of people may be endangered, even though such regulations affect to some extent the operations of interstate commerce. Such regulations are eminently local in their character, and, in the absence of Congressional regulations over the same subject, are free from all constitutional objections, and unquestionably valid."

On the other hand, it has been held to be an illegal attempt to regulate interstate commerce to require interstate passenger trains to stop at county seats when adequate train service had already been provided for local traffic. C. C. C. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514. * * *

Applying the general rule to be deduced from these cases to such regulations as are under consideration here, it is evident that the constitutionality of such statutes will depend upon their effect upon interstate commerce. It is consistent with the former decisions of this court and with a proper interpretation of constitutional rights, at least in the absence of Congressional action upon the same subject-matter, for the state to regulate, the manner in which interstate trains shall approach dangerous crossings, the signals which shall be given, and the control of the train which shall be required under such circumstances. Crossings may be so situated in reference to cuts or curves as to render them highly dangerous to those using the public highways. They may be in or near towns or cities, so that to approach them at a high rate of speed would be attended with great danger to life or limb. On the other hand, highway crossings may be so numerous and so near together that to require interstate trains to slacken speed indiscriminately at all such crossings would be practically destructive of the successful operation of such passenger trains. Statutes which require the speed of such trains to be checked at all crossings so situated might not only be a regulation, but also a direct burden upon interstate commerce, and therefore beyond the power of the state to enact. * * *

The amended answer contains the general statement that the statute is in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and a direct burden upon, and impedes interstate traffic * * *. But these averments are mere conclusions. They set forth no facts which would make the operation of the statute unconstitutional. They do not show the number or location of the crossings at which the railway company would be required to check the speed of its trains so as to interfere with their successful operation. * * * In the absence of facts setting up a situation showing the unreasonable character of the statute as applied to the defendant under the circumstances, we think the amended answer set up no legal defense, and that the demurrer thereto was properly sustained. * * *

SEABOARD AIR LINE R. CO. v. BLACKWELL.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1917.

[The action was like those in the preceding case and involved the same statute. It was brought in a Georgia court. In answer the defendant alleged that the train was running in interstate commerce from Atlanta, Georgia, to other points in Georgia and South Carolina, that from Atlanta to the state line was 123 miles, that in that distance there were 124 crossings at which the statute required slowing down, that 3 minutes would be consumed in each slowing, or about 6 hours for all these slowings, increasing the train time from  $4\frac{1}{2}$  hours to  $10\frac{1}{2}$  hours between Atlanta and the state line. Upon demurrer to this answer, judgment went for the plaintiff. On appeal the state Supreme Court held the statute valid as applied to these facts. On writ of error.]

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

It will be observed, therefore, from this statement that the law of the state was an element in the decisions of the state tribunals and its constitutionality was sustained against the attacks of the railway company. The question is, therefore, presented for our consideration. In its consideration we need not descant upon the extent of the police power of the state and the limitations upon it when it encounters the powers conferred upon the national government. There is pertinent exposition of these in Southern Railway Co. v. King, 217 U. S. 524, in which the law now under review was passed upon. The case is clear as to the relation of the powers and that the power of the state cannot be exercised to directly burden interstate commerce. It was recognized that there might be crossings the approach to which the state could regulate. But, on the other hand, it was said there might be others so numerous and so near together that to require the slackening of speed would be practically destructive of the successful operation of interstate passenger trains, and, therefore, "statutes which require the speed of such trains to be checked at all crossings so situated might not only be a regulation, but also a direct burden upon interstate commerce, and therefore beyond the power of the state to enact." * * *

The facts so specified and which it was decided would give illegal operation to the statute are alleged in the present case, and, assuming them to be true—and we must so assume—compel the conclusion that the statute is a direct burden upon interstate commerce, and, being such, is unlawful. The demurrer to the answer averring them was therefore improperly sustained. * * *

Reversed and case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE [WHITE], MR. JUSTICE PITNEY and MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS dissent on the ground that the regulation in question was within the class which the state is entitled to enact in the absence of congressional action, and until such action. There having been no action by Congress, there is therefore no ground for holding the state action void as a regulation of interstate commerce.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO. v. ARIZONA EX REL. SULLIVAN.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945.

325 U. S. 761, 89 L. ed. 1915, 65 Sup. Ct. 1515.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Arizona Train Limit Law of May 16, 1912, Arizona Code Ann., 1939, § 69-119, makes it unlawful for any person or corporation to operate within the state a railroad train of more than fourteen passenger or seventy freight cars, and authorizes the state to recover a money penalty for each violation of the Act. The questions for decision are whether Congress has, by legislative enactment, restricted the power of the states to regulate the length of interstate trains as a safety measure and, if not, whether the statute contravenes the commerce clause of the federal Constitution.

In 1940 the State of Arizona brought suit in the Arizona Superior Court against appellant, the Southern Pacific Company, to recover the statutory penalties for operating within the state two interstate trains, one a passenger train of more than fourteen cars, and one a freight train of more than seventy cars. Appellant answered, admitting the train operations, but defended on the ground that the statute offends against the commerce clause and the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and conflicts with federal legislation. After an extended trial, without a jury, the court made detailed findings of fact on the basis of which it gave judgment for the railroad company. The Supreme Court of Arizona reversed and directed judgment for the state. 61 Ariz. 66, 145 Pac. 2d 530. The case comes here on appeal under § 237(a) of the Judicial Code, appellant raising by its assignments of error the questions presented here for decision.

The Supreme Court left undisturbed the findings of the trial court and made no new findings. It held that the power of the state to regulate the length of interstate trains had not been restricted by Congressional action. It sustained the Act as a safety measure to reduce the number of accidents attributed to the operation of trains of more than the statutory maximum length, enacted by the state legislature in the exercise of its "police power". This power the court held extended to the regulation of the operations of interstate commerce in the interests of local health, safety and well-being. It thought that a state statute, enacted in the exercise of the police power, and bearing some reasonable relation to the health, safety and well-being of the people of the state, of which the state legislature is the judge, was not to be judicially overturned, notwithstanding its admittedly adverse effect on the operation of interstate trains.

Purporting to act under § 1, paragraphs 10-17 of the Interstate Commerce Act, 24 Stat. 379 as amended (49 U. S. C. § 1 et seq.), the Interstate Commerce Commission, as of September 15, 1942, promulgated as an emergency measure Service Order No. 85, 7 Fed. Reg. 7258, suspending the operation of state train limit laws for the duration of the war, and denied an application to set aside the order. In the Matter of Service Order No. 85, 256 I. C. C. 523. * * *

The Commission's order was not in effect in 1940 when the present suit was brought for violations of the state law in that year, and the Commission's order is inapplicable to the train operations here charged as violations. Hence the question here is not of the effect of the Commission's order, which we assume for purposes of decision to be valid, but whether the grant of power to the Commission operated to supersede the state act before the Commission's order. We are of the opinion that, in the absence of administrative implementation by the Commission, § 1 does not of itself curtail state power to regulate train lengths.

The provisions under which the Commission purported to act, phrased in broad and general language, do not in terms deal with that subject. We do not gain either from their words or from the legislative history any hint that Congress in enacting them intended, apart from Commission action, to supersede state laws regulating train lengths. We can hardly suppose that Congress, merely by conferring authority on the Commission to regulate car service in an "emergency," intended to restrict the exercise, otherwise lawful, of state power to regulate train lengths before the Commission finds an "emergency" to exist.

Congress, in enacting legislation within its constitutional authority over interstate commerce, will not be deemed to have intended to strike down a state statute designed to protect the health and safety of the public unless its purpose to do so is clearly manifested, * * * or unless the state law, in terms or in its practical administration, conflicts with the act of Congress, or plainly and palpably infringes its policy. * * * Congress, although asked to do so, has declined to pass legislation specifically limiting trains to seventy cars. We are therefore brought to appellants principal contention, that the state statute contravenes the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Although the commerce clause conferred on the national government power to regulate commerce, its possession of the power does not exclude all state power of regulation. Ever since Willson v. Black-Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. 245, and Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299, it has been recognized that, in the absence of conflicting legislation by Congress, there is a residuum of power in the state to make laws governing matters of local concern which nevertheless in some measure affect interstate commerce or even, to some extent, regulate it. * * * When the regulation of matters of local concern is local in character and effect, and its impact on the national commerce does not seriously interfere with its operation, and the consequent incentive to deal with them nationally is slight, such regulation has been generally held to be within state authority. * * *

But ever since Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, the states have not been deemed to have authority to impede substantially the free flow of commerce from state to state, or to regulate those phases of the national commerce which, because of the need of national uniformity, demand that their regulation, if any, be prescribed by a single authority. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, supra, 319; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 108, 109; Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, 399-400; Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160, 176. Whether or not this long recognized distribution of power between the national and the state governments is predicated upon the implications of the commerce clause itself, Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 447; Minnesota Rate Cases, supra, 399, 400; Pennsylvania v. West Virginia, 262 U. S. 553, 596; Baldwin v. Seelig, 294 U. S. 511, 522; South Carolina Highway Dept. v. Barnwell Bros., 303 U. S. 177, 185, or upon the presumed intention of Congress, where Congress has not spoken, Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 282; Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 490; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 631; Bowman v. Chicago, etc. Ry., 125 U. S. 465, 481-2; Leisy v. Hardin, supra, 109; In re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 559-60; Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 302; Covington & Co. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 212; Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U. S. 466, 479, n., Dowling, Interstate Commerce and State Power, 27 Va. Law Rev. 1, the result is the same.

In the application of these principles some enactments may be found to be plainly within and others plainly without state power. But between these extremes lies the infinite variety of cases, in which regulation of local matters may also operate as a regulation of commerce, in which reconciliation of the conflicting claims of state and national power is to be attained only by some appraisal and accommodation of the competing demands of the state and national interests involved. * * *

For a hundred years it has been accepted constitutional doctrine that the commerce clause, without the aid of Congressional legislation, thus affords some protection from state legislation inimical to the national commerce, and that in such cases, where Congress has not acted, this Court, and not the state legislature, is under the commerce clause the final arbiter between the competing demands of state and national interests. * * *

Congress has undoubted power to redefine the distribution of power over interstate commerce. It may either permit the states to regulate the commerce in a manner which would otherwise not be permissible, In re Rahrer, supra, 561-62; Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky, 238 U. S. 190, 198; Rosenberger v. Pacific Express Co., 241 U. S. 48, 50, 51; Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Ry. Co., 242 U. S. 311, 325-6; Whitfield v. Ohio, 297 U. S. 431, 438-40; Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., 299 U. S. 334, 350-51; Hooven & Allison v. Evatt, 324 U. S. 652, 679, or exclude state regulation even of matters of peculiarly local concern which nevertheless affect interstate commerce, Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 230; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467; Houston & Texas Ry. v. United States, 234 U. S. 342; American Express Co. v. Caldwell, 244 U. S. 617, 626; Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Public Utilities Comm'n, 245 U. S. 493, 506; New York v. United States, 257 U. S. 591, 601; Commission v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., 284 U. S. 125, 130; Penn. R. Co. v. Illinois Brick Co., 297 U. S. 447, 459.

But in general Congress has left it to the courts to formulate the rules thus interpreting the commerce clause in its application, doubtless because it has appreciated the destructive consequences to the commerce of the nation if their protection were withdrawn, * * * and has been aware that in their application state laws will not be invalidated without the support of relevant factual material which will "afford a sure basis" for an informed judgment. * * * Meanwhile, Congress has accommodated its legislation, as have the states, to these rules as an established feature of our constitutional system. There has thus been left to the states wide scope for the regulation of matters of local state concern, even though it in some measure affects the commerce, provided it does not materially restrict the free flow of commerce across state lines, or interfere with it in matters with respect to which uniformity of regulation is of predominant national concern.

Hence the matters for ultimate determination here are the nature and extent of the burden which the state regulation of interstate trains, adopted as a safety measure, imposes on interstate commerce, and whether the relative weights of the state and national interests involved are such as to make inapplicable the rule, generally observed, that the free flow of interstate commerce and its freedom from local restraints in matters requiring uniformity of regulation are interests safeguarded by the commerce clause from state interference.

While this Court is not bound by the findings of the state court, and may determine for itself the facts of a case upon which an asserted federal right depends, * * * the facts found by the state trial court showing the nature of the interstate commerce involved, and the effect upon it of the train limit law, are not seriously questioned. Its findings with respect to the need for an effect of the statute as a safety measure, although challenged in some particulars which we do not regard as material to our decision, are likewise supported by evidence. Taken together the findings supply an adequate basis for decision of the constitutional issue.

The findings show that the operation of long trains, that is trains of more than fourteen passenger and more than seventy freight cars, is standard practice over the main lines of the railroads of the United States, and that, if the length of trains is to be regulated at all, national uniformity in the regulation adopted, such as only Congress can prescribe, is practically indispensable to the operation of an efficient and economical national railway system. On many railroads passenger trains of more than fourteen cars and freight trains of more than seventy cars are operated, and on some systems freight trains are run ranging from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and sixty cars in length. Outside of Arizona, where the length of trains is not restricted, appellant runs a substantial proportion of long trains. In 1939 on its comparable route for through traffic through Utah and Nevada from 66 to 85% of its freight trains were over 70 cars in length and over 43% of its passenger trains included more than fourteen passenger cars.

In Arizona, approximately 93% of the freight traffic and 95% of the passenger traffic is interstate. Because of the Train Limit Law appellant is required to haul over 30% more trains in Arizona than would otherwise have been necessary. The record shows a definite relationship between operating costs and the length of trains, the increase in length resulting in a reduction of operating costs per car. The additional cost of operation of trains complying with the Train Limit Law in Arizona amounts for the two railroads traversing that state to about $1,000,000 a year. The reduction in train lengths also impedes efficient operation. More locomotives and more manpower are required; the necessary conversion and reconversion of train lengths at terminals and the delay caused by breaking up and remaking long trains upon entering and leaving the state in order to comply with the law, delays the traffic and diminishes its volume moved in a given time, especially when traffic is heavy. * * *

The unchallenged findings leave no doubt that the Arizona Train Limit Law imposes a serious burden on the interstate commerce conducted by appellant. It materially impedes the movement of appellant's interstate trains through that state and interposes a substantial obstruction to the national policy proclaimed by Congress, to promote adequate, economical and efficient railway transportation service. Interstate Commerce Act, preceding § 1, 54 Stat. 899. Enforcement of the law in Arizona, while train lengths remain unregulated or are regulated by varying standards in other states, must inevitably result in an impairment of uniformity of efficient railroad operation because the railroads are subjected to regulation which is not uniform in its application. Compliance with a state statute limiting train lengths requires interstate trains of a length lawful in other states to be broken up and reconstituted as they enter each state according as it may impose varying limitations upon train lengths. The alternative is for the carrier to conform to the lowest train limit restriction of any of the states through which its trains pass, whose laws thus control the carriers' operations both within and without the regulating state. * * *

At present the seventy freight car laws are enforced only in Arizona and Oklahoma, with a fourteen car passenger car limit in Arizona. The record here shows that the enforcement of the Arizona statute results in freight trains being broken up and reformed at the California border and in New Mexico, some distance from the Arizona line. Frequently it is not feasible to operate a newly assembled train from the New Mexico yard nearest to Arizona, with the result that the Arizona limitation governs the flow of traffic as far east as El Paso, Texas. For similar reasons the Arizona law often controls the length of passenger trains all the way from Los Angeles to El Paso.

If one state may regulate train lengths, so may all the others, and they need not prescribe the same maximum limitation. The practical effect of such regulation is to control train operations beyond the boundaries of the state exacting it because of the necessity of breaking up and reassembling long trains at the nearest terminal points before entering and after leaving the regulating state. The serious impediment to the free flow of commerce by the local regulation of train lengths and the practical necessity that such regulation, if any, must be prescribed by a single body having a nation-wide authority are apparent.

The trial court found that the Arizona law had no reasonable relation to safety, and made train operation more dangerous. Examination of the evidence and the detailed findings makes it clear that this conclusion was rested on facts found which indicate that such increased danger of accident and personal injury as may result from the greater length of trains is more than offset by the increase in the number of accidents resulting from the larger number of trains when train lengths are reduced. In considering the effect of the statute as a safety measure, therefore, the factor of controlling significance for the present purposes is not whether there is basis for the conclusion of the Arizona Supreme Court that the increase in length of trains beyond the statutory maximum has an adverse effect upon safety of operation. The decisive question is whether in the circumstances the total effect of the law as a safety measure in reducing accidents and casualties is so slight or problematical as not to outweigh the national interest in keeping interstate commerce free from interferences which seriously impede it and subject it to local regulation which does not have a uniform effect on the interstate train journey which it interrupts.

The principal source of danger of accident from increased length of trains is the resulting increase of "slack action" of the train. Slack action is the amount of free movement of one car before it transmits its motion to an adjoining coupled car. This free movement results from the fact that in railroad practice cars are loosely coupled, and the coupling is often combined with a shock-absorbing device, a "draft gear," which, under stress, substantially increases the free movement as the train is started or stopped. Loose coupling is necessary to enable the train to proceed freely around curves and is an aid in starting heavy trains, since the application of the locomotive power to the train operates on each car in the train successively, and the power is thus utilized to start only one car at a time.

The slack action between cars due to loose couplings varies from seven-eighths of an inch to one and one-eighth inches and, with the added free movement due to the use of draft gears, may be as high as six or seven inches between cars. The length of the train increases the slack since the slack action of a train is the total of the free movement between its several cars. The amount of slack action has some effect on the severity of the shock of train movements, and on freight trains sometimes results in injuries to operatives, which most frequently occur to occupants of the caboose. The amount and severity of slack action, however, are not wholly dependent upon the length of train, as they may be affected by the mode and conditions of operation as to grades, speed, and load. And accidents due to slack action also occur in the operation of short trains. On comparison of the number of slack action accidents in Arizona with those in Nevada, where the length of trains is now unregulated, the trial court found that with substantially the same amount of traffic in each state the number of accidents was relatively the same in long as in short train operations. While accidents from slack action do occur in the operation of passenger trains, it does not appear that they are more frequent or the resulting shocks more severe on long than on short passenger trains. Nor does it appear that slack action accidents occurring on passenger trains, whatever their length, are of sufficient severity to cause serious injury or damage.

As the trial court found, reduction of the length of trains also tends to increase the number of accidents because of the increase in the number of trains. The application of the Arizona law compelled appellant to operate 30.08%, or 4,304, more freight trains in 1938 than would otherwise have been necessary. And the record amply supports the trial court's conclusion that the frequency of accidents is closely related to the number of trains run. The number of accidents due to grade crossing collisions between trains and motor vehicles and pedestrians, and to collisions between trains, which are usually far more serious than those due to slack action, and accidents due to locomotive failures, in general vary with the number of trains. Increase in the number of trains results in more starts and stops, more "meets" and "passes", and more switching movements, all tending to increase the number of accidents not only to train operatives and other railroad employees, but to passengers and members of the public exposed to danger by train operations.

Railroad statistics introduced into the record tend to show that this is the result of the application of the Arizona Train Limit Law to appellant, both with respect to all railroad casualties within the state and those affecting only trainmen whom the train limit law is supposed to protect. The accident rate in Arizona is much higher than on comparable lines elsewhere, where there is no regulation of length of trains. The record lends support to the trial court's conclusion that the train length limitation increased rather than diminished the number of accidents. This is shown by comparison of appellant's operations in Arizona with those in Nevada, and by comparison of operations of appellant and of the Santa Fe Railroad in Arizona with those of the same roads in New Mexico, and by like comparison between appellant's operations in Arizona and operations throughout the country. * * *

We think, as the trial court found, that the Arizona Train Limit Law, viewed as a safety measure, affords at most slight and dubious advantage, if any, over unregulated train lengths, because it results in an increase in the number of trains and train operations and the consequent increase in train accidents of a character generally more severe than those due to slack action. Its undoubted effect on the commerce is the regulation, without securing uniformity, of the length of trains operating in interstate commerce, which lack is itself a primary cause of preventing the free flow of commerce by delaying it and by substantially increasing its cost and impairing its efficiency. In these respects the case differs from those where a state, by regulatory measures affecting the commerce, has removed or reduced safety hazards without substantial interference with the interstate movement of trains. Such are measures abolishing the car stove, New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628; requiring locomotives to be supplied with electric headlights, Atlantic Coast Line v. Georgia, 234 U. S. 280; providing for full train crews, Chicago, R. I. & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Arkansas, 219 U. S. 453; St. Louis & Iron Mtn. Ry. v. Arkansas, 240 U. S. 518; Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Norwood, 283 U. S. 249; and for the equipment of freight trains with cabooses, Terminal Railroad Ass'n v. Brotherhood, 318 U. S. 1.

The principle that, without controlling Congressional action, a state may not regulate interstate commerce so as substantially to affect its flow or deprive it of needed uniformity in its regulation is not to be avoided by "simply invoking the convenient apologetics of the police power," Kansas Southern Ry. v. Kaw Valley District, 233 U. S. 75, 79; Buck v. Kuykendall, 267 U. S. 307, 315. In the Kaw Valley case the Court held that the state was without constitutional power to order a railroad to remove a railroad bridge over which its interstate trains passed, as a means of preventing floods in the district and of improving its drainage, because it was "not pretended that local welfare needs the removal of the defendants' bridges at the expense of the dominant requirements of commerce with other states, but merely that it would be helped by raising them." * * *

Here we conclude that the state does go too far. Its regulation of train lengths, admittedly obstructive to interstate train operation, and having a seriously adverse effect on transportation efficiency and economy, passes beyond what is plainly essential for safety since it does not appear that it will lessen rather than increase the danger of accident. Its attempted regulation of the operation of interstate trains cannot establish nation-wide control such as is essential to the maintenance of an efficient transportation system, which Congress alone can prescribe. The state interest cannot be preserved at the expense of the national interest by an enactment which regulates interstate train lengths without securing such control, which is a matter of national concern. To this the interest of the state here asserted is subordinate.

Appellees especially rely on the full train crew cases, * * * and also on South Carolina Highway Dept. v. Barnwell Bros., supra, as supporting the state's authority to regulate the length of interstate trains. While the full train crew laws undoubtedly placed an added financial burden on the railroads in order to serve a local interest, they did not obstruct interstate transportation or seriously impede it. They had no effects outside the state beyond those of picking up and setting down the extra employees at the state boundaries; they involved no wasted use of facilities or serious impairment of transportation efficiency, which are among the factors of controlling weight here. In sustaining those laws the Court considered the restriction a minimal burden on the commerce comparable to the law requiring the licensing of engineers as a safeguard against those of reckless and intemperate habits, sustained in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, or those afflicted with color blindness, upheld in Nashville &c. Railway v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, and other similar regulations. * * *

South Carolina Highway Dept. v. Barnwell Bros., supra, was concerned with the power of the state to regulate the weight and width of motor cars passing interstate over its highways, a legislative field over which the state has a far more extensive control than over interstate railroads. In that case, and in Maurer v. Hamilton, 309 U. S. 598, we were at pains to point out that there are few subjects of state regulation affecting interstate commerce which are so peculiarly of local concern as is the use of the state's highways. Unlike the railroads local highways are built, owned and maintained by the state or its municipal subdivisions. The state is responsible for their safe and economical administration. Regulations affecting the safety of their use must be applied alike to intrastate and interstate traffic. The fact that they affect alike shippers in interstate and intrastate commerce in great numbers, within as well as without the state, is a safeguard against regulatory abuses. Their regulation is akin to quarantine measures, game laws, and like local regulations of rivers, harbors, piers, and docks, with respect to which the state has exceptional scope for the exercise of its regulatory power, and which, Congress not acting, have been sustained even though they materially interfere with interstate commerce.

The contrast between the present regulation and the full train crew laws in point of their effects on the commerce, and the like contrast with the highway safety regulations, in point of the nature of the subject of regulation and the state's interest in it, illustrate and emphasize the considerations which enter into a determination of the relative weights of state and national interests where state regulation affecting interstate commerce is attempted. Here examination of all the relevant factors makes it plain that the state interest is outweighed by the interest of the nation in an adequate, economical and efficient railway transportation service, which must prevail. Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE concurs in the result.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, dissenting. * * *

For more than a quarter of a century, railroads and their employees have engaged in controversies over the relative virtues and dangers of long trains. Railroads have argued that they could carry goods and passengers cheaper in long trains than in short trains. They have also argued that while the danger of personal injury to their employees might in some respects be greater on account of the operation of long trains, this danger was more than offset by an increased number of accidents from other causes brought about by the operation of a much larger number of short trains. These arguments have been, and are now, vigorously denied. While there are others, the chief causes assigned for the belief that long trains unnecessarily jeopardize the lives and limbs of railroad employees relate to "slack action." Cars coupled together retain a certain free play of movement, ranging between 1½ inches and 1 foot, and this is called "slack action." Train brakes do not ordinarily apply or release simultaneously on all cars. This frequently results in a severe shock or jar to cars, particularly those in the rear of a train. It has always been the position of the employees that the dangers from "slack action" correspond to and are proportionate with the length of the train. The argument that "slack movements" are more dangerous in long trains than in short trains seems never to have been denied. The railroads have answered it by what is in effect a plea of confession and avoidance. They say that the added cost of running long trains places an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce. Their second answer is that the operation of short trains requires the use of more separate train units; that a certain number of accidents resulting in injury are inherent in the operation of each unit, injuries which may be inflicted either on employees or on the public; consequently, they have asserted that it is not in the public interest to prohibit the operation of long trains. * * *

This controversy between the railroads and their employees, which was nation-wide, was carried to Congress. Extensive hearings took place. The employees' position was urged by members of the various Brotherhoods. The railroads' viewpoint was presented through representatives of their National Association. In 1937, the Senate Interstate Commerce Commission after its own exhaustive hearings unanimously recommended that trains be limited to 70 cars as a safety measure. The Committee in its Report reviewed the evidence and specifically referred to the large and increasing number of injuries and deaths suffered by railroad employees; it concluded that the admitted danger from slack movement was greatly intensified by the operation of long trains; that short trains reduce this danger; that the added cost of short trains to the railroad was no justification for jeopardizing the safety of railroad employees; and that the legislation would provide a greater degree of safety for persons and property, increase protection for railway employees and the public, and improve transportation services for shippers and consumers. The Senate passed the bill but the House Committee failed to report it out.

During the hearings on that measure, frequent references were made to the Arizona statute. It is significant, however, that American railroads never once asked Congress to exercise its unquestioned power to enact uniform legislation on that subject, and thereby invalidate the Arizona law. That which for some unexplained reason they did not ask Congress to do when it had the very subject of train length limitations under consideration, they shortly thereafter asked an Arizona state court to do.

In the state court a rather extraordinary "trial" took place. Charged with violating the law, the railroad admitted the charge. It alleged that the law was unconstitutional, however, and sought a trial of facts on that issue. The essence of its charge of unconstitutionality rested on one of these two grounds: (1) the legislature and people of Arizona erred in 1912 in determining that the running of long cars was dangerous; or (2) railroad conditions had so improved since 1912 that previous dangers did not exist to the same extent, and that the statute should be stricken down either because it cast an undue burden on interstate commerce by reason of the added cost, or because the changed conditions had rendered the Act "arbitrary and unreasonable." Thus, the issue which the Court "tried" was not whether the railroad was guilty of violating the law, but whether the law was unconstitutional either because the legislature had been guilty of misjudging the facts concerning the degree of the danger of long trains, or because the 1912 conditions of danger no longer existed.

Before the state trial judge finally determined that the dangers found by the legislature in 1912 no longer existed, he heard evidence over a period of 5½ months which appears in about 3000 pages of the printed record before us. It then adopted findings of fact submitted to it by the railroad, which cover 148 printed pages, and conclusions of law which cover 5 pages. We can best understand the nature of this "trial" by analogizing the same procedure to a defendant charged with violating a state or national safety appliance act, where the defendant comes into court and admits violation of the act. In such cases, the ordinary procedure would be for the court to pass upon the constitutionality of the act, and either discharge or convict the defendants. The procedure here, however, would justify quite a different trial method. Under it, a defendant is permitted to offer voluminous evidence to show that a legislative body has erroneously resolved disputed facts in finding a danger great enough to justify the passage of the law. This new pattern of trial procedure makes it necessary for a judge to hear all the evidence offered as to why a legislature passed a law and to make findings of fact as to the validity of those reasons. If under today's ruling a court does make findings, as to a danger contrary to the findings of the legislature, and the evidence heard "lends support" to those findings, a court can then invalidate the law. In this respect, the Arizona County Court acted, and this Court today is acting, as a "super-legislature."

Even if this method of invalidating legislative acts is a correct one, I still think that the "findings" of the state court do not authorize today's decision. That court did not find that there is no unusual danger from slack movements in long trains. It did decide on disputed evidence that the long train "slack movement" dangers were more than offset by prospective dangers as a result of running a large number of short trains, since many people might be hurt at grade crossings. There was undoubtedly some evidence before the state court from which it could have reached such a conclusion. There was undoubtedly as much evidence before it which would have justified a different conclusion.

Under those circumstances, the determination of whether it is in the interest of society for the length of trains to be governmentally regulated is a matter of public policy. Someone must fix that policy—either the Congress, or the state, or the courts. A century and a half of constitutional history and government admonishes this Court to leave that choice to the elected legislative representatives of the people themselves, where it properly belongs both on democratic principles and the requirements of efficient government. * * *

The Supreme Court of Arizona did not discuss the County Court's so-called findings of fact. It properly designated the Arizona statute as a safety measure, and finding that it bore a reasonable relation to its purpose declined to review the judgment of the legislature as to the necessity for the passage of the act. In so doing it was well fortified by a long line of decisions of this Court. Today's decision marks an abrupt departure from that line of cases. * * *

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting.

I have expressed my doubts whether the courts should intervene in situations like the present and strike down state legislation on the grounds that it burdens interstate commerce. McCarroll v. Dixie Greyhound Lines, 309 U. S. 176, 183-189. My view has been that the courts should intervene only where the state legislation discriminated against interstate commerce or was out of harmony with laws which Congress had enacted. It seems to me particularly appropriate that that course be followed here. For Congress has given the Interstate Commerce Commission broad powers of regulation over interstate carriers. The Commission is the national agency which has been entrusted with the task of promoting a safe, adequate, efficient, and economical transportation service. It is the expert on this subject. It is in a position to police the field. And if its powers prove inadequate for the task, Congress, which has paramount authority in this field, can implement them. * * * Whether the question arises under the Commerce Clause or the Fourteenth Amendment, I think the legislation is entitled to a presumption of validity. If a State passed a law prohibiting the hauling of more than one freight car at a time, we would have a situation comparable in effect to a state law requiring all railroads within its borders to operate on narrow gauge tracks. The question is one of degree and calls for a close appraisal of the facts. I am not persuaded that the evidence adduced by the railroads overcomes the presumption of validity to which this train-limit law is entitled. For the reasons stated by Mr. JUSTICE BLACK, Arizona's train-limit law should stand as an allowable regulation enacted to protect the lives and limbs of men who operate the trains.

NOTES

1. Di Santo was convicted in a Pennsylvania court for selling steamship tickets or orders for transportation without a license required by a state statute, which forbade any person or corporation other than a railroad or steamship company to sell steamship tickets without first obtaining a license which was to be issued only upon the applicant's proving good moral character, fitness to conduct the business, and filing a $1,000 bond to indemnify against his dishonesty, fraud or misrepresentation to purchasers. A majority of the Supreme Court held the statute invalid as a "direct" burden on foreign commerce. The opinion of Justice Butler said that the sales in question were related to foreign commerce as directly as were sales made in ticket offices maintained by the carriers and operated by their servants and employees. Justice Brandeis, in a dissenting opinion with which Justice Holmes concurred, said that this was not a case where the silence of Congress should be interpreted as a prohibition of state action. He viewed the statute, moreover, as one placing no direct burden on commerce but affecting it only indirectly. Justice Stone, in a separate dissent with which the other dissenters also agreed, criticized the test used by the court as to whether interference with interstate or foreign commerce was "direct" or "indirect." "In this case the traditional test of the limit of state action by inquiring whether the interference with commerce is direct or indirect seems to me too mechanical, too uncertain in its application, and too remote from actualities, to be of value. In thus making use of the expressions, 'direct' and 'indirect interference' with commerce, we are doing little more than using labels to describe a result rather than any trustworthy formula by which it is reached." Di Santo v. Pennsylvania, 273 U. S. 34, 71 L. ed. 524, 47 Sup. Ct. 267 (1927).

2. In California v. Thompson, 313 U. S. 109, 85 L. ed. 1219, 61 Sup. Ct. 930 (1941) the Supreme Court, without dissent, adopted the views of the dissenting justices in the Di Santo case. A California statute required any "transportation agent" who "sells or offers for sale, or negotiates for" motor transportation over the public highways of the state to obtain a license from the State Railroad Commission, which was obtainable only upon satisfying the Commission of the applicant's fitness to exercise the licensed privilege, payment of a license fee of $1.00, and filing a $1,000 bond conditioned upon the faithful performance of the transportation contracts negotiated by him. Thompson's conviction of acting as a transportation agent without a license was reversed by a state appellate court on the authority of the Di Santo case. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the state could validly apply the statute to agents who negotiate for interstate transportation. Justice Stone, for the court, after citing many of the cases he had cited in his Di Santo dissent, said: "The license required of those engaged in such business is not conditioned upon any control or restriction of the movement of the traffic interstate but only on the good character and responsibility of those engaged locally as transportation brokers. Fraudulent or unconscionable conduct of those so engaged which is injurious to their patrons, is peculiarly a subject of local concern and the appropriate subject of local regulation. In every practical sense regulation of such conduct is beyond the effective reach of congressional action. Unless some measure of local control is permissible, it must go largely unregulated. * * * After noting the fact that the Di Santo decision had taken a different view and citing several cases in which various state regulations of interstate transportation by motor vehicle on the state's highways had been upheld, the opinion concluded: "The decision in the Di Santo case was a departure from [the] principle which has been recognized since Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299. It cannot be reconciled with later decisions of this court which have likewise recognized and applied the principle, and it can no longer be regarded as controlling authority."

3. The commerce clause has been held to prohibit a state from permitting its courts to assume jurisdiction of actions where to do so would place an undue burden upon interstate commerce. For a discussion and analysis of the cases see the opinion in International Milling Co. v. Columbia Transportation Co., 292 U. S. 511, 78 L. ed. 1396, 54 Sup. Ct. 797 (1934). Rev. 381 (1933), 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law (1938), 1052; Comment, Jurisdiction Over Nonresident Carriers as Limited by Doctrine of Unreasonable Burden on Interstate Commerce, 34 Mich. L. Rev. 979 (1936).

4. How far may a state go in placing restrictions on the right of a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce within the state to sue in its courts on contracts made in the course of carrying on such business? See Sioux Remedy Co. v. Cope, 235 U. S. 197, 59 L. ed. 193, 35 Sup. Ct. 57 (1914); Union Brokerage Co. v. Jensen, 322 U. S. 202, 88 L. ed. 1227, 64 Sup. Ct. 967, 152 A. L. R. 1072 (1944).

BUCK v. KUYKENDALL.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1925.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

Section 4 of chapter III of the Laws of Washington, 1921, * * * prohibits common carriers for hire from using the highways by auto vehicles between fixed termini or over regular routes, without having first obtained from the Director of Public Works a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require such operation. The highest court of the state has construed the section as applying to common carriers engaged exclusively in interstate commerce. Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. Schoenfeldt, 123 Wash. 579; Schmidt v. Department of Public Works, 123 Wash. 705. The main question for decision is whether the statute so construed and applied is consistent with the federal constitution and the legislation of Congress.

Buck, a citizen of Washington, wished to operate an auto stage line over the Pacific Highway between Seattle, Washington, and Portland, Oregon, as a common carrier for hire exclusively for through interstate passengers and express. He obtained from Oregon the license prescribed by its laws. Having complied with the laws of Washington relating to motor vehicles, their owners and drivers (Carlsen v. Cooney, 123 Wash. 441), and alleging willingness to comply with all applicable regulations concerning common carriers, Buck applied there for the prescribed certificate of public convenience and necessity. It was refused. The ground of refusal was that, under the laws of the state, the certificate may not be granted for any territory which is already being adequately served by the holder of a certificate; and that, in addition to frequent steam railroad service, adequate transportation facilities between Seattle and Portland were already being provided by means of four connecting auto stage lines, all of which held such certificates from the State of Washington. Re Buck, P. U. R. 1923 E, 737. To enjoin interference by its officials with the operation of the projected line, Buck brought this suit against Kuykendall, the Director of Public Works [in the United States District Court. His bill was dismissed.]

That part of the Pacific Highway which lies within the State of Washington was built by it with federal aid pursuant to the Act of July 11, 1916, c. 241, 39 Stat. 355, as amended February 28, 1919, c. 69, 40 Stat. 1189, 1200, and the Federal Highway Act, November 9, 1921, c. 119, 42 Stat. 212. * * * In support of the decree dismissing the bill this argument is made: * * * The highways belong to the state. It may make provision appropriate for securing the safety and convenience of the public in the use of them. Kane v. New Jersey, 242 U. S. 160. * * * With the increase in number and size of the vehicles used upon a highway, both the danger and the wear and tear grow. To exclude unnecessary vehicles—particularly the large ones commonly used by carriers for hire—promotes both safety and economy. State regulation of that character is valid even as applied to interstate commerce, in the absence of legislation by Congress which deals specifically with the subject. Vandalia R. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 242 U. S. 255; Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co., 211 U. S. 612. Neither the recent federal highway acts, nor the earlier post road acts, Rev. Stat. § 3964; Act of March 1, 1884, c. 9, 23 Stat. 3, do that. * * *

The argument is not sound. It may be assumed that § 4 of the state statute is consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment; and also, that appropriate state regulations adopted primarily to promote safety upon the highways and conservation in their use are not obnoxious to the Commerce Clause, where the indirect burden imposed upon interstate commerce is not unreasonable. Compare Michigan Public Utilities Commission v. Duke, 266 U. S. 571. The provision here in question is of a different character. Its primary purpose is not regulation with a view to safety or to conservation of the highways, but the prohibition of competition. It determines not the manner of use, but the persons by whom the highways may be used. It prohibits such use to some persons while permitting it to others for the same purpose and in the same manner. Moreover, it determines whether the prohibition shall be applied by resort, through state officials, to a test which is peculiarly within the province of federal action—the existence of adequate facilities for conducting interstate commerce. The vice of the legislation is dramatically exposed by the fact that the State of Oregon had issued its certificate which may be deemed equivalent to a legislative declaration that, despite existing facilities, public convenience and necessity required the establishment by Buck of the auto stage line between Seattle and Portland. Thus, the provision of the Washington statute is a regulation, not of the use of its own highways, but of interstate commerce. Its effect upon such commerce is not merely to burden but to obstruct it. Such state action is forbidden by the Commerce Clause. It also defeats the purpose of Congress expressed in the legislation giving federal aid for the construction of interstate highways. * * * Reversed.

[Mr. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS delivered a dissenting opinion.]

NOTES

1. The principal case was distinguished in Fry Roofing Co. v. Wood, 344 U. S. 157, 97 L. ed. 168, 73 Sup. Ct. 204 (1952), where it was held that interstate commerce is not unconstitutionally burdened by an Arkansas statute requiring a driver-owner of trucks, leased by a manufacturer to transport his product, to apply to the state Public Service Commission for a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a contract carrier, where there is nothing to show that the application will be denied to a carrier in interstate commerce or that burdensome conditions will be attached. Justice Douglas (with the concurrence of Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Burton and Minton) dissented on the ground that the statute is a regulation of interstate commerce, not a regulation of the use of Arkansas' highways, and is the kind of control which was denied to the State of Washington in Buck v. Kuykendall.

2. Congress recognized its obligation to regulate interstate transportation by motor carriers in the enactment of the Motor Carrier Act of 1935 (49 U. S. C. §§ 301-327), which delegates to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to make such reasonable rules and regulations implementing the act as the Commission deems necessary or desirable in the public interest. The act seeks to insure collaboration between the Commission and state regulatory bodies.
